4. The graves were opened. It should seem, the same earthquake that rent the rocks, opened the graves, and many bodies of saints which slept, arose. Death to the saints is but the sleep of the body, and the grave the bed it sleeps in; they awoke by the power of the Lord Jesus, and (v. 53) came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into Jerusalem, the holy city, and appeared unto many. We may raise many enquiries concerning it, which we cannot resolve: as, [1] Who these saints were, that did arise. Some think, the ancient patriarchs, that were in such care to be buried in the land of Canaan. Others think, these that arose were modern saints, such as had seen Christ in the flesh, but died before him. What if we should suppose that they were the martyrs, who in the Old Testament times had sealed the truths of God with their blood. Sufferers with Christ shall first reign with him. [2] It is uncertain whether (as some think) they arose to life, now at the death of Christ, but did not go into the city till after his resurrection; or whether they did not revive and rise till after the resurrection; only, for brevity-sake, it is mentioned here, upon the mention of the opening of the graves. [3] Some think that they arose only to bear witness of Christ's resurrection to those to whom they appeared, and, having finished their testimony, retired to their graves again. But it is more agreeable, both to Christ's honour and theirs, to suppose that they arose as Christ did, to die no more. Surely on them who did partake of his first resurrection, a second death had no power. [4] To whom they appeared, whether enemies or friends, in what manner they appeared, how often, what they said and did, are secret things which belong not to us. The relating of this matter so briefly, is a plain intimation to us, that we must not look that way for a confirmation of our faith; we have a more sure word of prophecy.

Yet we may learn many good lessons from it. [1] That even those who lived and died before the death and resurrection of Christ, had saving benefit thereby, as well as those who have lived since. [2] That Jesus Christ, by dying, conquered, disarmed, and disabled, death. These saints that arose, were the present trophies of the victory of Christ's cross over the powers of death. [3] That, in virtue of Christ's resurrection, the bodies of all the saints shall, in the fulness of time, rise again. This was an earnest of the general resurrection at the last day.

III. The conviction of his enemies that were employed in the execution, v. 54.

1. The persons convinced; the centurion, and they that were with him watching Jesus. (1) They were soldiers, whose profession is commonly hardening, and whose breasts are commonly not so susceptible as some others of the impressions either of fear or pity. But there is no spirit too big, too bold, for the power of Christ to break and humble. (2) They were Romans, Gentiles, yet they only were convinced. Here were the Gentiles softened, and the Jews hardened. (3) They were the persecutors of Christ, and those that but just before had reviled him, as appears Luke xxiii. 36. How soon can God, by the power he has over men's consciences, alter their language.

2. The means of their conviction; they perceived the earthquake, which frightened them, and saw the other things that were done. These had their end on these soldiers, whatever they had on others.

3. The expressions of this conviction, in two things.

(1) The terror that was struck upon them; they feared greatly; feared lest they should have been buried in the darkness, or swallowed up in the earthquake. God can easily frighten the most daring of his adversaries. Guilt puts men into fear. Whereas there are those who will not fear, though the earth be removed, Ps. xlvi. 1, 2.

(2) The testimony that was extorted from them; they said, Truly this was the Son of God. It was the great matter now in dispute, the point upon which he and his enemies had joined issue, ch. xxvi. 63, 64. His disciples believed it, but at this time durst not confess it; our Saviour himself was tempted to question it, when he said, Why hast thou forsaken me? The Jews, now that he was dying upon the cross, looked upon it as plainly determined against him. And yet now this centurion and the soldiers make this voluntary confession of the Christian faith, Truly this was the Son of God. The best of his disciples could not have said more at any time, and at this time they had not faith and courage enough to say thus much.

IV. The attendance of his friends, that were witnesses of his death, v. 55, 56.

1. Who they were; many women who followed him from Galilee. Not his apostles (only elsewhere we find John by the cross, John xix. 26), their hearts failed them, they durst not appear. But here were a company of women, some would have called them silly women, that boldly stuck to Christ, when the rest of his disciples had basely deserted him. Even those of the weaker sex are often, by the grace of God, made strong in faith. There have been women martyrs, famous for courage and resolution in Christ's cause. Now of these women it is said, (1) That they had followed Jesus from Galilee, out of the great love they had to him. The males only were obliged to come up, to worship at the feast. Now having followed him such a long journey they resolved not to forsake him now. Our former services and sufferings for Christ should be an argument with us, faithfully to persevere to the end in our attendance on him. (2) That they ministered to him of their substance. How gladly would they have ministered to him now, if they might have been admitted! When we are restrained from doing what we would, we must do what we can, in the service of Christ. (3) Some of them are particularly named. They were such as we have several times met with before, and it was their praise, that we meet with them to the last.

2. What they did; they were beholding afar off.

(1) They stood afar off. It was an aggravation of the sufferings of Christ, that his lovers and friends stood aloof from his sore. Perhaps they might have come nearer, if they would; but good people, when they are in sufferings, must not think it strange, if some of their best friends be shy of them. If we be thus looked strangely upon, remember, our Master was so before us.

(2) They were there beholding; when they were debarred from doing any other office of love to him, they looked a look of love toward him. It was a sorrowful look. We may well imagine how it cut them to the heart, to see him in this torment. Let us with an eye of faith behold Christ and him crucified, and be affected with that great love wherewith he loved us. It was no more than a look; they beheld him, but they could not help him. When Christ was in his sufferings, the best of his friends were but spectators and lookers on.

Verses 57–66

We have here an account of Christ's burial. 1. The kindness and goodwill of his friends that laid him in the grave. 2. The malice and ill will of his enemies that were very solicitous to keep him there.

I. His friends gave him a decent burial.

1. Jesus Christ was buried; when his precious soul was gone to paradise, his blessed body was deposited in the chambers of the grave. He was buried, to make his death the more certain, and his resurrection the more illustrious. Pilate would not deliver his body to be buried, till he was well assured that he was really dead. He was buried, that he might take off the terror of the grave, and make it easy to us, might warm and perfume that cold noisome bed for us, and that we might be buried with him.

2. The particular circumstances of his burial here related.

(1) The time when he was buried; when the evening was come; the same evening that he died, before sunset, as is usual in burying malefactors. It was not deferred till the next day, because it was the sabbath.

(2) The person that took care of the funeral was Joseph of Arimathea. The apostles had all fled. The women that followed him durst not move in it; then did God stir up this good man to do it; for what work God has to do, he will find out instruments to do it. Joseph was a fit man, for, [1] He had wherewithal to do it, being a rich man. Most of Christ's disciples were poor men; but here was one that was a rich man, ready to be employed in a piece of service which required a man of estate. Worldly wealth in some services to be done for Christ is an advantage and an opportunity, and it is well for those who have it, if withal they have a heart to use it for God's glory. [2] He was well affected to our Lord Jesus, for he was himself his disciple, though he did not openly profess it. Christ has more secret disciples than we are aware of.

(3) The grant of the dead body procured from Pilate, v. 58. Joseph went to Pilate, the proper person to be applied to on this occasion. Pilate was willing to give the body to one that would inter it decently. In Joseph's petition, and Pilate's ready grant of it, honour was done to Christ, and a testimony borne to his integrity.

(4) The dressing of the body in its graveclothes (v. 59); though he was an honourable counsellor, yet he himself took the body, as it should seem, into his own arms, from the infamous and accursed tree (Acts xiii. 29); for where there is true love to Christ, no service will be thought too mean to stoop to for him. Having taken it, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth; for burying in linen was then the common usage. This common act of humanity, if done after a godly sort, may be made an acceptable piece of Christianity.

(5) The depositing of it in the sepulchre, v. 60. A private funeral did best befit him whose kingdom came not with observation. He was laid in a borrowed tomb, in Joseph's burying place; as he had not a house of his own, wherein to lay his head while he lived, so he had not a grave of his own, wherein to lay his body when he was dead. The grave is the peculiar heritage of a sinner. There is nothing we can truly call our own but our sins and our graves. When we go to the grave, we go to our own place; but our Lord Jesus, who had no sin of his own, had no grave of his own; dying under imputed sin, it was fit that he should be buried in a borrowed grave. He was laid in a new tomb, which Joseph, it is likely, designed for himself; it would, however, be never the worse for his lying in it, who was to rise so quickly, but a great deal the better for his lying in it, who has altered the property of the grave. It was a tomb hewn out of a rock. Christ's sepulchre should be in a solid entire rock, that no room might be left to suspect his disciples had access to it to steal the body; for there was no access to it but by the door, which was watched. A great stone was rolled to the door of his sepulchre; this also was according to the custom of the Jews in burying their dead, as appears by the description of the grave of Lazarus (John xi. 38). If the grave were his prison, now was the prison-door locked and bolted. The rolling of the stone to the grave's mouth, was with them as filling up the grave is with us, it completed the funeral. It is the most melancholy circumstance in the funerals of our Christian friends, when we have laid their bodies in the dark and silent grave to go home, and leave them behind; but alas, it is not we that go home, and leave them behind, no, it is they that are gone to the better home, and have left us behind.

(6) The company that attended the funeral; and that were very small and mean. Some good women that were true mourners—Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, v. 56. These, as they had attended him to the cross, so they followed him to the grave. True love to Christ will carry us through to the utmost, in following him. Death itself cannot quench that divine fire.

II. His enemies did what they could to prevent his resurrection; what they did herein was the next day that followed the day of the preparation, v. 62. That was the seventh day of the week, the Jewish sabbath. All that day, Christ lay dead in the grave. On that day, the chief priests and Pharisees, when they should have been at their devotions, asking pardon for the sins of the week past, were dealing with Pilate about securing the sepulchre.

(1) Their address to Pilate. They desire a guard may be set on the sepulchre.

[1] Their petition sets forth, that that deceiver had said, After three days I will rise again. He had said so, and his disciples remembered those very words for the confirmation of their faith, but his persecutors remember them for the provocation of their rage and malice. Thus the same word of Christ to the one was a savour of life unto life, to the other of death unto death.

[2] It further sets forth their jealousy; lest his disciples come by night, and steal him away, and say, He is risen.

First, That which really they were afraid of, was, his resurrection; that which is most Christ's honour and his people's joy, is most the terror of his enemies. So the chief priests and Pharisees laboured to defeat the predictions of Christ's resurrection; if he should rise, that would break all their measures. Christ's enemies, even when they have gained their point, are still in fear of losing it again. Perhaps the priests were surprised at the respect shown to Christ's dead body by Joseph and Nicodemus, two honourable counsellors, nor can they forget his raising Lazarus from the dead, which so confounded them.

Secondly, That which they took on them to be afraid of, was, lest his disciples should come by night, and steal him away, which was a very improbable thing. They had not the courage to own him while he lived, and it was not likely that his death should put courage into such cowards. What could they promise themselves by stealing away his body, and making people believe he was risen. What good would it do them, to carry on a cheat upon themselves, to steal away his body, and say, He is risen? The chief priests apprehend that if the doctrine of Christ's resurrection be once preached and believed, the last error will be worse than the first. Those that oppose Christ and his kingdom, will see not only their attempts baffled, but themselves miserably plunged and embarrassed, their errors each worse than other, and the last worst of all.

[3] In consideration hereof, they humbly move to have a guard set upon the sepulchre till the third day; Command that the sepulchre be made sure. One would think that death's prisoners needed no other guard, and that the grave were security enough to itself.

(2) Pilate's answer to this address (v. 65); Ye have a watch, make it sure, as sure as you can. He was ready to gratify Christ's friends, in allowing them the body, and his enemies, in setting a guard upon it, being desirous to please all sides, looking upon the hopes of one side and the fears of the other to be alike ridiculous. Ye have a watch; but, as if ashamed to be himself seen in such a thing, he leaves the management of it wholly to them. Methinks that word, Make it as sure as you can, looks like a banter, either, [1] Of their fears; "Be sure to set a strong guard upon the dead man"; or rather, [2] Of their hopes; "Do your worst, but if he be of God, he will rise, in spite of you and all your guards." Tertullian, speaking of Pilate, saith, In his conscience he was a Christian; and it is possible that he might be under such convictions, yet never be thoroughly persuaded, any more than Agrippa or Felix was, to be a Christian.

(3) The wonderful care they took, hereupon, to secure the sepulchre (v. 66); They sealed the stone. But not trusting too much to that, withal they set a watch, to keep his disciples from coming to steal him away. God brought this good out of it, that they who were set to oppose his resurrection, thereby had an opportunity to observe it, and did so, and told the chief priests what they observed. To guard the sepulchre against the poor weak disciples, was folly, because needless; but to think to guard it against the power of God was folly, because fruitless and to no purpose.

CHAP. XXVIII

In the foregoing chapters we saw the Captain of our salvation engaged with the powers of darkness; victory seemed to hover between the combatants; nay, at length, it inclined to the enemies' side, and our Champion fell before them. But then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep. The Prince of our peace is in this chapter rallying again, coming out of the grave, a Conqueror. Now the resurrection of Christ being one of the main foundations of our religion, it is requisite that we should have infallible proofs of it; four of which proofs we have in this chapter. Luke and John give a larger account of the proofs of Christ's resurrection than Matthew and Mark do. Here is, I. The testimony of the angel to Christ's resurrection, ver. 1–8. II. His appearance himself to the women, ver. 9, 10. III. The confession of the adversaries that were upon the guard, ver. 11–15. IV. Christ's appearance to the disciples in Galilee, and the commission he gave them, ver. 16–20.

Verses 1–10

For the proof of Christ's resurrection, we have here the testimony of the angel, and of Christ himself. Let us not prescribe to Infinite Wisdom, which ordered that the witnesses of his resurrection should see him risen, but not see him rise. His incarnation was a mystery; so was this second incarnation.

I. The coming of the good women to the sepulchre.

1. When they came; in the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, v. 1. This fixes the time of Christ's resurrection.

(1) He arose the third day after his death. He was buried in the evening of the sixth day of the week, and arose in the morning of the first day of the following week.

(2) He arose after the Jewish sabbath, and it was the passover-sabbath. Christ on the sixth day finished his work; he said, It is finished; on the seventh day he rested, and then on the first day of the next week did as it were begin a new world, and enter upon new work. The time of the saints' lying in the grave, is a sabbath to them for there they rest from their labours (Job iii. 17).

(3) He arose upon the first day of the week; on the first day of the first week God commanded the light to shine out of darkness; on this day therefore did he who was to be the Light of the world, shine out of the darkness of the grave. It arose again in the first-day sabbath, called the Lord's day (Rev. i. 10), and no other day of the week is from henceforward mentioned in all the New Testament than this. The sabbath was instituted in remembrance of the perfecting of the work of creation, Gen. ii. 1. Man by his revolt made a breach upon that perfect work, which was never perfectly repaired till Christ arose from the dead. He who on that day arose from the dead, is the same by whom, and for whom, all things were at first created, and now anew created.

(4) He arose as it began to dawn toward that day; as soon as it could be said that the third day was come, he arose. Christ arose when the day began to dawn, because then the day-spring from on high did again visit us, Luke i. 78. His passion began in the night; when he hung on the cross the sun was darkened; he was laid in the grave in the dusk of the evening; but he arose from the grave when the sun was near rising, for he is the bright and morning Star (Rev. xxii. 16), the true Light.

2. Who they were, that came to the sepulchre; Mary Magdalene and the other Mary, the same that attended the funeral, and sat over against the sepulchre, as before they sat over against the cross; still they studied to express their love to Christ. Their attendance on Christ not only to the grave, but in the grave, represents his like care for those that are his. As Christ in the grave was beloved of the saints, so the saints in the grave are beloved of Christ; for death and the grave cannot slacken that bond of love which is between them.

3. What they came to do: the other evangelists say that they came to anoint the body; Matthew saith that they came to see the sepulchre. They went, to show their goodwill in another visit to the dear remains of their beloved Master. Visits to the grave are of great use to Christians, especially visits to the grave of our Lord Jesus, where we may see sin buried out of sight, and the great proof of redeeming love shining illustriously even in that land of darkness.

II. The appearance of an angel of the Lord to them, v. 2–4. We have here an account of the manner of the resurrection of Christ.

1. There was a great earthquake. When he died, the earth that received him, shook for fear; now that he arose, the earth that resigned him, leaped for joy in his exaltation. It was the signal of Christ's victory. Those who are sanctified, and thereby raised to a spiritual life, while it is in the doing find an earthquake in their own bosoms, as Paul, who trembled and was astonished.

2. The angel of the Lord descended from heaven. The angels frequently attended our Lord Jesus, but upon the cross we find no angel attending him: when his Father forsook him, the angels withdrew from him; but now that he is resuming the glory, behold, the angels of God worship him.

3. He came, and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it. The stone of our sins was rolled to the door of the grave of our Lord Jesus, but to demonstrate that divine justice was satisfied, an angel was commissioned to roll back the stone. All the powers of death and darkness are under the control of the God of light and life. An angel from heaven has power to break the seal, though it were the great seal of Israel, and is able to roll away the stone, though ever so great. The angel's sitting upon the stone, when he had rolled it away, is very observable. There he sat, defying all the powers of hell to roll the stone to the grave again. The angel sat as a guard to the grave, having frightened away the enemies' black guard; he sat, expecting the women, and ready to give them an account of his resurrection.

4. That his countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow, v. 3. His look upon the keeper was like flashes of lightning. The whiteness of his raiment was an emblem, not only of purity, but of joy and triumph. When Christ died, the court of heaven went into deep mourning, signified by the darkening of the sun; but when he arose, they again put on the garments of praise. The glory of this angel represented the glory of Christ, to which he was now risen, for it is the same description that was given of him in his transfiguration (ch. xvii. 2); but when he conversed with his disciples after his resurrection, he drew a veil over it.

5. That for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men, v. 4. They were soldiers, that thought themselves hardened against fear, yet the very sight of an angel struck them with terror. The resurrection of Christ, as it is the joy of his friends, so it is the terror and confusion of his enemies. They did shake; the word is the same with that which was used for the earthquake, v. 2. When the earth shook, these children of the earth, that had their portion in it, shook too; whereas, those that have their happiness in things above, though the earth be removed, yet are without fear. They were posted here, to keep a dead man in his grave—as easy a piece of service surely as was ever assigned them, and yet it proves too hard for them.

III. The message which this angel delivered to the women, v. 5–7.

1. He encourages them against their fears, v. 5. To come near to graves and tombs, especially in silence and solitude, has something in it frightful, much more was it so to those women, to find an angel at the sepulchre; but he soon makes them easy with the word, Fear not ye. The keepers shook, and became as dead men, but, Fear not ye. "Let not the news I have to tell you, be any surprise to you; let it be no terror to you, for his resurrection will be your consolation. Fear not ye, for I know that ye seek Jesus. I do not come to frighten you, but to encourage you." Those that seek Jesus, have no reason to be afraid; for, if they seek him diligently they shall find him. Ye seek Jesus that was crucified. He mentions his being crucified, the more to commend their love to him; "You seek him still, though he was crucified." True believers love and seek Christ, not only though he was crucified, but because he was so.

2. He assures them of the resurrection of Christ; and there was enough in that to silence their fears, v. 6. To be told He is not here, would have been no welcome news to those who sought him, if it had not been added, He is risen. We must not hearken to those who say, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there, for he is not here, he is not there, he is risen. We must seek him as one risen. They that make pictures and images of Christ, forget that he is not here, he is risen; our communion with him must be spiritual, by faith in his word. We must seek him with great reverence and humility, and an awful regard to his glory, for he is risen. We must seek him with a heavenly mind; when we are ready to make this world our home, and to say, It is good to be here, let us remember our Lord Jesus is not here, he is risen, and therefore let not our hearts be here, but let them rise too.

Two things the angel refers these women to, for the confirmation of their faith.

(1) To his word now fulfilled, which they might remember; He is risen, as he said. "He said that he would rise, why should you be backward to believe that which he told you would be?" Let us never think that strange, of which the word of Christ has raised our expectations. If we remember what Christ hath said to us, we shall be the less surprised at what he does with us.

(2) To his grave now empty, which they might look into; "Come, see the place where the Lord lay. Compare what you have heard, with what you see, and, putting both together, you will believe." It may have a good influence upon us, to come, and with an eye of faith see the place where the Lord lay. When we look into the grave, where we expect we must lie, to take off the terror of it, let us look into the grave where the Lord lay; the place where our Lord lay.

3. He directs them to go carry the tidings of it to his disciples (v. 7); Go quickly, and tell his disciples. It was good to be here, but they have other work appointed them. They must not have the monopoly of it, must not hold their peace. They must go tell the disciples. Public usefulness to others must be preferred before the pleasure of secret communion with God ourselves.

(1) The disciples of Christ must first be told the news; not, Go, tell the chief priests and the Pharisees, that they may be confounded; but, Tell the disciples, that they may be comforted. God anticipates the joy of his friends more than the shame of his enemies. Tell his disciples; [1] That they may encourage themselves under their present sorrows and dispersions. It was a dismal time with them, between grief and fear; what a cordial would this be to them now, to hear, their Master is risen! [2] That they may enquire further into it themselves. This was to set them on seeking him, and to prepare them for his appearance to them. General hints excite to closer searches. They shall now hear of him, but shall very shortly see him.

(2) The women are sent to tell it to them. This was a recompence for their constant affectionate adherence to him, at the cross, and in the grave, and a rebuke to the disciples who forsook him. As the woman was first in the transgression, so these women were first in the belief of the redemption from transgression by Christ's resurrection.

(3) They were bid to go quickly upon this errand. Why, what haste was there? Would not the news keep cold, and be welcome to them at any time? Yes, but they were now overwhelmed with grief, and Christ would have this cordial hastened to them. We must always be ready and forward to do good to our brethren, and to carry comfort to them, now, quickly.

(4) They were directed to appoint the disciples to meet him in Galilee. Now this general rendezvous was appointed in Galilee, eighty or a hundred miles from Jerusalem; [1] In kindness to those of his disciples that remained in Galilee, and did not (perhaps they could not) come up to Jerusalem. Christ knows where his disciples dwell, and will visit there. Even to them that are at a distance from the plenty of the means of grace he will graciously manifest himself. [2] In consideration of the weakness of his disciples that were now at Jerusalem. who as yet were afraid of the Jews, and durst not appear publicly. Christ knows our fears, and considers our frame, and made his appointment where there was least danger of disturbance.

Lastly, The angel solemnly affirms upon his word the truth of what he had related to them; "Lo, I have told you, you may be assured of it." This angel was now sent to certify the resurrection of Christ to the disciples, and so leave it in their hands to be published to the world. "I have done my errand, I have faithfully delivered my message, I have told you." Those messengers from God, that discharge their trust faithfully, may take the comfort of that, whatever the success be.

IV. The women's departure from the sepulchre, to bring notice to the disciples, v. 8.

1. What frame and temper of spirit they were in; They departed with fear and great joy; a strange mixture, fear and joy at the same time, in the same soul. To hear that Christ was risen, was matter of joy; but to be led into his grave, and to see an angel, and talk with him about it, could not but cause fear. It was good news, but they were afraid that it was too good to be true. It is said of their joy, it was great joy; it is not said so of their fear. Holy fear has joy attending it. It is only perfect love and joy that will cast out all fear.

2. What haste they made; They did run. The fear and joy together quickened their pace, and added wings to their motion. Those that are sent on God's errand must not loiter, or lose time.

3. What errand they went upon; They ran, to bring his disciples word. They ran, to comfort them with the same comforts wherewith they themselves were comforted of God. The disciples of Christ should be forward to communicate to each other their experiences, should tell others what God has done for their souls, and spoken to them. Joy in Christ Jesus will betray itself.

V. Christ's appearing to the women, to confirm the testimony of the angel, v. 9, 10. These zealous good women, not only heard the first tidings of him, but had the first sight of him, after his resurrection. Jesus Christ is often better than his word, but never worse; often anticipates, but never frustrates, the believing expectations of his people.

1. Christ's surprising appearance to the women; As they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them. God's gracious visits usually meet us in the way of duty, and to those who use what they have for others' benefit, more shall be given. This interview with Christ was unexpected. Christ is nearer to his people than they imagine. Christ was nigh them, and still in the word is nigh us.

2. The salutation wherewith he accosted them; *All hail—*χαίρετε. We use the old English form of salutation, wishing all health to those we meet; for so All hail signifies. And it bespeaks, (1) The goodwill of Christ to us and our happiness. (2) The freedom and holy familiarity which he used in his fellowship with his disciples; for he called them friends. But the Greek word signifies, Rejoice ye. They were affected both with fear and joy; what he said to them tended to encourage their joy (v. 9), Rejoice ye, and to silence their fear (v. 10), Be not afraid. It is the will of Christ that his people should be a cheerful joyful people, and his resurrection furnishes them with abundant matter for joy.

3. The affectionate respect they paid him; They came, and held him by the feet, and worshipped him. Thus they expressed, (1) The reverence and honour they had for him. (2) The love and affection they had to him; they held him, and would not let him go. (3) The transport of joy they were in, now that they had this further assurance of his resurrection.

4. The encouraging words Christ said to them, v. 10. We do not find that they said anything to him, their affectionate embraces and adorations spoke plainly enough; and what he said to them was no more than what the angel had said (v. 5, 7). Now observe here,

(1) How he rebukes their fear; Be not afraid. The news, though strange, was both true and good. Christ arose from the dead, to silence his people's fears, and there is enough in that to silence them.

(2) How he repeats their message; "Go, tell my brethren, that they must prepare for a journey into Galilee, and there they shall see me." If there be any communion between our souls and Christ, it is he that appoints the meeting, and he will observe the appointment. But that which is especially observable here, is, that he calls his disciples his brethren. He never called them so till after his resurrection, here and John xx. 17. Christ did not now converse so constantly and familiarly with his disciples as he had done before his death; but he gives them this endearing title, Go to my brethren. They had shamefully deserted him in his sufferings; but he not only continues his purpose to meet them, but calls them brethren.

We have here the confession of the adversaries that were upon the guard; and there are two things which strengthen this testimony—that they were eye-witnesses—and that they were enemies, set there to oppose and obstruct his resurrection.

I. How this testimony was given in to the chief priests (v. 11). Some of the watch came into the city, and brought to those who employed them, the report of their disappointment. They showed to the chief priests all the things that were done; told them of the earthquake, the descent of the angel, the rolling of the stone away, and the coming of the body of Jesus alive out of the grave. So the utmost means of conviction were afforded them. It might justly have been expected that they should now have believed in Christ, but they were obstinate in their infidelity, and therefore sealed up under it.

II. How it was baffled and stifled by them. They called an assembly, and considered what was to be done. For their own parts, they were resolved not to believe that Jesus was risen; but their care was, to keep others from believing.

The result of their debate was, that those soldiers must by all means be bribed off, and hired not to tell tales. They put money into their hands. They gave large money unto the soldiers. These chief priests loved their money as well as most people did, and were as loth to part with it; and yet, to carry on a malicious design against the gospel of Christ, they were very prodigal of it. Here was large money given for the advancing of that which they knew to be a lie, yet many grudge a little money for the advancement of that which they know to be the truth. Let us never starve a good cause, when we see a bad one so liberally supported. They put a lie into their mouths (v. 13); Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept; a sorry shift is better than none, but this is a sorry one indeed. (1) The sham was ridiculous, and carried along with it its own confutation. If they slept, how could they know anything of the matter, or say who came? But had it been ever so plausible, (2) It was a wicked thing for these priests and elders to hire those soldiers to tell a deliberate lie.

But lest the soldiers should object the penalty they incurred by the Roman law for sleeping upon the guard, which was very severe (Acts xii. 19), they promised to interpose with the governor; "We will persuade him, and secure you." If really these soldiers had slept, and so suffered the disciples to steal him away, the priests and elders would certainly have been the forwardest to solicit the governor to punish them for their treachery; so that their care for the soldiers' safety plainly gives the lie to the story.

Well, thus was the plot laid; now what success had it?

[1] Those that were willing to deceive, took the money, and did as they were taught. They took the money; that was it they aimed at, and nothing else. Money is a bait for the blackest temptation; mercenary tongues will sell the truth for it.

The great argument to prove Christ to be the Son of God, is, his resurrection and none could have more convincing proofs of the truth of that than these soldiers had; they saw the angel descend from heaven, saw the stone rolled away, saw the body of Christ come out of the grave, and yet they were so far from being convinced by it themselves, that they were hired to belie him, and to hinder others from believing in him. The most sensible evidence will not convince men, without the concurring operation of the Holy Spirit.

[2] Those that were willing to be deceived, not only credited, but propagated, the story; This saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day. The sham took well enough, and answered the end. The Jews, when they were pressed with the argument of Christ's resurrection, had this still ready to reply, His disciples came, and stole him away. When once a lie is raised, none knows how far it will spread, nor how long it will last, nor what mischief it will do.

This evangelist passes over several other appearances of Christ, recorded by Luke and John, and hastens to this, which was of all other the most solemn, as being promised and appointed again and again before his death, and after his resurrection.

I. How the disciples attended his appearance, according to the appointment (v. 16); They went into Galilee, a long journey to go for one sight of Christ, but it was worth while.

1. Because he appointed them to do so. Though it seemed a needless thing to go into Galilee, yet they had learned to obey Christ's commands and not object against them. Those who would maintain communion with Christ, must attend him there where he has appointed.

2. Because that was to be a public and general meeting. The place was a mountain in Galilee, probably the same mountain on which he was transfigured. There they met, for privacy, and perhaps to signify the exalted state into which he was entered.

II. How they were affected with the appearance of Christ to them, v. 17. We are told,

1. That they worshipped him; many of them did so, nay, it should seem, they all did that, they gave divine honour to him. All that see the Lord Jesus with an eye of faith are obliged to worship him.

2. But some doubted. Even among those that worship there are some that doubt. The faith of those that are sincere, may yet be very weak and wavering. They hung in suspense, as the scales of the balance, when it is hard to say which preponderates. It tended much to the honour of Christ, that the disciples doubted before they believed; so that they cannot be said to be credulous, and willing to be imposed upon; for they first questioned, and proved all things, and then held fast that which was true, and which they found to be so.

III. What Jesus Christ said to them (v. 18-20); Jesus came, and spoke unto them. He did not stand at a distance, but came near, and gave them such convincing proofs of his resurrection, as turned the wavering scale, and made their faith to triumph over their doubts. He came, and spoke familiarly to them, as one friend speaks to another. Christ now delivered to his apostles the great charter of his kingdom in the world, was sending them out as his ambassadors, and here gives them their credentials.

In opening this great chapter, we may observe two things.

1. The commission which our Lord Jesus received himself from the Father. Being about to authorize his apostles, here he tells us, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Hereby he asserts his universal dominion as Mediator. He has all power. (1) Whence he hath this power. It was given him, by a grant from him who is the Fountain of all being, and consequently of all power. As God, equal with the Father, all power was originally and essentially his; but as Mediator, as God-man, all power was given him. He had this power given him over all flesh, that he might give eternal life to as many as were given him (John xvii. 2). This power he was now more signally invested in, upon his resurrection. (2) Where he has this power; in heaven and earth, comprehending the universe. He is Lord of all. He has all power in heaven. He has power of dominion over the angels. He has power of intercession with his Father, he intercedes not as a suppliant, but as a demandant; Father, I will. He has all power on earth too; he prevails with men, and deals with them as one having authority, by the ministry of reconciliation. All souls are his, and to him every heart and knee must bow, and every tongue confess him to be the Lord. This our Lord Jesus tells them to take off the offence of the cross; they had no reason to be ashamed of Christ crucified, when they saw him thus glorified.

2. The commission he gives to those whom he sent forth; Go ye therefore. This commission is given, (1) To the apostles primarily, the architects that laid the foundation of the church. It is not only a word of command, like that, Son, go work, but a word of encouragement, Go, and fear not, have I not sent you? They must go, and bring the gospel to their doors, Go ye. As an eagle stirs up her nest, flutters over her young, to excite them to fly (Deut. xxxii. 11), so Christ stirs up his disciples, to disperse themselves over all the world. (2) It is given to their successors, the ministers of the gospel, whose business it is to transmit the gospel from age to age, to the end of the world in time. Christ, at his ascension, gave not only apostles and prophets, but pastors and teachers, Eph. iv. 11. Now observe,

How far his commission is extended; to all nations. Go, and disciple all nations. Now this plainly signifies it to be the will of Christ, First, That the covenant of peculiarity, made with the Jews, should now be cancelled and disannulled. Whereas the apostles, when first sent out, were forbidden to go into the way of the Gentiles, now they were sent to all nations. Secondly, That salvation by Christ should be offered to all, and none excluded that did not by their unbelief and impenitence exclude themselves. The salvation they were to preach is a common salvation. Thirdly, That Christianity should be twisted in with national constitutions, that the kingdoms of the world should become Christ's kingdoms, and their kings the church's nursing-fathers.

What is the principal intention of this commission; to disciple all nations. "Admit them disciples; do your utmost to make the nations Christian nations"; Christ the Mediator is setting up a kingdom in the world, bring the nations to be his subjects; setting up a school, bring the nations to be his scholars; raising an army, enlist the nations of the earth under his banner. The work which the apostles had to do, was, to set up the Christian religion in all places, and it was honourable work; the achievements of the mighty heroes of the world were nothing to it. They conquered the nations for themselves, and made them miserable; the apostles conquered them for Christ, and made them happy.

Their instructions for executing this commission. First, They must admit disciples by the sacred rite of baptism; "Go into all nations, preach the gospel to them, work miracles among them, and persuade them to come in themselves, and bring their children with them, into the church of Christ, and then admit them and theirs into the church, by washing them with water." Secondly, This baptism must be administered in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. That is, 1. By authority from heaven, and not of man; for his ministers act by authority from the three persons in the Godhead. 2. Calling upon the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Everything is sanctified by prayer, and particularly the waters of baptism. But, 3. It is into the name (εἰς το ὀνομα) of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; this was intended as the summary of the first principles of the Christian religion. By our being baptized, we solemnly profess, (1) Our assent to the scripture-revelation concerning God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. (2) Our consent to a covenant-relation to God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Baptism is a sacrament, that is, it is an oath. It is an oath of abjuration, by which we renounce the world and the flesh, as rivals with God for the throne in our hearts; and an oath of allegiance, by which we resign and give up ourselves to God, to be his, body, soul, and spirit, to be governed by his will, and made happy in his favour; we become his men, so the form of homage in our law runs. [1] It is into the name of the Father, believing him to be the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our Father, as our Creator, Preserver, and Benefactor, to whom therefore we resign ourselves, to rule us, as free agents, by his law; and as our chief good, and highest end. [2] It is into the name of the Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God. In baptism we assent, as Peter did, Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God (ch. xvi. 16), and consent, as Thomas did, My Lord, and my God, John xx. 28. We take Christ to be our Prophet, Priest, and King, and give up ourselves to be taught, and saved, and ruled, by him. [3] It is into the name of the Holy Ghost. We give up ourselves to his conduct and operation, as our sanctifier, teacher, guide and comforter. Thirdly, Those that are thus baptized, and enrolled among the disciples of Christ, must be taught (v. 20); Teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever I have commanded you. This denotes two things. The duty of disciples, of all baptized Christians; they must observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded, and, in order to that, must submit to the teaching of those whom he sends. He enlists soldiers that he may train them up for his service.

All that are baptized, are thereby obliged, (1) To make the command of Christ their rule. We are by baptism bound, and must obey. (2) To observe what Christ has commanded. Due obedience to the commands of Christ requires a diligent observation. (3) To observe all things, that he has commanded, without exception; all the moral duties, and all the instituted ordinances. (4) To confine themselves to the commands of Christ, and as not to diminish from them, so not to add to them. (5) To learn their duty according to the law of Christ, from those whom he has appointed to be teachers in his school. The duty of the apostles of Christ, and his ministers; and that is, to teach the commands of Christ. They must teach them, and in the knowledge of them Christians must be trained up. The heirs of heaven, till they come to age, must be under tutors and governors. Here is the assurance he gives them of his spiritual presence with them in the execution of this commission; And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Observe,

(1) The favour promised them; I am with you. Not, I will be with you, but I am. He was now about to leave them; his bodily presence was now to be removed from them, and this grieved them; but he assures them of his spiritual presence, I am with you; that is, "My Spirit is with you, the Comforter shall abide with you, John xvi. 7. I am with you, and not against you: with you to take your part, to be on your side. I am with you, and not absent from you, not at a distance; I am a very present help," Ps. xlvi. 1. Christ was now sending them to set up his kingdom in the world. And then doth he seasonably promise them his presence with them, [1] To carry them on through the difficulties they were likely to meet with. "I am with you, to bear you up, to plead your cause; with you in all your services, in all your sufferings." [2] To succeed this great undertaking; "Lo, I am with you, to make your ministry effectual for the discipling of the nations." It was an unlikely thing that they should persuade people to become the disciples of a crucified Jesus; but lo, I am with you, and therefore you shall gain your point.

(2) The continuance of the favour, always, even unto the end of the world.

[1] They shall have his constant presence; always, πάσας τὰς ἡμέρας—all days, every day. "I will be with you on sabbath days and week days, fair days and foul days, winter days and summer days." Since his resurrection he had appeared to them now and then. But he assures them that they shall have his spiritual presence continued to them without intermission. The God of Israel, the Saviour, is sometimes a God that hideth himself (Isa. xlv. 15), but never a God that absenteth himself; sometimes in the dark, but never at a distance.

[2] They shall have his perpetual presence, even to the end of the world. This is hastening towards its period; and even till then the Christian religion shall, in one part of the world or other, he kept up, and the presence of Christ continued with his ministers. I am with you to the end of the world, First, With you and your writings. There is a divine power going along with the scriptures of the New Testament, not only preserving them in being, but producing strange effects by them, which will continue to the end of time. Secondly, With you and your successors; with all who thus baptize and thus teach. This is an encouraging word to all the faithful ministers of Christ, that what was said to the apostles, was said to them all, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.

Two solemn farewells we find our Lord Jesus giving to his church, and his parting word at both of them is very encouraging; one was here, "Lo, I am with you always; I leave you, and yet still I am with you"; the other was, "Surely, I come quickly. I leave you for awhile, but I will be with you again shortly," Rev. xxii. 20. By this it appears that he did not part in anger, but in love, and that it is his will we should keep up both our communion with him and our expectation of him.

There is one word more remaining, which must not be overlooked, and that is Amen; which is not a cipher, intended only for a concluding word, like finis at the end of a book. It bespeaks Christ's confirmation of this promise, Lo, I am with you. It is his Amen, in whom all the promises are Yea and Amen. It bespeaks the church's concurrence with it, in their desire, and prayer, and expectation. It is the evangelist's Amen—So be it, blessed Lord. Our Amen to Christ's promises turns them into prayers.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE GOSPEL

ACCORDING TO

ST. MARK

We have heard the evidence given in by the first witness to the doctrine and miracles of our Lord Jesus; and now here is another witness produced, who calls for our attention.

I. Concerning this witness. His name is Mark. Marcus was a Roman name, and a very common one, and yet we have no reason to think, but that he was by birth a Jew; but as Saul took the Roman name of Paul, so he of Mark. We read of John whose surname was Mark, sister's son to Barnabas, whom Paul was displeased with (Acts xv. 37, 38), but afterward had a great kindness for, and not only ordered the churches to receive him (Col. iv. 10), but sent for him to be his assistant, with this encomium, He is profitable to me for the ministry (2 Tim. iv. 11); and he reckons him among his fellow-labourers, Philem. 24. We read of Marcus whom Peter calls his son (1 Pet. v. 13); whether that was the same with the other is altogether uncertain. It is a tradition very current among the ancients, that St. Mark wrote this gospel under the direction of St. Peter, and that it was confirmed by his authority; so Hieron. Mark, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, being sent from Rome by the brethren, wrote a concise gospel; and Tertullian saith—Mark, the interpreter of Peter, delivered in writing the things which had been preached by Peter. It is true Mark was no apostle, yet we think that both he and Luke were of the number of the seventy disciples. St. Jerome saith that, after the writing of this gospel, he went into Egypt, and was the first that preached the gospel at Alexandria, where he founded a church, to which he was a great example of holy living.

II. Concerning this testimony. Mark's gospel, 1. Is but short, much shorter than Matthew's, not giving so full an account of Christ's sermons as that did, but insisting chiefly on his miracles. 2. It is very much a repetition of what we had in Matthew; many remarkable circumstances being added to the stories there related, but not many new matters. It was fit that such great things as these should be spoken and written, once, yea twice, because man is so unapt to perceive them, and so apt to forget them. Though it was written at Rome it was written in Greek, as was St. Paul's epistle to the Romans, the Greek being the more universal language.

CHAP. I

Mark's narrative does not take rise so early as those of Matthew and Luke do, but from John's baptism. I. The office of John Baptist illustrated by the prophecy of him (ver. 1–3), and by the history of him, ver. 4–8. II. Christ's baptism, and his being owned from heaven, ver. 9–11. III. His temptation, ver. 12, 13. IV. His preaching, ver. 14, 15, 21, 22, 38, 39. V. His calling disciples, ver. 16–20. VI. His praying, ver. 35. VII. His working miracles. 1. His rebuking an unclean spirit, ver. 23–28. 2. His curing Peter's mother-in-law, who was ill of a fever, ver. 29–31. 3. His healing all that came to him, ver. 32, 34. 4. His cleansing a leper, ver. 40–45.

Verses 1–8

I. What the New Testament is. It is the gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God, v. 1. 1. It is gospel. It is a good word, and well worthy of all acceptation; it brings us glad tidings. 2. It is the gospel of Jesus Christ. The foregoing gospel began with the generation of Jesus Christ—that was but preliminary, this comes immediately to the business—the gospel of Christ. 3. This Jesus is the Son of God. That truth is the foundation on which the gospel is built, and which it is written to demonstrate.

II. What the reference of the New Testament is to the Old. The gospel of Jesus Christ begins, and so we shall find it goes on, just as it is written in the prophets, v. 2. which was most proper and powerful for the conviction of the Jews, who believed the Old Testament prophets to be sent of God, but it is of use to us all, for the confirmation of our faith both in the Old Testament and in the New.

Quotations are here borrowed from two prophecies —that of Isaiah, and that of Malachi, both of whom spoke to the same purport concerning the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, in the ministry of John.

1. Malachi spoke very plainly (ch. iii. 1) concerning John Baptist. Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, v. 2. Christ himself had taken notice of this, and applied it to John (Matt. xi. 10), who was God's messenger, sent to prepare Christ's way.

2. Isaiah, the most evangelical of all the prophets, begins the evangelical part of his prophecy with this, which points to the beginning of the gospel of Christ, (Isa. xl. 3); The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, v. 3. Matthew had taken notice of this, and applied it to John, ch. iii. 3. Such is the corruption of the world, that there is something to do to make room for him. When God sent his Son into the world, he took care, and when he sends him into the heart, he takes care, effectual care, to prepare his way before him. The mistakes of the judgment are rectified, and the crooked ways of the affections; then way is made for Christ's comforts. It is in a wilderness, for such this world is, that Christ's way is prepared, and theirs that follow him, like that which Israel passed through to Canaan. They that are sent to prepare the way of the Lord, in such a vast howling wilderness as this is, have need to cry aloud.

III. What the beginning of the New Testament was. The gospel began in John Baptist. His baptism was the dawning of the gospel day.

1. In John's way of living there was the beginning of a gospel spirit; for it bespoke great self-denial, mortification of the flesh, a holy contempt of the world, and nonconformity to it. The more we sit loose to the body, and live above the world, the better we are prepared for Jesus Christ.

2. In John's preaching and baptizing there was the beginning of the gospel doctrines and ordinances. (1) He preached the remission of sins, which is the great gospel privilege. (2) He preached repentance, in order to it; he told people that there must be a renovation of their hearts and a reformation of their lives. (3) He preached Christ, and directed his hearers to expect him speedily to appear, and to expect great things from him. He preached, [1] The great pre-eminence Christ is advanced to; so high, so great, is Christ, that John thinks himself unworthy to be employed in the meanest office about him, even to stoop down, and untie his shoes. [2] The great power Christ is invested with; He comes after me in time, but he is mightier than I, for he is able to baptize with the Holy Ghost. [3] The great promise Christ makes in his gospel to those who have repented, and have had their sins forgiven them; They shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. And, lastly, All those who received his doctrine, and submitted to his institution, he baptized with water, as the manner of the Jews was to admit proselytes, in token of their cleansing themselves by repentance and reformation, and of God's cleansing them both by remission and by sanctification.

3. In the success of John's preaching, and the disciples he admitted by baptism, there was the beginning of a gospel church. He baptized in the wilderness, but there went out unto him all the land of Judæa, and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of him. They entered themselves his disciples, and bound themselves to his discipline; in token of which, they confessed their sins; he admitted them his disciples, in token of which, he baptized them. Many of these afterward became followers of Christ, and preachers of his gospel, and this grain of mustard-seed became a tree.

We have here a brief account of Christ's baptism and temptation.

I. His baptism, which was his first public appearance, after he had long lived obscurely in Nazareth.

1. See how humbly he owned God, by coming to be baptized of John. Though he was perfectly pure and unspotted, yet he was washed as if he had been polluted.

2. See how honourably God owned him, when he submitted to John's baptism.

(1) He saw the heavens opened; thus he was owned to be the Lord from heaven. Matthew saith, The heavens were opened to him. Mark saith, He saw them opened. Many have the heavens opened to receive them, but they do not see it.

(2) He saw the Spirit like a dove descending upon him. It is an ancient tradition, that a great light shone round the place.

(3) He heard a voice which was intended for his encouragement to proceed in his undertaking, and therefore it is here expressed as directed to him, Thou art my beloved Son. God is well pleased in him, and so well pleased in him, as to be well pleased with us in him.

II. His temptation. The good Spirit that descended upon him, led him into the wilderness, v. 12. Retirement from the world is an opportunity of more free converse with God, and therefore must sometimes be chosen. Mark observes this circumstance of his being in the wilderness—that he was with the wild beasts. It was an instance of his Father's care of him, that he was preserved from being torn in pieces by the wild beasts. Special protections are earnests of seasonable supplies. In that wilderness,

1. The evil spirits were busy with him; he was tempted of Satan. Christ himself was tempted, not only to teach us, that it is no sin to be tempted, but to direct us whither to go for succour when we are tempted, even to him that suffered, being tempted.

2. The good spirits were busy about him; the angels ministered to him. The ministration of the good angels about us, is matter of great comfort in reference to the malicious designs of the evil angels against us.

Verses 14–22

I. A general account of Christ's preaching in Galilee.

1. When Jesus began to preach in Galilee; After that John was put in prison. When he had finished his testimony, then Jesus began his.

2. What he preached; The gospel of the kingdom of God. Christ came to set up the kingdom of God among men, and he set it up by the preaching of his gospel, and a power going along with it.

(1) The great truths Christ preached; The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand. Christ gives them notice of it; "The time prefixed is now at hand; glorious discoveries of divine light, life, and love, are now to be made." God keeps time; when the time is fulfilled, the kingdom of God is at hand.

(2) The great duties inferred from thence. Christ gave them to understand the times, that they might know what Israel ought to do; they fondly expected the Messiah to appear in external pomp and power, and therefore thought, when that kingdom of God was at hand, they must prepare for war, and for victory. Christ tells them, in the prospect of that kingdom approaching, they must repent, and believe the gospel. By repentance we must lament and forsake our sins, and by faith we must receive the forgiveness of them. Both these must go together: we must not think either that reforming our lives will save us without trusting in the righteousness and grace of Christ, or that trusting in Christ will save us without the reformation of our hearts and lives. Christ hath joined these two together, and let no man think to put them asunder. Thus the preaching of the gospel began, and thus it continues; still the call is, Repent, and believe, and live a life of repentance and a life of faith.

II. Christ appearing as a teacher, here is next his calling of disciples, v. 16–20. Observe, 1. Christ will have followers. If he set up a school, he will have scholars; if he set up his standard, he will have soldiers; if he preach, he will have hearers. 2. The instruments Christ chose to employ in setting up his kingdom, were the weak and foolish things of the world; not called from the great sanhedrim, or the schools of the rabbin, but picked up from among the tarpaulins by the sea-side. 3. Though Christ needs not the help of man, yet he is pleased to make use of it in setting up his kingdom. 4. Christ puts honour upon those who are diligent in their business, and loving to one another; so those were, whom Christ called. He found them employed, and employed together. Industry and unity are good and pleasant, and there the Lord Jesus commands the blessing. 5. The business of ministers is to fish for souls, and win them to Christ. Ministers, in preaching the gospel, cast the net into the waters, Matt. xiii. 47. Some are enclosed and brought to shore, but far the greater number escape. If many a draught brings home nothing, yet they must go on. 6. Those whom Christ calls, must leave all, to follow him; and by his grace he inclines them to do so. We must sit loose to the world, and forsake everything that is inconsistent with our duty to Christ. Mark takes notice of James and John, that they left not only their father (which we had in Matthew), but the hired servants, being their fellow-labourers and pleasant comrades; not only relations, but companions, must be left for Christ, and old acquaintance.

III. Here is a particular account of his preaching in Capernaum. 1. When Christ came into Capernaum, he straightaway applied himself to his work there, and took the first opportunity of preaching the gospel. Those will think themselves concerned not to lose time, who consider what a deal of work they have to do, and what a little time to do it in. 2. Christ religiously observed the sabbath day. 3. Sabbaths are to be sanctified in religious assemblies, if we have opportunity; it is a holy day. 4. In religious assemblies on sabbath-days, the gospel is to be preached. 5. Christ was a non-such preacher; he did not preach as the scribes, who expounded the law of Moses by rote; it came not from the heart, and therefore came not with authority. But Christ taught as one that had authority.

Verses 23–28

As soon as Christ began to preach, he began to work miracles for the confirmation of his doctrine.

I. Christ's casting the devil out of a man that was possessed, in the synagogue at Capernaum. There was in the synagogue a man with an unclean spirit, εν πνευματι ακαθαρτῳ—in an unclean spirit; for the spirit had the man in his possession, and led him captive at his will. This man was in the synagogue; he did not come either to be taught or to be healed.

1. The rage which the unclean spirit expressed at Christ; He cried out, as one in an agony, at the presence of Christ. We are told what he said, v. 24, where he doth not make terms, but speaks as one that knew his doom. (1) He calls him Jesus of Nazareth; for aught that appears, he was the first that called him so. (2) Yet a confession is extorted from him—that he is the holy One of God. Those who have only a notion of Christ, and have no faith in him, or love to him, go no further than the devil doth. (3) He in effect acknowledgeth that he could not stand before the power of Christ; "Let us alone; for if thou take us to task, we are undone, thou canst destroy us." (4) He desires to have nothing to do with Jesus Christ; for he despairs of being saved by him, and dreads being destroyed by him.

2. The victory which Jesus Christ obtained over the unclean spirit. It is in vain for Satan to beg and pray, Let us alone; his power must be broken, and the poor man must be relieved. (1) Jesus commands. As he taught, so he healed, with authority. Jesus rebuked him; Hold thy peace; φιμώθητι—be muzzled. Christ has a muzzle for that unclean spirit when he fawns as well as when he barks. But this is not all, he must not only hold his peace, but he must come out of the man. (2) The unclean spirit yields, for there is no remedy (v. 26); He tore him, put him into a strong convulsion. When he would not touch Christ, in fury at him he grievously disturbed this poor creature. Thus, when Christ by his grace delivers poor souls out of the hands of Satan, it is not without a grievous toss and tumult in the soul. He cried with a loud voice, to frighten the spectators, and make himself seem terrible.

II. The impression which this miracle made upon the minds of the people, v. 27, 28.

1. It astonished them that saw it; They were all amazed. This was surprising to them, and put them upon considering with themselves, and enquiring of one another, "What is this new doctrine? For it must certainly be of God, which is thus confirmed." The Jewish exorcists pretended by charm or invocation to drive away evil spirits; but this was quite another thing, with authority he commands them. Surely it is our interest to make him our Friend, who has the control of infernal spirits.

2. It raised his reputation among all that heard it; Immediately his fame spread abroad into the whole adjacent region of Galilee. The story was presently got into everyone's mouth, together with the remark made upon it, What new doctrine is this? So that it was universally concluded, that he was a Teacher come from God. Thus he prepared his own way, now that John, who was his harbinger, was clapped up.

Verses 29–39

In these verses, we have,

I. A particular account of one miracle that Christ wrought, in the cure of Peter's wife's mother.

1. When Christ had done that which spread his fame throughout all parts, he did not then sit still, as some think that they may lie in bed when their name is up. No, he continued to do good. Those who are in reputation, had need be busy and careful to keep it up.

2. When he came out of the synagogue, where he had taught and healed with a divine authority, yet he conversed familiarly with the poor fishermen that attended him.

3. He went into Peter's house, probably invited thither to such entertainment as a poor fisherman could give him, and he accepted of it.

4. He cured his mother-in-law, who was sick. Wherever Christ comes, he comes to do good, and will be sure to pay richly for his entertainment. The same hand that healed her, strengthened her, so that she was able to minister to them; the cure is in order to that, to fit for action.

II. A general account of many cures he wrought—diseases healed, devils expelled. It was on the evening of the sabbath, when the sun did set, or was set; perhaps many scrupled bringing their sick to him, till the sabbath was over.

1. How numerous the patients were; All the city was gathered at the door, as beggars for a dole. That one cure in the synagogue occasioned this crowding after him. Others speeding well with Christ should quicken us in our enquiries after him. Christ was flocked after in a private house, as well as in the synagogue; wherever he is, there let his servants, his patients, be.

2. How powerful the Physician was; he healed all that were brought to him, though ever so many. Nor was it some one particular disease, that Christ set up for the cure of, but he healed those that were sick of divers diseases. And that miracle particularly which he wrought in the synagogue, he repeated in the house at night; for he cast out many devils, and suffered not the devils to speak.

III. His retirement to his private devotion (v. 35); He prayed, prayed alone; to set us an example of secret prayer. Though as God he was prayed to, as man he prayed. He found time to be alone with his Father.

1. The time when Christ prayed. (1) It was in the morning, the morning after the sabbath day. We must go to the throne of grace, every day in the week. This morning was the morning of the first day of the week, which afterward he sanctified, and made remarkable, by another sort of rising early. (2) It was early, a great while before day. When others were asleep in their beds, he was praying. When our spirits are most fresh and lively, then we should take time for devout exercises.

2. The place where he prayed; He departed into a solitary place. Secret prayer must be made secretly. Those that have the most business in public, and of the best kind, must sometimes be alone with God.

IV. His return to his public work. The disciples thought they were up early, but found their Master was up before them, followed him to his solitary place, and there found him at prayer, v. 36, 37. They told him that he was much wanted, All men seek for thee. They were proud that their Master was become so popular already, and would have him appear in public, yet more in that place, because it was their own city. "No," saith Christ, "Let us go into the next towns, the villages, that I may preach there also, for therefore came I forth, to go about doing good." He preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee, and, to illustrate and confirm his doctrine, he cast out devils.

We have here the story of Christ's cleansing a leper. It teaches us,

1. How to apply ourselves to Christ; come as this leper did, (1) With great humility; this leper came beseeching him, and kneeling down to him (v. 40); it teaches us that those who would receive grace and mercy from Christ, must approach to him with humility and reverence. (2) With a firm belief of his power; Thou canst make me clean. He believes it with application, not only in general, Thou canst do everything (as John xi. 22), but, Thou canst make me clean. What we believe of the power of Christ we must bring home to our particular case; Thou canst do this for me. (3) With submission to the will of Christ; Lord, if thou wilt. With the modesty that became a poor petitioner, he refers his own particular case to him.

2. What to expect from Christ; that according to our faith it shall be to us. His address is not in the form of prayer, yet Christ answered it as a request. (1) Christ was moved with compassion. This is added here, in Mark, to show that Christ's power is employed by his pity for the relief of poor souls. Our misery makes us the objects of his mercy. And what he does for us he does with all possible tenderness. (2) He put forth his hand, and touched him. In healing souls, Christ toucheth them. Christ toucheth and healeth too. (3) He said, I will, be thou clean. The poor leper put an if upon the will of Christ; If thou wilt; but that doubt is soon put out of doubt; I will. Christ most readily wills favours to those that most readily refer themselves to his will. He was confident of Christ's power; Thou canst make me clean; and Christ will show how much his power is drawn out into act by the faith of his people, Be thou clean. And power accompanied this word, and the cure was perfect in an instant; Immediately his leprosy vanished, and there remained no more sign of it, v. 42.

3. What to do when we have received mercy from Christ. We must with his favours receive his commands. When Christ had cured him, he strictly charged him. I am apt to think that this refers not to the directions he gave him to conceal it (v. 44), for those are mentioned by themselves; but that this was such a charge as he gave to the impotent man whom he cured, John v. 14, Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. He also appointed him, (1) To show himself to the priest. (2) Till he had done that, not to say anything of it to any man. He must not proclaim it, because that would much increase the crowd that followed Christ, which he thought was too great already; not as if he were unwilling to do good to all, to as many as came; but he would do it with as little noise as might be. What to think of the leper's publishing it, and blazing it abroad, I know not. The leper ought to have observed his orders; yet, no doubt, it was with a good design that he proclaimed the cure, and it had no other ill effect than that it increased the multitudes which followed Christ, to that degree, that he could no more openly enter into the city, which obliged him to go into desert places. This shows how expedient it was for us, that Christ should go away, for his bodily presence could be but in one place at a time. By his spiritual presence he is with his people wherever they are, and comes to them to every quarter.

CHAP. II

I. Christ's healing a man that was sick of a palsy, ver. 1–12. II. His calling of Matthew from the receipt of custom, and his eating with publicans and sinners, ver. 13–17. III. His justifying his disciples in not fasting so much as those of the Pharisees did, ver. 18–22. IV. His justifying them in plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath day, ver. 23–38.

Christ having been for some time preaching about in the country, here returns to Capernaum, his headquarters.

I. The great resort there was to him. Though he was in the house yet people came to him as soon as it was noised that he was in town. Straightway many were gathered together to him. Where the king is, there is the court. There was no room to receive them, they were so numerous, no not so much as about the door. A blessed sight, to see people thus flying like a cloud to Christ's house.

II. The good entertainment Christ gave them; he preached the word unto them, v. 2. Many of them perhaps came only for cures, and many perhaps only for curiosity, to get a sight of him; but when he had them together he preached to them. He thought it not at all amiss to preach in a house, on a week day; though some might reckon it both an improper place and an improper time.

III. The presenting of a poor cripple to him, to be helped by him. The patient was one sick of the palsy, but perfectly disabled, so that he was borne of four, was carried upon a bed, as if he had been upon a bier. It was his misery, that he needed to be so carried, it was their charity, who did so carry him. These kind relations or neighbours thought, if they could but carry this poor man once to Christ, they should not need to carry him any more; and therefore made hard shift to get him to him, they uncovered the roof where he was, v. 4. It had no upper room, but the ground-floor was open to the roof: and these petitioners for the poor paralytic, when they could not get through the crowd at the door, got their friend by some means or other to the roof of the house, took off some of the tiles, and so let him down upon his bed with cords into the house where Christ was preaching. This bespoke both their faith and their fervency. Hereby it appeared that they were in earnest, and would not go away, nor let Christ go without a blessing, Gen. xxxii. 26.

IV. The kind word Christ said to this poor patient; He saw their faith; theirs that brought him. He commended their faith, because they did bring their friend through so much difficulty. True faith and strong faith may work variously, conquering sometimes the objections of reason, sometimes those of sense; but, however manifested, it shall be accepted and approved by Jesus Christ. Christ said, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee. The compellation is very tender—Son. Christ owns true believers as his sons: a son, and yet sick of the palsy. The cordial is very rich; Thy sins are forgiven thee. The word of Christ was to take his thoughts off from the disease, which was the effect, and to lead them to the sin, the cause, that he might be more concerned about that, to get that pardoned. Recovery from sickness is then a mercy indeed, when way is made for it by the pardon of sin. The way to remove the effect, is, to take away the cause. Pardon of sin strikes at the root of all diseases, and either cures them, or alters their property.

V. The cavil of the scribes at that which Christ said. They were expositors of the law, and their doctrine was true. But their application was false. It is true, None can forgive sins but God only; but it is false that therefore Christ cannot. But Christ perceived in his spirit that they so reasoned within them- selves; this proves him to be God. God's royalties are inseparable, and he that could know thoughts, could forgive sins. Now he proves his power to forgive sin, by demonstrating his power to cure the man sick of the palsy, v. 9–11. He would not have pretended to do the one, if he could not have done the other; that ye may know that the Son of man has power on earth to forgive sin, Thou that art sick of the palsy, arise, take up thy bed. He could not have cured the disease, which was the effect, if he could not have taken away the sin, which was the cause. He that could by a word accomplish the sign, could doubtless perform the thing signified. It was proper enough to appeal, whether it is easier to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, or to say, Arise, and walk? The removing of the punishment as such, was the remitting of the sin; he that could go so far in the cure, no doubt could perfect it.

VI. The cure of the sick man, and the impression it made upon the people, v. 12. He not only arose out of his bed, perfectly well, but he took up his bed and went forth before them all; and they were all amazed, and glorified God saying, "We never saw it on this fashion." Christ's works were without precedent. When we see what he does in healing souls, we must own that we never saw the like.

I. Christ preaching by the sea-side (v. 13), whither he went for room. Upon the strand there might come as many as would. It should seem by this, that our Lord Jesus had a strong voice, and could and did speak loud.

II. His calling Levi; the same with Matthew, who had a place in the custom-house at Capernaum, from which he was denominated a publican; his place fixed him by the waterside, and thither Christ went to meet with him. It is probable that Matthew was but a loose extravagant young man, or else, being a Jew, he would never have been a publican. Christ called him to follow him. With God, through Christ, there is mercy to pardon the greatest sins, and grace to sanctify the greatest sinners. Matthew, that had been a publican, became an evangelist. Great sin and scandal before conversion, are no bar to great gifts, graces, and advancements, after; nay, God may be the more glorified. In bodily cures, ordinarily, he was sought unto, but in these spiritual cures, he was found of them that sought him not. For this is the great evil and peril of the disease of sin, that those who are under it, desire not to be made whole.

III. His familiar converse with publicans and sinners, v. 15. We are here told, 1. That Christ sat at meat in Levi's house, who invited him and his disciples to the farewell feast he made to his friends, when he left all to attend on Christ. 2. That many publicans and sinners sat with Christ in Levi's house, and they followed him. They followed Levi; so some understand it. I rather take it, that they followed Jesus because of the report they had heard of him. They did not for conscience-sake leave all to follow him, but for curiosity-sake they came to Levi's feast, to see him. The publicans are here and elsewhere ranked with sinners, the worst of sinners. (1) Because commonly they were such; so general were the corruptions in the execution of that office, oppressing, exacting, and taking bribes or fees to extortion, and accusing falsely. (2) Because the Jews had a particular antipathy to them and their office, as an affront to the liberty of their nation, and thought it scandalous to be seen in their company. Such as these our blessed Lord was pleased to converse with, when he appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh.

IV. The offence which the scribes and Pharisees took at this, v. 16. They would not come to hear him preach, which they might have been convinced and edified by; but they would come themselves to see him sit with publicans and sinners, which they would be provoked by. They endeavoured to put the disciples out of conceit with their Master, and therefore put the question to them. How is it, that he eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners?

V. Christ's justification of himself in it, v. 17. He stood to what he did, and would not withdraw. Those are too tender of their own good name, who, to preserve it with some nice people, will decline a good work. Christ would not do so. They thought the publicans were to be hated. "No," saith Christ, "they are to be pitied, they are sick and need a physician; they are sinners, and need a Saviour." They thought Christ's character should separate him from them; "No," saith Christ, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. It is to a sinful world that I am sent, and therefore my business lies most with those that are the greatest sinners in it." Or thus; "I am not come to call the righteous, the proud Pharisees that think themselves righteous, but poor publicans, that own themselves to be sinners, and are glad to be invited and encouraged to repent." It is good dealing with those that there is hope of.

Here he is put to justify his disciples; and in what they do according to his will he will justify them, and bear them out.

I. He justifies them in their not fasting. Why do the Pharisees and the disciples of John fast? They used to fast, the Pharisees fasted twice in the week (Luke xviii. 12), and probably the disciples of John did so too. Thus apt are strict professors to make their own practice a standard, and to censure and condemn all that do not fully come up to it. They invidiously suggest that if Christ went among sinners to do them good, yet the disciples went to indulge their appetites, for they never knew what it was to fast. Ill-will always suspects the worst.

Two things Christ pleads in excuse of his disciples not fasting.

1. That these were easy days with them, and fasting was not so seasonable now as it would be hereafter, v. 19, 20. There is a time for all things.

2. That these were early days with them, and they were not so able for the severe exercises of religion as hereafter they would be. The Pharisees had long accustomed themselves to such austerities; and John Baptist himself came neither eating nor drinking. But it was not so with Christ's disciples; their Master came eating and drinking, and had not bred them up to the difficult services of religion as yet. To put them upon such frequent fasting at first, would be a discouragement to them, it would be of as ill consequence as putting new wine into old casks, or sewing new cloth to that which is worn thin and threadbare, v. 21, 22. God graciously considers the frame of young Christians, that are weak and tender, and so must we; nor must we expect more than the work of the day in its day, and that day according to the strength. Weak Christians must take heed of over-tasking themselves, and of making the yoke of Christ otherwise than it is, easy, and sweet, and pleasant.

II. He justifies them in plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath day, which, I will warrant you, a disciple of the Pharisees would not dare to have done; for it was contrary to an express tradition of their elders. They reflect upon the discipline of Christ's school, as too easy, so common it is for those who deny the power of godliness, to be jealous for the form, and censorious of those who affect not their form.

Observe, 1. What a poor breakfast Christ's disciples had on a sabbath-day morning, when they were going to church (v. 23); they plucked the ears of corn, and that was the best they had. They were so intent upon spiritual dainties, that they forget even their necessary food.

2. How even this was grudged them by the Pharisees, upon supposition that it was not lawful to pluck the ears of corn on the sabbath day, that that was as much a servile work as reaping (v. 24); Why do they on the sabbath day that which is not lawful? If Christ's disciples do that which is unlawful, Christ will be reflected upon. It is observable, that when the Pharisees thought Christ did amiss, they told the disciples (v. 16); and now when they thought the disciples did amiss, they spoke to Christ.

3. How Christ defended them.

(1) By example. They had a good precedent for it in David's eating the showbread (v. 25, 26); Have ye never read? Ritual observances must give way to moral obligations; and that may be done in a case of necessity, which otherwise may not be done.

(2) By argument. To reconcile them to the disciples' plucking the ears of corn, let them consider whom the sabbath was made for (v. 27); it was made for man, and not man for the sabbath. The sabbath is a sacred and divine institution; but we must receive and embrace it as a privilege and a benefit, not as a task and a drudgery. God never designed it to be an imposition upon us, and therefore we must not make it so to ourselves. Man was made for God, and for his honour and service, but he was not made for the sabbath. God did design it to be an advantage to us. He made it for man. He had some regard to our bodies in the institution, that they might rest, and not be tired out with the constant business of this world. He had much more regard to our souls. The sabbath was made a day of rest, only in order to its being a day of holy work, a day of communion with God, a day of praise and thanksgiving; and the rest from worldly business is therefore necessary, that we may closely apply ourselves to this work. See here, [1] What a good Master we serve, all whose institutions are for our own benefit. It is not he, but we, that are gainers by our service. [2] What we should aim at in our sabbath work. If the sabbath was made for man, we should then ask ourselves at night, "What am I the better for this sabbath day?" [3] What care we ought to take not to make those exercises of religion burthens to ourselves or others, which God ordained to be blessings. Consider whom the sabbath was made by (v. 28); "The Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath." The sabbath days are days of the Son of man; he is the Lord of the day, and to his honour it must be observed. The shifting of it one day forward to the first day of the week, was to be in remembrance of his resurrection, and therefore the Christian sabbath was to be called the Lord's day.

CHAP. III

I. Christ's healing a man that had a withered hand, on the sabbath day, ver. 1–6. II. The universal resort of people to him from all parts, to be healed, ver. 7–12. III. His ordaining his twelve apostles, ver. 13–21. IV. His answer to the scribes, who imputed his power to cast out devils to a confederacy with the prince of the devils, ver. 22–30. V. His owning his disciples for his nearest and dearest relations, ver. 31–35.

Verses 1–12

Here, as before, we have our Lord Jesus busy at work in the synagogue first, and then by the seaside; to teach us that his presence should not be confined either to the one or to the other, but, wherever any are gathered together in his name there is he in the midst of them.

I. When he entered again into the synagogue, he improved the opportunity he had there, of doing good.

1. The patient's case was piteous; he had a withered hand, by which he was disabled to work for his living; let those be helped that cannot help themselves.

2. The spectators were very unkind, both to the patient and to the Physician; instead of interceding for a poor neighbour, they did what they could to hinder his cure: for they intimated that if Christ cured him now on the sabbath day, they would accuse him as a Sabbath breaker.

3. Christ dealt very fairly with the spectators, and dealt with them first, if possible to prevent the offence.

(1) He laboured to convince their judgment. He bade the man stand forth (v. 3), that by the sight of him they might be moved with compassion. And then he appeals to their own consciences; "Is it lawful to do good on the sabbath days, or to do evil? Whether is better to save life or to kill?" What fairer question could be put? And yet, because they saw it would turn against them, they held their peace.

(2) When they rebelled against the light, he lamented their stubbornness (v. 5); He looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts. The sin he had an eye to, was, the hardness of their hearts. We hear what is said amiss, and see what is done amiss; but Christ looks at the root of bitterness in the heart, the blindness and hardness of that. [1] How he was provoked by the sin; he looked round upon them; and he looked with anger; his anger, it is probable, appeared in his countenance. The sin of sinners is very displeasing to Jesus Christ; and the way to be angry, and not to sin, is to be angry, as Christ was, at nothing but sin. [2] How he pitied the sinners; he was grieved for the hardness of their hearts. It is a great grief to our Lord Jesus, to see sinners bent upon their own ruin, for he would not that any should perish. This is a good reason why the hardness of our own hearts and of the hearts of others, should be a grief to us.

4. Christ dealt very kindly with the patient; he bade him stretch forth his hand, and it was immediately restored. Christ has hereby taught us to go on with resolution in the way of our duty, how violent soever the opposition is, that we meet with in it. We must not deny ourselves the satisfaction of serving God, and doing good, though offence may unjustly be taken at it. None could be more tender of giving offence than Christ; yet, rather than send this poor man away uncured, he would venture offending all the scribes and Pharisees that compassed him about. He hath hereby given us a specimen of the cures wrought by his grace upon poor souls; our hands are spiritually withered, the powers of our souls weakened by sin. Though our hands are withered, and we cannot of ourselves stretch them forth, we must attempt it, must, as well as we can, lift them up to God in prayer, lay hold on Christ and eternal life, and employ them in good works; and if we do our endeavour, power goes along with the word of Christ, he effects the cure. If we will not offer to stretch them out, it is our own fault that we are not healed.

5. The enemies of Christ dealt very barbarously with him. Such a work of mercy should have engaged their love to him, and such a work of wonder their faith in him. But, instead of that, the Pharisees and the Herodians, took counsel together against him, how they might destroy him.

II. When he withdrew to the sea, he did good there. He quitted the place; to teach us in troublous times to shift for our own safety.

1. How he was followed into his retirement. When some had such an enmity to him, that they drove him out of their country, others had such a value for him, that they followed him wherever he went. Great multitudes followed him from all parts of the nation. (1) What induced them to follow him; it was the report they heard of the great things he did. Some wished to see one that had done such great things, and others hoped he would do great things for them. The consideration of the great things Christ has done, should engage us to come to him. (2) What they followed him for (v. 10); They pressed upon him, to touch him, as many as had plagues. Diseases are here called plagues, corrections, chastisements. Those that were under these scourgings came to Jesus; this is the errand on which sickness is sent, to quicken us to enquire after Christ, and apply ourselves to him as our Physician. They pressed upon him, each striving which should get nearest to him, and which should be first served. They desired leave but to touch him, having faith to be healed, not only by his touching them, but by their touching him. (3) What provision he made to be ready to attend them (v. 9); He spoke to his disciples, that a small ship should wait on him, to carry him from place to place on the same coast; without pressing through the crowds of people that followed him for curiosity. Wise men, as much as they can, decline a crowd.

2. What abundance of good he did in his retirement. He did not withdraw to be idle, nor did he send back those who rudely crowded after him when he withdrew, but took it kindly, and gave them what they came for; for he never said to any that sought him diligently, Seek ye me in vain. (1) Diseases were effectually cured. He healed many. (2) Devils were effectually conquered; those whom unclean spirits had got possession of, when they saw him, trembled at his presence, and they also fell down before him, not to supplicate his favour, but to deprecate his wrath. (3) Christ sought not applause to himself in doing those great things, for he strictly charged those for whom he did them, that they should not make him known (v. 12); that they should not be industrious to spread the notice of his cures, as it were by advertisements in the newspapers, but let them leave his own works to praise him, and let the report of them diffuse itself, and make its own way. Let the standers-by carry away the intelligence of it.

I. The choice Christ made of the twelve apostles to be his constant followers and attendants.

1. The introduction to this call or promotion of disciples; He goes up into a mountain, and his errand thither was to pray.

2. The rule he went by in his choice, and that was his own good pleasure; He called unto him whom he would. Not such as we should have thought fittest to be called; but such as he thought fit to call, and determined to make fit for the service to which he called them. Christ calls whom he will.

3. The efficacy of the call; He called them to separate themselves from the crowd, and stand by him, and they came unto him. Those whom it was his will to call, he made willing to come.

4. The end and intention of this call; He ordained them that they should be with him constantly, to be witnesses of his doctrine, manner of life, and patience, that they might fully know it; they must be with him, to receive instructions from him, that they might be qualified to give instructions to others. It would require time to fit them for that which he designed them for. Christ's ministers must be much with him.

5. The power he gave them to work miracles. He ordained them to heal sicknesses and to cast out devils. This showed that the power which Christ has to work these miracles was an original power; that he had it not as a Servant, but as a Son in his own house. Our Lord Jesus had life in himself, and the Spirit without measure; for he could give this power even to the weak and foolish things of the world.

6. Their number and names; He ordained twelve, according to the number of the twelve tribes of Israel. They are here named not just in the same order as they were in Matthew, but as there, so here, Peter is put first and Judas last. Here Matthew is put before Thomas; but in that catalogue which Matthew himself drew up, he puts himself after Thomas. But that which Mark only takes notice of in this list of the apostles, is, that Christ called James and John Boanerges, which is, The sons of thunder; perhaps they were remarkable for a loud commanding voice, they were thundering preachers; or, rather, it denotes the zeal and fervency of their spirits. Yet John, one of those sons of thunder, was full of love and tenderness, as appears by his epistles, and was the beloved disciple.

7. Their retirement with their Master, and close adherence to him; They went into a house. Now that this jury was impanelled, they stood together, to hearken to their evidence.

II. The continual crowds that attended Christ's motions (v. 20); The multitude cometh together again, unsent for, and unseasonably pressing upon him, so that he and his disciples could not get time so much as to eat bread. Yet he did not shut his doors against the petitioners, but bade them welcome. They whose hearts are enlarged in the work of God, can easily bear with great inconveniences to themselves, in the prosecution of it. It is happy when zealous hearers and zealous preachers thus meet, and encourage one another. This was a gale of opportunity worth improving. It is good striking while the iron is hot.

III. The care of his relations concerning him (v. 21); When his friends in Capernaum heard how he was followed they went out, to lay hold on him, and fetch him home, for they said, He is beside himself. 1. Some understand it of an absurd preposterous care, which had more in it of reproach to him than of respect; and so we must take it as we read it, He is beside himself. His kindred were willing to hearken to this ill construction which some put upon his great zeal, and to conclude him crazed in his intellects. 2. Others understand it of a well-meaning care; and then they read ἐξέστη—"He fainteth, he has no time to eat bread, and therefore his strength will fail him; he will be stifled with the crowd of people. Therefore let us use a friendly violence with him, and get him a little breathing-time." They who go on with vigour and zeal in the work of God, must expect to meet with hindrances, both from the groundless disaffection of their enemies, and the mistaken affections of their friends.

Verses 22–30

Here is, I. The impudent impious brand which the scribes fastened upon Christ's casting out devils. These scribes came down from Jerusalem, v. 22. It should seem they came this long journey on purpose to hinder the progress of the doctrine of Christ. Coming from Jerusalem, where were the most polite and learned scribes, they were in the greater capacity to do mischief; the reputation of scribes from Jerusalem would have an influence not only upon the country people, but upon the country scribes. They could not deny but that he cast out devils, but they insinuated that he had Beelzebub on his side, and by the prince of the devils cast out devils. There is a trick in the case; Satan is not cast out, he only goes out by consent.

II. The rational answer which Christ gave to this objection.

1. Satan is so subtle, that he will never voluntarily quit his possession; If Satan cast out Satan, his kingdom is divided against itself, and it cannot stand, v. 23–26. He called them to him, he vouchsafed to reason the case with them, that every mouth may be stopped. It was plain that the doctrine of Christ made war upon the devil's kingdom, and had a direct tendency to break his power, and it was as plain that the casting of him out of the bodies of people confirmed that doctrine. Everyone knows that Satan is no fool, nor will act so directly against his own interest.

2. Christ is so wise, that, being engaged in war with him, he will attack his forces wherever he meets them, whether in the bodies or souls of people, v. 27. It is plain, Christ's design is to enter into the strong man's house, and to spoil his goods. Therefore it is natural to suppose that he will thus bind the strong man, and thus show that he has gained a victory over him.

III. The awful warning Christ gave them to take heed how they spoke such dangerous words as these; however they might make light of them, as only conjectures, and the language of free-thinking, if they persisted in it, it would be of fatal consequence to them; it would be found a sin against the last remedy, and consequently unpardonable. It is true, the gospel promiseth, because Christ hath purchased, forgiveness for the greatest sins and sinners, v. 28. Many of those who reviled Christ on the cross found mercy, and Christ himself prayed, Father, forgive them; but this was blaspheming the Holy Ghost, for it was by the Holy Spirit that he cast out devils, and they said, It was by the unclean spirit, v. 30.

Here is, 1. The disrespect which Christ's kindred, according to the flesh, showed to him when he was preaching; they not only stood without, but they sent in a message to call him out to them (v. 31, 32).

2. The respect which Christ showed to his spiritual kindred upon this occasion. Now, as at other times, he put a comparative neglect upon his mother. He looked upon those that sat about him, and pronounced those of them that not only heard, but did, the will of God, to be to him as his brother, and sister, and mother; as much esteemed, loved, and cared for, as his nearest relations, v. 33–35. This is a good reason why we should honour those that fear the Lord, that we may share with the saints in this honour.

CHAP. IV

I. The parable of the seed, and the four sorts of ground (ver. 1–9), with the exposition of it (ver. 10–20), and the application of it, ver. 21–25. II. The parable of the seed growing gradually, ver. 26–29. III. The parable of the grain of mustard-seed, ver. 30–34. IV. The miracle of Christ's sudden stilling a storm at sea, ver. 35–41.

Verses 1–20

The foregoing chapter began with Christ's entering into the synagogue (v. 1); this chapter begins with Christ's teaching again by the seaside. Thus he changed his method, that if possible all might be reached and wrought upon.

Here seems to be a new convenience found out, which had not been used before, and that was—his standing in a ship, while his hearers stood upon the land.

I. The way of teaching that Christ used with the multitude (v. 2); He taught them many things, but it was by parables, which would tempt them to hear; for people love to be spoken to in their own language, and careless hearers will catch at a plain comparison borrowed from common things. Unless they would take pains to search into it, it would but amuse them; seeing they would see, and not perceive (v. 12). They wilfully shut their eyes against the light, and therefore justly did Christ put it into the dark lantern of a parable, which had a bright side toward those who applied it to themselves, but to those who were only willing for a season to play with it, it only gave a flash of light now and then, but sent them away in the dark.

II. The way of expounding that he used with his disciples; When he was alone by himself, not only the twelve, but others that were about him with the twelve, took the opportunity to ask him the meaning of the parables, v. 10. And he told them what a distinguishing favour it was to them, that they were made acquainted with the mystery of the kingdom of God, v. 11. That instructed them, which others were only amused with. Those who know the mystery of the kingdom of heaven, must acknowledge that it is given to them; they receive both the light and the sight from Jesus Christ.

1. The parable of the sower, as we had it, Matt. xiii. 3, &c. He begins (v. 3), with, Hearken, and concludes (v. 9) with, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. The words of Christ demand attention; even that which as yet we do not thoroughly understand, or not rightly, we must carefully attend to. We shall find more in Christ's sayings than at first there seemed to be.

2. The exposition of it to the disciples. Here is a question Christ put to them before he expounded it, which we had not in Matthew (v. 13); "Know ye not this parable? Know ye not the meaning of it? How then will ye know all parables?" "If ye know not this, which is so plain, how will ye understand other parables, which will be more dark and obscure?" This should quicken us both to prayer and pains that we may get knowledge. If we understand not the plain truths of the gospel, how shall we master those that are more difficult? This parable is to teach you to be attentive to the word, and affected with it, that you may understand it. "If ye receive not this, ye will not know how to use the key by which ye must be let into all the rest." Before Christ expounds the parable, (1) He shows them how sad their case was, who were not let into the meaning of the doctrine of Christ; To you it is given, but not to them. It will help us to put a value upon the privileges we enjoy as disciples of Christ, to consider the deplorable state of those who want such privileges, lest they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them, v. 12. Those only who are converted, have their sins forgiven them. (2) He shows them what a shame it was, that they needed such particular explanations of the word they heard, and did not apprehend it at first. Those that would improve in knowledge, must be made sensible of their ignorance.

He gives them the interpretation of the parable of the sower, as we had it before in Matthew. Let us only observe here,

First, That in the great field of the church, the word of God is dispensed to all promiscuously; The sower soweth the word (v. 14), sows it at a venture, not knowing where it will light, or what fruit it will bring forth. He scatters it, in order to the increase of it. Christ was awhile sowing himself, when he went about teaching and preaching; now he sends his ministers and sows by their hand.

Secondly, That of the many that hear the word of the gospel, there are, comparatively, but few that receive it, so as to bring forth the fruits of it; here is but one in four, that comes to good. It is sad to think, how much of the precious seed of the word of God is lost, and sown in vain; but there is a day coming when lost sermons must be accounted for.

Thirdly, Many are much affected with the word for the present, who yet receive no abiding benefit by it. The motions of soul they have, answerable to what they hear, are but a mere flash, like the crackling of thorns under a pot. Those represented here by the stony ground, received the word with gladness, and yet came to nothing.

Fourthly, The reason why the word doth not leave commanding, abiding, impressions upon the minds of the people. The fault is in themselves, not in the word; some are careless forgetful hearers, and these get no good at all by the word; it comes in at one ear, and goes out at the other; others have their convictions overpowered by their corruptions, and they lose the good impressions the word has made upon them, so that they get no abiding good by it.

Fifthly, The devil is very busy about loose, careless hearers, as the fowls of the air go about the seed that lies above ground. Like the fowls, he comes swiftly, and carries away the word ere we are aware. Though we cannot keep them from hovering over our heads we may not let them nestle in our hearts.

Sixthly, Many that are not openly scandalized, so as to throw off their profession, as they on the stony ground did, yet have the efficacy of it secretly choked and stifled, so that it comes to nothing.

Seventhly, Impressions that are not deep, will not be durable. Many that keep their profession in fair days, lose it in a storm; and as those that go to sea only for pleasure, come back again when the wind arises. It is the ruin of hypocrites, that they have no root; they do not act from a living fixed principle. He is the Christian, that is one inwardly.

Eighthly, Many are hindered from profiting by the word of God, by their abundance of the world. Many a good lesson is choked and lost by that prevailing complacency in the world, which they are apt to have, on whom it smiles.

Ninthly, Those that are not encumbered with the cares of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches, may yet lose the benefit of their profession by the lusts of other things; this is added here in Mark; an inordinate appetite toward those things that are pleasing to sense or to the fancy. Those that have but little of the world, may yet be ruined by an indulgence of the body.

Tenthly, Fruit is the thing that God expects and requires from those that enjoy the gospel: fruit according to the seed; a temper of mind, and a course of life, agreeable to the gospel. This is fruit, and it will abound to our account.

Lastly, No good fruit is to be expected but from good seed. If the seed be sown on good ground, if the heart be humble, and holy, and heavenly, there will be good fruit, and it will abound sometimes even to a hundredfold.

I. Those who are good ought to do good; that is to bring forth fruit. God expects a grateful return of his gifts to us, and a useful improvement of his gifts in us; for (v. 21), Is a candle brought to be put under a bushel, or under a bed? No, but that it may be set on a candlestick. All Christians, as they have received the gift, must minister the same. Gifts and graces make a man as a candle; the most eminent are but candles, poor lights, compared with the Sun of righteousness. A candle gives light but a little way, and but a little while, and is easily blown out, and continually burning down and wasting. Many who are lighted as candles, put themselves under a bed, or under a bushel: they do not manifest grace themselves, nor minister grace to others. Like a taper in an urn, they burn to themselves. Those who are lighted as candles, should set themselves on a candlestick; that is, should improve all opportunities of doing good. We are not born for ourselves.

The reason given for this, is, because there is nothing hid, which shall not be manifested, v. 22. There is no treasure of gifts and graces lodged in any but with design to be communicated; nor was the gospel made a secret to the apostles. It should come abroad, and be divulged to all the world. Though Christ expounded the parables to his disciples privately, yet it was with design to make them the more publicly useful; they were taught, that they might teach.

II. It concerns those who hear the word of the gospel, to mark what they hear, and to make a good use of it, If any man have ears to hear, let him hear, v. 23. It is added (v. 24), Take heed what ye hear, and give a due regard to that which ye do hear; Consider what ye hear. What we hear, doth us no good, unless we consider it; those especially that are to teach others must themselves be very observant of the things of God. We must likewise take heed what we hear, by proving all things, that we may hold fast that which is good. As we deal with God, God will deal with us, "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you." As we improve the talents we are entrusted with, we shall increase them; if we make use of the knowledge we have, it shall sensibly grow, as stock in trade both by being turned; Unto you that hear, shall more be given; to you that have, it shall be given, v. 25. Gifts and graces multiply by being exercised.

If we do not use, we lose, what we have; From him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath. Burying a talent is the betraying of a trust, and amounts to a forfeiture; and gifts and graces rust for want of wearing.

III. The good seed of the gospel sown in the world, and sown in the heart, doth by degrees produce wonderful effects, but without noise (v. 26, &c.); So is the kingdom of God.

1. It will come up; though it seem lost and buried under the clods, it will find or make its way through them. The seed cast into the ground will spring. After a field is sown with corn, how soon is the surface of it altered! How gay and pleasant doth it look, when it is covered with green!

2. The husbandman cannot describe how it comes up; it is one of the mysteries of nature; It springs and grows up, he knows not how, v. 27. Thus we know not how the Spirit by the word makes a change in the heart, any more than we can account for the blowing of the wind, which we hear the sound of, but cannot tell whence it comes, or whither it goes.

3. The husbandman, when he hath sown the seed, doth nothing toward the springing of it up; He sleeps, and rises, night and day, and perhaps never so much as thinks of the corn he hath sown, and yet the earth brings forth fruit of itself, according to the ordinary course of nature. Thus the word of grace, when it is received in faith, is in the heart a work of grace.

4. It grows gradually; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear, v. 28. When it is sprung up, it will go forward; nature will have its course, and so will grace. Christ's interest, is, and will be, a growing interest; and though the beginning be small, the latter end will greatly increase. Though at first it is but a tender blade, which the frost may nip, or the foot may crush, yet it will increase to the ear, to the full corn in the ear. God carries on his work insensibly and without noise, but insuperably and without fail.

5. It comes to perfection at last (v. 29); When the fruit is brought forth, then he puts in the sickle. From the fruit of the gospel taking place and working in the soul, Christ gathers in a harvest. When those that receive the gospel aright, have finished their course, the harvest comes, when they shall be gathered as wheat into God's barn (Matt. xiii. 30).

IV. The work of grace is small in its beginnings, but comes to be great and considerable at last (v. 30–32); "Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God? How shall I make you to understand the designed method of it?" It is like a grain of mustard-seed; he had compared it before to seed sown, here to that seed, intending thereby to show,

1. That the beginnings of the gospel kingdom would be very small, like that which is one of the least of all seeds. The work of grace in the soul, is, at first, but the day of small things; a cloud no bigger than a man's hand. Never were there such great things undertaken by such an inconsiderable handful, as that of the discipling of the nations by the ministry of the apostles.

2. That the perfection of it will be very great; When it grows up, it becomes greater than all herbs. The gospel kingdom in the world, shall increase and spread to the remotest nations of the earth. The difference between a grain of mustard seed and a great tree, is nothing to that between a young convert on earth and a glorified saint in heaven.

With many such parables he spoke the word unto them (v. 33). He spoke in parables, as they were able to hear them; he fetched his comparisons from those things that were familiar to them. His manner of expression was easy, and such as they might hereafter recollect to their edification. But, for the present, without a parable spoke he not unto them, v. 34. The disciples themselves understood those sayings of Christ afterward, which at first they did not rightly take the sense of. But these parables he expounded to them, when they were alone. We cannot but wish we had had that exposition, as we had of the parable of the sower.

This miracle which Christ wrought for the relief of his disciples, in stilling the storm, we had before (Matt. viii. 23, &c.); but it is here more fully related.

1. It was the same day, when the even was come, v. 35. When he had been labouring in the world and doctrine all day, instead of reposing himself, he exposeth himself. The end of a toil may perhaps be but the beginning of a toss.

2. He himself proposed putting to sea at night, because he would lose no time; Let us pass over to the other side; he has work to do there. Christ went about doing good, and no difficulties in his way should hinder him.

3. They did not put to sea, till they had sent away the multitude, that is, answered all their requests; for he sent none home complaining that they had attended him in vain.

4. They took him even as he was, without any cloak to throw over him, which he ought to have had, to keep him warm, when he went to sea at night. We may learn hence not to be over nice and solicitous about the body.

5. The storm was so great, that the ship was full of water (v. 37). The ship being little, the waves beat into it so that it was full.

6. There were with him other little ships, which, no doubt, shared in the distress and danger. The multitude went away when he put to sea, but some there were, that would venture upon the water with him. One may boldly and cheerfully put to sea in Christ's company, yea though we foresee a storm.

7. Christ was asleep in this storm. It was in the hinder part of the ship, the pilot's place: he lay at the helm.

He had a pillow there. And he slept, to try the faith of his disciples and to stir up prayer: upon the trial, their faith appeared weak, and their prayers strong. Sometimes when the church is in a storm, Christ seems as if he were asleep, unconcerned in the troubles of his people, and regardless of their prayers. When he sleeps he doth not sleep; the keeper of Israel doth not so much as slumber (Ps. cxxi. 3, 4); he slept, but his heart was awake.

8. His disciples encouraged themselves with their having his presence, and thought it the best way to improve that, and appeal to that, and ply the oar of prayer rather than their other oars. Their confidence lay in this, that they had their Master with them; and the ship that has Christ in it, though it may be tossed, cannot sink. They awoke Christ. When Christ seems as if he slept in a storm, he is awakened by the prayers of his people; we may be at our wits' end, but not at our faith's end, while we have such a Saviour to go to. Their address to Christ is here expressed very emphatically; Master, carest thou not that we perish? I confess this sounds somewhat harsh, rather like chiding him for sleeping than begging him to awake. I know no excuse for it, but the present distress they were in, which put them into such a fright, that they knew not what they said. They do Christ a deal of wrong, who suspect him to be careless of his people in distress.

9. The word of command with which Christ rebuked the storm, we have here, and had not in Matthew, v. 39. He says, Peace, be still—be silent, be dumb. Let not the wind any longer roar, nor the sea rage. The noise is threatening and terrifying; let us hear no more of it. This is, (1) A word of command to us; when our wicked hearts are like the troubled sea which cannot rest (Isa. lvii. 20); let us think we hear the law of Christ, saying, Be silent, be dumb. Think not confusedly, speak not unadvisedly; but be still. (2) A word of comfort to us, that, be the storm of trouble ever so loud, ever so strong, Jesus Christ can lay it with a word's speaking. He that made the seas, can make them quiet.

10. The reproof Christ gave them for their fears, is here carried further than in Matthew. There it is, Why are ye fearful? Here, Why are ye so fearful? There it is, O ye of little faith. Here it is, How is it that ye have no faith? Not that the disciples were without faith. But at this time their fears prevailed so that they seemed to have no faith at all. It was out of the way, when they had occasion for it, and so it was as if they had not had it. Those may suspect their faith, who can entertain such a thought as that Christ careth not though his people perish.

Lastly, The impression this miracle made upon the disciples, is here differently expressed. In Matthew it is said, The men marvelled; here it is said, They feared greatly. Now their fear was rectified by their faith. When they feared the winds and the seas, it was for want of the reverence they ought to have had for Christ. But now that they saw a demonstration of his power over them, they feared them less, and him more. They had feared the power and wrath of the Creator in the storm, and that fear had torment and amazement in it; but now they feared the power and grace of the Redeemer in the calm; and it had pleasure and satisfaction in it. They said, What manner of man is this? Surely more than a man, for even the winds and the seas obey him.

CHAP. V

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ's casting the legion of devils out of the man possessed, and suffering them to enter into the swine, ver. 1–20. II. Christ's healing the woman with the bloody issue, in the way as he was going to raise Jairus's daughter to life, ver. 21–43.

Verses 1–20

We have here an instance of Christ's dispossessing the strong man armed. This he did when he was come to the other side, whither he went through a storm; his business there was to rescue this poor creature out of the hands of Satan.

I. The miserable condition that this poor creature was in; he was under the power of an unclean spirit; he was raving mad; his condition seems to have been worse than any of the possessed, that were Christ's patients.

1. He had his dwelling among the tombs, among the graves of dead people. Their tombs were out of the cities, in desolate places. Perhaps the devil drove him to the tombs. The touch of a grave was polluting. The unclean spirit drives people into that company that is defiling, and so keeps possession of them. Christ, by rescuing souls out of Satan's power, saves the living from among the dead.

2. He was very strong and ungovernable; No man could bind him. Not only cords would not hold him, but chains and fetters of iron would not, v. 3, 4. This sets forth the sad condition of those souls in which the devil has dominion. Some notoriously wilful sinners are like this madman. The commands and curses of the law are as chains and fetters, to restrain sinners from their wicked courses; but they break those bonds in sunder.

3. He was a terror and torment to himself and to all about him, v. 5. The devil is a cruel master. This wretched creature was night and day in the mountains and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones. What is a man, when reason is *de*throned and Satan *en*throned?

II. His application to Christ (v. 6); When he saw Jesus afar off, coming ashore, he ran, and worshipped him. He usually ran upon others with rage, but he ran to Christ with reverence. That was done by an invisible hand of Christ, which could not be done with chains and fetters; his fury was all on a sudden curbed. The poor man came, and worshipped Christ, in a sense of the need he had of his help, the power of Satan in and over him being, for this instant, suspended.

III. The word of command Christ gave (v. 8); Come out of him, thou unclean spirit. He made the man desirous to be relieved, when he enabled him to run, and worship kim, and then put forth his power for his relief. If Christ work in us heartily to pray for a deliverance from Satan, he will work for us that deliverance.

IV. The dread which the devil had of Christ. The man ran, and worshipped Christ; but it was the devil in the man, that cried with a loud voice (making use of the poor man's tongue), What have I to do with thee? v. 7. 1. He calls God the most high God, above all other gods. 2. He owns Jesus to be the Son of God. It is no strange thing to hear the best words drop from the worst mouths. Piety from the teeth outward is an easy thing. The most fair-spoken hypocrite cannot say better than to call Jesus the Son of God and yet that the devil did. 3. He disowns any design against Christ; "What have I to do with thee?" 4. He deprecates his wrath; I adjure thee, that, though those drive me out hence, yet that thou torment me not.

V. The account Christ took from this unclean spirit of his name. This we had not in Matthew. Christ asked him, What is thy name? My name is Legion, for we are many. Now this intimates that the devils are, 1. Military powers. The devils war against God and his glory, Christ and his gospel, men and their holiness and happiness. 2. That they are numerous; he owns, or rather he boasts—We are many; as if he hoped to be too many for Christ himself to deal with. 3. That they are unanimous; they are many devils, and yet but one legion engaged in the same wicked cause. 4. That they are very powerful; Who can stand before a legion? We are not a match for our spiritual enemies, in our own strength; but in the Lord, and in the power of his might, we shall be able to stand against them.

VI. The request of this legion, that Christ would suffer them to go into a herd of swine that was feeding nigh unto the mountains (v. 11). Their request was, 1. That he would not send them away out of the country (v. 10); not only that he would not torment them before the time; but that he would not banish them that country. They seem to have had a particular affection for that country; or, rather, a particular spite to it. 2. That he would suffer them to enter into the swine.

VII. The permission Christ gave them to enter into the swine, and the immediate destruction of the swine thereby; He gave them leave (v. 13). Immediately the unclean spirits entered into the swine, which by the law were unclean creatures. Those that, like the swine, delight in the mire of sensual lusts, are fit habitations for Satan. The consequence of the devils entering into the swine, was, that they all ran mad presently, and ran headlong into the adjoining sea, where they were all drowned, to the number of two thousand.

VIII. The report of all this dispersed through the country immediately. They that fed the swine, hastened to the owners, to give an account of their charge, v. 14. This drew the people together, to see what was done. When they saw how wonderfully the poor man was cured, they hence conceived a veneration for Christ, v. 15. They saw him that was possessed with the devil sitting clothed and in his right mind; when Satan was cast out, he came to himself, and was his own man presently. Those who are grave and sober, and live by rule and with consideration, thereby make it appear that by the power of Christ the devil's power is broken in their souls. The sight of this made them afraid; it astonished them, and forced them to own the power of Christ, and that he is worthy to be feared. When they found that their swine were lost, they thence conceived a dislike of Christ, they prayed him to depart out of their coasts, for they think not any good he can do them sufficient to make them amends for the loss of so many swine, fat swine, it may be, and ready for the market. Now the devils had what they would have; for by no handle do these evil spirits more effectually manage sinful souls than by that of the love of the world. If they would but part with their sins, he had life and happiness for them; but, being loth to quit either their sins or their swine, they chose rather to abandon their Saviour. Thus they do, who, rather than let go a base lust, will throw away their interest in Christ. They wished him further off.

IX. An account of the conduct of the poor man after his deliverance. 1. He desired that he might go along with Christ (v. 18). 2. Christ would not suffer him to go with him. He had other work for him to do; he must go home to his friends, and tell them what great things the Lord had done for him, and his neighbours and friends might be edified, and invited to believe in Christ. He must take particular notice rather of Christ's pity than of his power; he must tell them what compassion the Lord had had on him in his misery. 3. The man, in a transport of joy, proclaimed, all the country over, what great things Jesus had done for him, v. 20. And see what was the effect of it; All men did marvel, but few went any further. Many that cannot but wonder at the works of Christ, yet do not, as they ought, wonder after him.

The Gadarenes having desired Christ to leave their country, he did not stay to trouble them long, but presently went by water, back to the other side (v. 21), and there much people gathered to him. If there be some that reject Christ, yet there are others that receive him, and bid him welcome.

I. Here is one, that comes openly to beg a cure for a sick child; and it is no less a person than one of the rulers of the synagogue. He was not named in Matthew, he is here, Jairus, or Jair, Judges x. 3.

He addressed himself to Christ with great humility and reverence; When he saw him, he fell at his feet, and with great importunity, he besought him greatly, as one in earnest. He has a little daughter, about twelve years old, the darling of the family, and she lies a-dying; but he believes that if Christ will but come, and lay his hands upon her, she will return even from the gates of the grave. He said, at first, when he came, She lies a-dying (so Mark); but afterward, She is even now dead (so Matthew); but he still prosecutes his suit. Christ readily agreed, and went with him, v. 24.

II. Here is another, that comes clandestinely to steal a cure (if I may so say) for herself; and she got the relief she came for. This cure was wrought by the way, as he was going to raise the ruler's daughter. Many of his discourses, and some of his miracles, are dated by the way-side; we should be doing good, not only when we sit in the house, but when we walk by the way.

1. The piteous case of this poor woman. She had a constant issue of blood upon her, for twelve years. She had had the best advice of physicians, that she could get, and had made use of the many medicines and methods they prescribed; but now that she had spent all she had among them, they gave her up as incurable. It is usual with people not to apply themselves to Christ, till they have tried in vain all other helpers, and find them, as certainly they will, physicians of no value. And he will be found a sure refuge, even to those who make him their last refuge.

2. The strong faith that she had in the power of Christ to heal her; If I may but touch his clothes, I shall be whole, v. 28. A private cure was what she wished for, and her faith was suited to her case.

3. The wonderful effect produced by it; She came in the crowd behind him, and with much ado got to touch his garment, and immediately she felt the cure wrought, v. 29. The flux of blood was dried up, and she felt herself perfectly well all over her in an instant. Those whom Christ heals of the disease of sin, that bloody issue, cannot but experience in themselves a universal change for the better.

4. Christ's enquiry after his concealed patient, and the encouragement he gave her; Christ knew in himself that virtue had gone out of him, v. 30. Being desirous to see his patient, he asked, not in displeasure, as one affronted, but in tenderness, as one concerned, Who touched my clothes? The disciples almost ridiculed his question (v. 31); The multitudes throng thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? Christ passed by the affront, and looks around to see her that had done this thing; not that he might blame her for her presumption, but that he might commend and encourage her faith, and by his own act and deed might warrant and confirm the cure. As secret acts of sin, so secret acts of faith, are known to the Lord Jesus, and are under his eye. The poor woman, hereupon, presented herself to the Lord Jesus (v. 33), fearing and trembling, not knowing how he would take it. Christ's patients are often trembling, when they have reason to be triumphing. She might have come boldly, knowing what was done in her; yet, knowing that, she fears and trembles. It was a surprise, and was not yet, as it should have been, a pleasing surprise. However, she fell down before him. There is nothing better for those that fear and tremble, than to throw themselves at the feet of the Lord Jesus. And she told him all the truth. We must not be ashamed to own the secret transactions between Christ and our souls; but, when called to it, mention what he has done for our souls, and the experience we have had of healing virtue derived from him. What an encouraging word he gave her (v. 34); Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole. God's grace will set the seal of its amen to the prayers and hopes of faith, saying, "So be it, and so it shall be, to thee." And therefore, "Go in peace."

Christ, having healed an incurable disease, here goes on to triumph over death.

I. The melancholy news is brought to Jairus, that his daughter is dead. While there is life, there is hope, and room for the use of means; but when life is gone, it is past recall; Why troublest thou the Master any further? v. 35. Ordinarily, the proper thought in this case, is, "The matter is determined, the will of God is done, and I submit, I acquiesce; The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away." But here the case was extraordinary; the death of the child doth not, as usually, put an end to the narrative.

II. Christ encourageth the afflicted father yet to hope. Christ had stayed to work a cure by the way, but he shall be no sufferer by that, nor loser by the gain of others; Be not afraid, only believe. We may suppose Jairus at a pause, whether he should ask Christ to go on or no; but have we not as much occasion for the grace of God, and his consolations, when death is in the house, as when sickness is? Christ therefore soon determines this matter; "Be not afraid that my coming will be to no purpose, only believe that I will make it turn to a good account." Only believe. Keep up a confidence in Christ, and a dependence upon him, and he will do what is for the best. Believe the resurrection, and then be not afraid.

III. He went with a select company to the house where the dead child was. Now he shook off the crowd, and suffered no man to follow him but his three bosom-disciples, Peter, and James, and John.

IV. He raised the dead child to life. Here we may observe,

1. That the child was extremely well beloved, for the relations and neighbours wept and wailed greatly.

2. That it was evident beyond dispute, that the child was really and truly dead. Their laughing Christ to scorn, for saying, She is not dead, but sleepeth, serves for the proof of this.

3. That Christ put those out as unworthy to be witnesses of the miracle, who were so ignorant in the things of God, as not to understand him when he spoke of death as a sleep, or so scornful, as to ridicule him for it.

4. That he took the parents of the child to be witnesses of the miracle, and designed it for their comfort, who were the true, for they were the silent mourners.

5. That Christ raised the child to life by a word of power, which is recorded here, and recorded in Syriac, the language in which Christ spoke, for the greater certainty of the thing; Talitha, cumi; Damsel, I say unto thee, Arise. Christ said, Arise from the dead; meaning, I command that thou arise; nay, there is more in it—the dead have not power to arise, therefore power goes along with this word, to make it effectual. Christ works while he commands, and works by the command, and therefore may command what he pleaseth, even the dead to arise. Such is the gospel call to those that are by nature dead in trespasses and sins, and can no more rise from that death by their own power, than this child could.

6. That the damsel, as soon as life returned, arose, and walked, v. 42. Spiritual life will appear by our rising from the bed of sloth and carelessness, our walking up and down in Christ's name and strength.

7. That all who saw it, and heard of it, admired the miracle, and him that wrought it; They were astonished with a great astonishment. They could not but acknowledge that there was something in it extraordinary and very great, and yet they knew not what to make of it, or to infer from it.

8. That Christ endeavoured to conceal it; He charged them straitly, that no man should know it. It was sufficiently known to a competent number, but he would not have it as yet proclaimed any further.

9. That Christ took care something should be given her to eat. By this it appeared that she was raised not only to life, but to a good state of health, that she had an appetite to her meat. Where Christ hath given spiritual life, he will provide food for the support and nourishment of it unto life eternal, for he will never forsake, or be wanting to, the work of his own hands.

CHAP. VI

I. Christ contemned by his countrymen, because he was one of them, ver. 1–6. II. The just power he gave his apostles over unclean spirits, ver. 7–13. III. A strange notion which Herod and others had of Christ, upon which occasion we have the story of the martyrdom of John Baptist, ver. 14–29. IV. Christ's retirement into a desert place; the crowds that followed him; and his feeding five thousand of them with five loaves and two fishes, ver. 30–44. V. Christ's walking upon the sea to his disciples, and the abundance of cures he wrought on the other side of the water, ver. 45–56.

Verses 1–6

I. Christ makes a visit to his own country, that was Nazareth; where his relations were. He had been in danger of his life among them (Luke iv. 29), and yet he came among them again; so strangely doth he wait to be gracious.

II. There he preached in their synagogue, on the sabbath day, v. 2. On sabbath days, the word of God is to be preached according to Christ's example.

III. They could not but own that which was very honourable concerning him. 1. That he spoke with great wisdom. 2. That he did mighty works. They acknowledged the two great proofs of the divine original of his gospel—the divine wisdom, and the divine power, and yet, though they could not deny the premises, they would not admit the conclusion.

IV. They studied to disparage him. All this wisdom, and all these mighty works, shall be of no account. Is not this the Carpenter? In Matthew, they upbraid him with being the carpenter's son. But, it seems, they could say further, Is not this the Carpenter? 1. He would thus humble himself as one that had taken upon him the form of a servant. 2. He would thus teach us to abhor idleness, and to find ourselves something to do in this world. Nothing is more pernicious for young people than to get a habit of sauntering. The Jews had a good rule for this—that their young men who were designed for scholars, were yet bred up to some trade, as Paul was a tent-maker, that they might have some business to fill up their time with. 3. He would thus put an honour upon despised mechanics, and encourage those who eat the labour of their hands, though great men look upon them with contempt.

Another thing they upbraided him with, was, the meanness of his relations; "He is the son of Mary; his brethren and sisters are here with us; we know his family and kindred;" and therefore, though they were astonished at his doctrine (v. 2), yet they were offended at his person (v. 3), and for that reason would not receive his doctrine.

V. Let us see how Christ bore this contempt.

1. He partly excused it (v. 4); A prophet is not despised anywhere but in his own country. Doubtless many have got over this prejudice, but ordinarily it holds good, that ministers are seldom so acceptable and successful in their own country as among strangers; familiarity in the younger years breeds a contempt, the advancement of one that was an inferior begets envy, and men will hardly set those among the guides of their souls whose fathers they were ready to set with the dogs of their flock.

2. He did some good among them, notwithstanding the slights they put upon him, for he is kind even to the evil and unthankful; He laid his hands upon a few sick folks, and healed them.

3. Yet he could there do no such mighty works as in other places, because of the unbelief that prevailed among the people, v. 5. It is a strange expression, as if unbelief tied the hands of omnipotence itself; he would have done as many miracles there as he had done elsewhere, but he could not. They forfeited the honour of having them wrought for them. By unbelief and contempt of Christ men stop the current of his favours to them, and put a bar in their own door.

4. He marvelled because of their unbelief, v. 6. We never find Christ wondering but at the faith of the Gentiles that were strangers, as the centurion (Matt. viii. 10), and the woman of Samaria, and at the unbelief of Jews that were his own countrymen.

5. He went round about the villages, teaching. If we cannot do good where we would, we must do it where we can, though but in the villages. Sometimes the gospel of Christ finds better entertainment in the country villages, than in the populous cities.

I. The commission given to the twelve apostles, to preach and work miracles. Hitherto they had been conversant with Christ, and had sat at his feet, had heard his doctrine, and seen his miracles. They had received, that they might give, had learned, that they might teach; and therefore now he began to send them forth. They must not always be studying in the academy, to get knowledge. Though they were not as yet so well accomplished as they were to be, yet, according to their present ability and capacity, they must be set to work, and make further improvements afterward. Now observe here,

1. That Christ sent them forth by two and two; this Mark takes notice of. They went two and two to a place that they might be company for one another when they were among strangers, and might strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts, one of another; might help one another. It is an approved maxim, Two are better than one. Christ would thus teach his ministers to associate, and both lend and borrow help.

2. That he gave them power over unclean spirits. He commissioned them to attack the devil's kingdom, and empowered them to cast him out of the bodies of those that were possessed.

3. That he commanded them not to take provisions along with them, neither victuals nor money, that they might appear, wherever they came, to be poor men. When afterward he bid them take purse and scrip (Luke xxii. 36), that did not intimate that his care of them was abated from what it had been; but, that they should meet with worse times and worse entertainment than they met with at their first mission. In Matthew and Luke they are forbidden to take staves with them, that is, fighting staves; but here in Mark they are bid to take nothing save a staff only, that is, a walking staff, such as pilgrims carried. They must not put on shoes, but sandals only; they must go in the readiest plainest dress they could, and must not so much as have two coats. What they wanted, those they preached to would cheerfully accommodate them with.

4. He directed them, whatever city they came to, to make that house their headquarters, which happened to be their first quarters (v. 10); "There abide till ye depart from that place. And since ye know ye come on an errand sufficient to make you welcome, have such charity for your friends that first invited you, as to believe they do not think you burthensome."

5. He pronounces a very heavy doom upon those that rejected the gospel they preached (v. 11); "Whosoever shall not receive you, or will not so much as hear you, depart thence, and shake off the dust under your feet, for a testimony against them." That dust, like the dust of Egypt (Exod. ix. 9), shall turn into a plague to them; and their condemnation in the great day, will be more intolerable than that of Sodom.

II. The apostles' conduct in pursuance of their commission. Though they were conscious to themselves of great weakness, yet, in obedience to their Master's order, and in dependence upon his strength, they went out as Abraham, not knowing whither they went.

1. The doctrine they preached; They preached that men should repent (v. 12); that they should change their minds, and reform their lives. The great design of gospel preachers, and the great tendency of gospel preaching, should be, to bring people to repentance, to a new heart and a new way. They did not amuse people with curious speculations, but told them that they must repent of their sins, and turn to God.

2. The miracles they wrought. The power Christ gave them over unclean spirits, was not ineffectual, nor did they receive it in vain, but used it, for they cast out many devils (v. 13); and they anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.

Verses 14–29

I. The wild notions that the people had concerning our Lord Jesus, v. 15. His own countrymen could believe nothing great concerning him, because they knew his poor kindred; but others were yet willing to believe anything rather than the truth. They said, He is Elias, whom they expected; or, He is the prophet, one of the Old Testament prophets raised to life; or as one of the prophets, a prophet now newly raised up.

II. The opinion of Herod concerning him. He said, "It is certainly John Baptist, v. 14. It is John whom I beheaded, v. 16. He is risen from the dead; he is come again with greater power, and now mighty works do show forth themselves in him."

1. Where there is an idle faith, there is commonly a working fancy. The people said, It is a prophet risen from the dead; Herod said, It is John Baptist risen from the dead. It seems by this, that the rising of a prophet from the dead, to do mighty works, was thought neither impossible nor improbable, and it was now readily suspected when it was not true; but afterward, when it was true concerning Christ, it as obstinately gainsaid and denied. Those who most wilfully disbelieve the truth, are commonly most credulous of errors and fancies.

2. They who fight against the cause of God, will find themselves baffled, even when they think themselves conquerors.

3. A guilty conscience needs no accuser or tormentor but itself. I beheaded him; and the terror of it made him imagine that Christ was John risen. He feared John while he lived, and now, fears him ten times worse when he is dead. One might as well be haunted with ghosts and furies, as with the horrors of an accusing conscience.

4. There may be the terrors of strong conviction, where there is not the truth of a saving conversion.

III. A narrative of Herod's putting John Baptist to death.

1. The great value and veneration which Herod had some time had for John Baptist, which is related only by this evangelist, v. 20.

(1) He feared John, knowing that he was a just man, and a holy. It is possible that a man may have a great reverence for good men, and especially for good ministers, yea, and for that in them that is good, and yet himself be a bad man. [1] John was a just man, and a holy; to make a complete good man, both justice and holiness are necessary; holiness toward God, and justice toward men. [2] Herod knew this by personal acquaintance with him. Those that have but little justice and holiness themselves, may yet discern it with respect in others. [3] He therefore feared him, he honoured him. Many that are not good themselves, have respect for those that are.

(2) He observed him; he took notice of that in him that was praiseworthy, and commended it in the hearing of those about him; he made it appear that he observed what John said and did.

(3) He heard him preach; which was great condescension.

(4) He did many of those things which John in his preaching taught him. He was not only a hearer of the word, but in part a doer of the work. But it will not suffice to do many things, unless we have respect to all the commandments.

(5) He heard him gladly. There is a flashy joy, which a hypocrite may have in hearing the word. The stony ground received the word with joy, Luke viii. 13.

2. John's faithfulness to Herod, in telling him of his faults. Herod had married his brother Philip's wife, v. 17. John reproved him, told him plainly, It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. This was Herod's own iniquity, which he could not leave, when he did many things that John taught him. Though he were a king, he would not spare him, any more than Elijah did Ahab. Though it was dangerous to offend Herod, and much more to offend Herodias, yet John would run the hazard rather than be wanting in his duty. Those ministers that would be found faithful in the work of God, must not be afraid of the face of man.

3. The malice which Herodias bore to John for this (v. 19); She has a quarrel with him, and would have him killed; but when she could not obtain that, she got him committed to prison, v. 17. Many that pretend to honour prophesying, are for smooth things only, and love good preaching, if it keep far enough from their beloved sin. But it is better that sinners persecute ministers now for their faithfulness, than curse them eternally for their unfaithfulness.

4. The plot laid to take off John's head. When a convenient day was come (v. 21). There must be a ball at court, upon the king's birthday. To grace the solemnity, the daughter of Herodias must dance publicly, and Herod must take on him to be wonderfully charmed with her dancing. The king hereupon must make her an extravagant promise, to give her whatever she would ask, even to the half of the kingdom. This promise is bound with an oath; He sware unto her, Whatsoever thou shalt ask, I will give. She, being instructed by Herodias her mother, asked the head of John Baptist; and she must have it brought her in a charger, as a pretty thing for her to play with (v. 24, 25); and there must be no delay, no time lost, she must have it by and by. Herod granted it, and the execution was done immediately while the company were together. But he takes on him, (1) To be very backward to it, and that he would not for all the world have done it, if he had not been surprised into such a promise; The king was exceeding sorry. He could not do it but with great regret and reluctancy; natural conscience will not suffer men to sin easily. (2) He takes on him to be very sensible of the obligation of his oath. The promise was rashly made, and could not bind him to do an unrighteous thing. Sinful oaths must be repented of, and therefore not performed. He was hurried into the doing of it by those about him, only to carry on the humour; for he did it for their sakes who sat with him. Thus do princes make themselves slaves to those whose respect they covet. The king sent an executioner, a soldier of his guard. Bloody tyrants have executioners ready to obey their most cruel and unrighteous decrees.

5. The effect of this is, that Herod's wicked court is all in triumph, the head is made a present of to the damsel, and by her to her mother, v. 28. And John Baptist's sacred college is all in tears. When they heard of it, they came, and took up the neglected corpse, and laid it in a tomb.

Verses 30–44

I. The return to Christ of the apostles whom he had sent forth (v. 7). They gathered themselves together, and came to Jesus to give him an account of what they had done. They told him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught. Ministers are accountable both for what they do, and for what they teach. Let them not either do anything, or teach anything, but what they are willing should be related and repeated to the Lord Jesus.

II. The tender care Christ took for their repose, after the fatigue they had (v. 31); He said unto them, Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest awhile. It should seem that John's disciples came to Christ with the mournful tidings of their master's death, much about the same time that his own disciples came to him. Christ takes cognizance of the frights of some, and the toils of others, of his disciples, and provides suitable relief for both, rest for those that are tired, and refuge for those that are terrified. With what kindness and compassion doth Christ say to them, Come, and rest! The most active servants of Christ cannot be always upon the stretch of business, but have bodies that require some relaxation, some breathing-time. And the Lord is for the body, considers its frame, and not only allows it time for rest, but puts it in mind of resting. Those that work diligently and faithfully, may cheerfully retire to rest. 1. Christ calls them to come themselves apart; if they must rest, they must be alone. 2. He invites them not to some pleasant country-seat, but into a desert place. No wonder that he who had but a ship for his preaching place, had but a desert for his resting place. 3. He calls them only to rest awhile; only to get breath, and then to go to work again. 4. The reason given for this, is, for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat. Let but proper time be set, and kept for everything, and a great deal of work may be done with a great deal of ease; but if people be continually coming and going, a little work will not be done without a deal of trouble. 5. They withdrew, accordingly, by ship, v. 32. Going by water was much less toilsome than going by land would have been. They went away privately. The most public persons cannot but wish to be private sometimes.

III. The diligence of the people to follow him. They are not blamed for it, nor bid to go back, but bid welcome. A failure in good manners will easily be excused in those who follow Christ, if it be but made up in a fulness of good affections. They followed him out of the cities, quitted their houses and shops, their callings and affairs. They followed him afoot, though he was gone by sea. They stuck to him. They ran afoot, and made such haste, that they out-went the disciples. Nay they followed him, though it was into a desert place. The presence of Christ will turn a wilderness into a paradise.

IV. The entertainment Christ gave them (v. 34); When he saw much people, instead of being moved with displeasure, he was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep having no shepherd, they seemed to be well-inclined, and manageable as sheep. But they had no shepherd, none to lead and guide them in the right way, and therefore, in compassion to them, he not only healed their sick, as it is in Matthew, but he taught them many things.

V. The provision he made for them all; all his hearers he generously made his guests, and treated them at a splendid entertainment: so it might truly be called, because a miraculous one.

1. The disciples moved that they should be sent home. When the day was now far spent they said, This is a desert place, and much time is now past; send them away to buy bread, v. 35, 36. This the disciples suggested to Christ; but we do not find that the multitude themselves did. The disciples thought it would be a kindness to them to dismiss them. Willing minds will do more, and hold out longer, in that which is good, than one would expect from them.

2. Christ ordered that they should all be fed (v. 37); Give ye them to eat. To teach us to be kind to those who are rude to us, he ordered provision to be made for them; that bread which Christ and his disciples took with them into the desert, that they might make a quiet meal of it for themselves, he will have them to partake of. Thus was he given to hospitality. They attended on the spiritual food of his word, and then he took care that they should not want corporal food. The way of duty, as it is the way of safety, so it is the way to supply. Providence, not tempted, but duly trusted, never yet failed any of God's faithful servants, but has refreshed many with seasonable and surprising relief.

3. The disciples objected against it as impracticable; Shall we go, and buy two hundred penny-worth of bread, and give them to eat? Instead of waiting for directions from Christ, they perplex the cause with projects of their own. Christ would let them see their folly in forecasting for themselves, that they might put the greater value upon his provision for them.

4. Christ effected it, to universal satisfaction. They had brought with them five loaves, and two fishes, and that is the bill of fare. This was but a little for Christ and his disciples, and yet this they must give away. We often find Christ entertained at other people's tables, but here we have him supping a great many at his own charge.

(1) The provision was ordinary. Here were no rarities. If we have for necessity, it is no matter though we have not for delicacy and curiosity. The promise to them that fear the Lord, is, that verily they shall be fed; he doth not say, They shall be feasted.

(2) The guests were orderly; for they sat down by companies on the green grass (v. 39), they sat down in ranks by hundreds and by fifties (v. 40), for God is the God of order, and not of confusion.

(3) A blessing was craved upon the meat; He looked up to heaven, and blessed. Christ did not call one of his disciples to crave a blessing, but did it himself (v. 41); and by virtue of this blessing the bread strangely multiplied, and so did the fishes, for they did all eat, and were filled, though they were to the number of five thousand, v. 42–44. Christ came into the world, to be the great feeder as well as the great healer; and in him there is enough for all that come to him. None are sent empty away from Christ, but those that come to him full of themselves.

(4) Care was taken of the fragments that remained, with which they filled twelve baskets. Though Christ had bread enough at command, he would hereby teach us, not to make waste.

Verses 45–56

I. The dispersing of the assembly; Christ constrained his disciples to go before by ship to Bethsaida. The people were loth to scatter. For now that they had got a good supper, they were in no haste to leave him.

II. Christ departed into a mountain, to pray. He prayed; he was much in prayer; he prayed often, and prayed long. He went alone, to pray, to set us an example, and to encourage us in our secret addresses to God, he prayed alone. A good man is never less alone than when alone with God.

III. The disciples were in distress at sea; The wind was contrary (v. 48), so that they toiled in rowing. This was a specimen of the hardships they were to expect, when hereafter he should send them abroad to preach the gospel. The church is often like a ship at sea, tossed with tempests, and not comforted; we may have Christ for us, and yet wind and tide against us; but it is a comfort to Christ's disciples in a storm, that their Master is in the heavenly mount, interceding for them.

IV. Christ made them a kind visit upon the water. He chose to help them in the most endearing manner possible, and therefore came to them himself.

1. He did not come till the fourth watch of the night, not till after three o'clock in the morning; but then he came. If Christ's visits to his people be deferred long, yet at length he will come.

2. He came, walking upon the waters. The sea was now tossed with waves, and yet Christ came, walking upon it. No difficulties can obstruct Christ's gracious appearances for his people. He will either find, or force, a way through the most tempestuous sea, for their deliverance.

3. He would have passed by them. Providence, when it is acting designedly and directly for the succour of God's people, yet sometimes seems as if it were giving them the go-by. They thought that he would, but we may be sure that he would not, have passed by them.

4. They were frightened at the sight of him, supposing him to have been an apparition; They all saw him, and were troubled (v. 50). We often perplex and frighten ourselves with phantasms, the creatures of our own fancy and imagination.

5. He encouraged them, and silenced their fears, by making himself known to them; Be of good cheer, it is I; be not afraid. We know not Christ till he is pleased to reveal himself to us. "It is I; I your Master, I your friend." The knowledge of Christ, as he is in himself, and near to us, is enough to make the disciples of Christ cheerful even in a storm, and no longer fearful. Christ's presence with us in a stormy day, is enough to make us of good cheer, though clouds and darkness be round about us. He doth not tell them who he was, they knew his voice, as the sheep know the voice of their own shepherd. When Christ said to those that came to apprehend him by force, I am he, they were struck down by it, John xviii. 6. When he saith to those that come to apprehend him by faith, I am he, they are raised up by it, and comforted.

6. He went up to them into the ship. Let them but have their Master with them, and all is well. And as soon as he was come into the ship, the wind ceased. The wind ceased all of a sudden. Though we hear not the command given, yet, if thus the wind cease, and we have the comfort of a calm, say, It is because Christ is in the ship.

7. They were more surprised and astonished at this miracle than did become them, They were sore amazed in themselves. But why all this confusion about it? It was because they considered not the miracle of the loaves; had they given that its due weight they would not have been so much surprised at this; for his multiplying the bread was as great an instance of his power as his walking on the water. It is for want of a right understanding of Christ's former works, that we are transported at the thought of his present works, as if there never were the like before.

V. When they came to the land of Gennesaret the people bid them very welcome; The men of that place knew Jesus (v. 53), and knew what mighty works he did wherever he came, they knew likewise that he used to stay but a little while at a place, and therefore, They ran through that whole region round about, with all possible expedition, and began to carry about in beds those that were sick, there was no danger of their getting cold when they hoped to get a cure, v. 55. Let him go where he would, he was crowded with patients, they laid the sick in the streets, to be in his way, and begged leave for them to touch if it were but the border of his garment, and as many as touched, were made whole. We do not find that they were desirous to be taught by him, only to be healed. If ministers could now cure people's bodily diseases, what multitudes would attend them! But it is sad to think how much more concerned the most of men are about their bodies than about their souls.

CHAP. VII

I. Christ's dispute with the scribes and Pharisees about eating meat with unwashen hands (ver. 1–13); and the needful instructions he gave to the people on that occasion, ver. 14–23. II. His curing of the woman of Canaan's daughter, ver. 24–30. III. The relief of a man that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech, ver. 31–37.

One great design of Christ's coming, was, to set aside the ceremonial law which God made, and to put an end to it; to make way for which he begins with the ceremonial law which men had made, and added to the law of God's making. These Pharisees and scribes with whom he had this argument, are said to come from Jerusalem down to Galilee—fourscore or a hundred miles, to pick quarrels with our Saviour there.

I. What the tradition of the elders was: by it all were enjoined to wash their hands before meat; a cleanly custom, and no harm in it; but they placed religion in it. They interposed their authority, and commanded all to do it upon pain of excommunication; this they kept up as a tradition of the elders.

We have here an account of the practice of the Pharisees and all the Jews, v. 3, 4. 1. They washed their hands oft. 2. They particularly washed before they ate bread; for that was the rule; they must be sure to wash before they ate the bread on which they begged a blessing, else he was thought to be defiled. 3. They took special care, when they came in from the markets, to wash their hands. It signifies any place of concourse where there were people of all sorts, and, it might be supposed, some heathen or Jews under a ceremonial pollution, by coming near to whom they thought themselves polluted. They say, The rule of the rabbis was—That, if they washed their hands well in the morning, the first thing they did, it would serve for all day, provided they kept alone; but, if they went into company, they must not, at their return, either eat or pray till they had washed their hands. 4. They added to this the washing of cups and pots, and brazen vessels, nay, and the very tables on which they ate their meat. There were many cases in which, by the law of Moses, washings were appointed; but they added to them, and enforced the observation of their own impositions as much as of God's institutions.

II. What the practice of Christ's disciples was; they knew what the law was, and the common usage; but they would not be bound up by it: they ate bread with defiled, that is, with unwashen hands, v. 2. The disciples knew (it is probable) that the Pharisees had their eye upon them, and yet they would not humour them by a compliance with their traditions, and ate bread with unwashen hands; and herein their righteousness, however it might seem to come short, did really exceed, that of the scribes and Pharisees, Matt. v. 20.

III. The offence which the Pharisees took at this; They found fault (v. 3). They brought a complaint against them to their Master, expecting that he should check them, and order them to conform. They do not ask, Why do not thy disciples do as we do? But, Why do not they walk according to the tradition of the elders? v. 5.

IV. Christ's vindication of them; in which,

1. He argues with the Pharisees concerning the authority by which this ceremony was imposed; but this he did not speak of publicly to the multitude (as appears by his calling the people to him, v. 14) lest he should have seemed to stir them up to faction; but addressed it as a reproof to the persons concerned.

(1) He reproves them for their hypocrisy in pretending to honour God, when really they had no such design in their religious observances (v. 6, 7); They honour me with their lips, they pretend it is for the glory of God, but really their heart is far from God. They rested in the outside of all their religious exercises, and their hearts were not right with God in them, and this was worshipping God in vain; for neither was he pleased with such sham-devotions, nor were they profited by them.

(2) He reproves them for placing religion in the inventions and injunctions of their elders and rulers; They taught for doctrines the traditions of men. They were enforcing the canons of their church, and judged of people's being Jews or no, according as they did, or did not, conform to them, without any consideration had, whether they lived in obedience to God's laws or no. Instead of providing the substance, they presumptuously added to the ceremony, and were very nice in washing pots and cups; and observe, he adds, Many other suchlike things ye do, v. 8. Superstition is an endless thing.

(3) He reproves them for laying aside the commandment of God, and overlooking that, and in their discipline conniving at the violation of that, as if that were no longer of force, v. 8. It is the mischief of impositions, that too often they who are zealous for them, have little zeal for the essential duties of religion. Nay, they rejected the commandment of God, v. 9. Ye do fairly disannul and abolish the commandment of God; and even by your traditions make the word of God of no effect, v. 13. They were entrusted to expound the law, and to enforce it; and, under pretence of using that power, they violated the law, and dissolved the bonds of it.

This he gives them a particular instance of, and a flagrant one—God commanded children to honour their parents, not only by the law of Moses, but by the law of nature; and whoso revileth, or speaketh evil of, father or mother, let him die the death, v. 10. It is the duty of children, if their parents be poor, to relieve them, according to their ability; and if those children are worthy to die, that curse their parents, much more those that starve them. But they will find him out an expedient by which he may be discharged from this obligation, v. 11. If his parents be in want, and he has wherewithal to help them, but has no mind to do it, let him swear by the Corban that is, by the gold of the temple, and the gift upon the altar, that his parents shall not be profited by him, and, if they ask anything of him, let him tell them this, and it is enough; as if by the obligation of this wicked vow he had discharged himself from the obligation. He concludes, And many such things do ye. Where will men stop, when once they have made the word of God give way to their tradition? These eager imposers of such ceremonies, at first only made light of God's commandments in comparison with their traditions, but afterward made void God's commandments, if they stood in competition with them.

2. He instructs the people concerning the principles upon which this ceremony was grounded. It was requisite that this part of his discourse should be public, he therefore called the people unto him (v. 14), and bid them hear and understand. It is not enough for the common people to hear, but they must understand what they hear. Corrupt customs are best cured by rectifying corrupt notions.

Now that which he goes about to set them right in, is, what the pollution is, which we are in danger of being damaged by, v. 15. (1) Not by the meat we eat, that is but from without, and goes through a man. But, (2) It is by the breaking out of the corruption that is in our hearts. We become odious in the sight of God by that which comes out of us; our wicked thoughts and affections, words and actions, these defile us, and these only. Our care must therefore be, to wash our heart from wickedness.

3. He gives his disciples, in private, an explication of the instructions he gave the people. They asked him concerning the parable (v. 17). (1) He reproves their dulness; "Are ye so without understanding also?" He doth not expect they should understand everything; "But are ye so weak as not to understand this?" (2) He explains this truth to them, that they might perceive it, and then they would believe it. [1] That that which we eat and drink cannot defile us, so as to call for any religious washing; it goes into the stomach, and what there may be in it that is defiling is voided and gone. But, [2] It is that which comes out from the heart, the corrupt heart, that defiles us. What comes out from the mind of a man is that which defiles him before God, and calls for a religious washing (v. 21); From within, out of the heart of men, thence that which defiles proceeds, thence comes all the mischief. As a corrupt fountain sends forth corrupt streams, so doth a corrupt heart. Divers particulars are specified, as in Matthew; we had one there, which is not here, and that is, false witness-bearing; but seven are mentioned here, to be added to those we had there. First, Covetousnesses, for it is plural; immoderate desires of more of the wealth of the world, and the gratifications of sense, and still more, still crying, Give, give. Secondly, Wickedness, malice, hatred, and ill-will, a desire to do mischief, and a delight in mischief done. Thirdly, Deceit; which is wickedness covered and disguised, that it may be the more securely and effectually committed. Fourthly, Lasciviousness; that filthiness and foolish talking which the apostle condemns; the eye full of adultery, and all wanton dalliances. Fifthly, The evil eye; the envious eye, and the covetous eye, grudging others the good we give them, or grieving at the good they do or enjoy. Sixthly, Pride; exalting ourselves in our own conceit above others, and looking down with scorn and contempt upon others. Seventhly, Foolishness; imprudence, inconsideration; some understand it especially of vainglorious boasting. Ill-thinking is put first, as that which is the spring of our own *com*missions, and unthinking put last, as that which is the spring of all our *o*missions. Of all these he concludes (v. 23), 1. That they come from within, from the corrupt nature. 2. That they defile the man; they render a man unfit for communion with God, they bring a stain upon the conscience.

I. How humbly Christ was pleased to conceal himself. Never man was so cried up as he was in Galilee, and therefore, to teach us not to be fond of popular applause, he arose from thence, and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon, where he was little known; and there he entered into a private house, and he would have no man to know it. As there is a time to appear, so there is a time to retire. Or, he would not be known, because he was among Gentiles, to whom he would not be so forward to show himself as to the tribes of Israel.

II. How graciously he was pleased to manifest himself, notwithstanding. Though he would not carry a harvest of miraculous cures into those parts, he let fall this one which we have here an account of. He could not be hid; for, though a candle may be put under a bushel, the sun cannot. Christ was too well known to be long hid, anywhere.

1. The application made to him by a poor woman in distress and trouble. She was a Gentile, a Greek, an alien to the covenant of promise; she was by extraction a Syrophenician; she had a daughter, a young daughter, that was possessed with the devil. Her address was, (1) Very humble, pressing, and importunate; She heard of him, and came, and fell at his feet. Christ never put any from him, that fell at his feet, which a poor trembling soul may do, that has not boldness and confidence to throw itself into his arms. (2) It was very particular; she tells him what she wanted. She besought him that he would cast forth the devil out of her daughter, v. 26. The greatest blessing we can ask of Christ for our children is, that he would break the power of Satan, that is, the power of sin, in their souls.

2. The discouragement he gave to this address (v. 27); He said unto her, "Let the children first be filled; let the Jews have all the miracles wrought for them, that they have occasion for, and let not that which was intended for them, be thrown to those who are not of God's family, and who are as dogs in comparison of them, and who are as dogs to them, snarling at them, and ready to worry them." Where Christ knows the faith of poor supplicants to be strong, he sometimes delights to try it, and put it to the stretch. But his saying, Let the children first be filled, intimates that there was mercy in reserve for the Gentiles, and not far off; for the Jews began already to be surfeited with the gospel of Christ, and some of them had desired him to depart out of their coasts. The children begin to play with their meat, and their leavings would be a feast for the Gentiles.

3. The turn she gave to this word of Christ, which made against her, and her improvement of it, to make it for her, v. 28. She said, "Yes, Lord, I own it is true that the children's bread ought not to be cast to the dogs, but they were never denied the crumbs, and they are allowed a place under the table, that they may be ready to receive them. I ask not for a loaf, no, nor for a morsel, only for a crumb; do not refuse me that." This she speaks, magnifying the abundance of miraculous cures with which she heard the Jews were feasted, in comparison with which a single cure was but as a crumb. Perhaps she had heard of Christ's feeding five thousand lately at once, after which, there could not but be some crumbs left for the dogs.

4. The grant Christ thereupon made of her request. For this saying, Go thy way, thou shalt have what thou camest for, the devil is gone out of thy daughter, v. 29. This encourages us to pray and not to faint, not doubting but to prevail at last. Christ's saying that it was done, did it effectually, for (v. 30) she came to her house, depending upon the word of Christ, and so she found it, the devil was gone out. Christ can conquer Satan at a distance. She found her daughter not in any toss or agitation, but very quietly laid on the bed, and reposing herself; waiting for her mother's return, to rejoice with her, that she was so finely well.

Our Lord Jesus seldom stayed long in a place. When he had cured the woman of Canaan's daughter, he had done what he had to do in that place, and returned to the sea of Galilee. He did not come directly thither, but fetched a compass through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis, which lay mostly on the other side Jordan.

Now here we have the story of a cure that Christ wrought, which is not recorded by any other of the evangelists; it is of one that was deaf and dumb.

I. His case was sad, v. 32. There were those that brought to him one that was deaf; and he had an impediment in his speech. He was perfectly unfit for conversation, and deprived both of the pleasure and of the profit of it; he had not the satisfaction either of hearing other people talk, or of telling his own mind. Let us take occasion from hence to give thanks to God for preserving to us the sense of hearing, especially that we may be capable of hearing the word of God; and the faculty of speech, especially that we may be capable of speaking God's praises. They that brought this poor man to Christ, besought him that he would put his hand upon him. It is not said, They besought him to cure him, but to put his hand upon him, to take cognizance of his case, and put forth his power to do to him as he pleased.

II. His cure was solemn, and some of the circumstances of it were singular.

1. Christ took him aside from the multitude, v. 33. Ordinarily, he wrought his miracles publicly, but this he did privately. Let us learn of Christ to do good where no eye sees, but his.

2. He used more significant actions, in the doing of this cure, than usual. (1) He put his fingers into his ears. (2) He spit upon his own finger, and then touched his tongue, and so loosened that with which his tongue was tied; these were no causes that could in the least contribute to his cure, but only signs for the encouraging of his faith and theirs that brought him.

3. He looked up to heaven. Thus he signified that it was by a divine power. He also hereby directed his patient who could see, though he could not hear, to look up to heaven for relief.

4. He sighed; not as if he found any difficulty in working this miracle; thus he expressed his pity for the miseries of human life, and his sympathy with the afflicted in their afflictions, as one that was himself touched with the feeling of their infirmities.

5. He said, Ephphatha; that is, Be opened. Be opened, served both parts of the cure; "Let the ears be opened, let the lips be opened, let him hear and speak freely," and the effect was answerable (v. 35); Straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed. Happy he who, as soon as he had his hearing and speech, had the blessed Jesus so near him, to converse with.

Now this cure was, (1) A proof of Christ's being the Messiah; for it was foretold that by his power the ears of the deaf should be unstopped, and the tongue of the dumb should be made to sing, Isa. xxxv. 5, 6. (2) It was a specimen of the operations of his gospel upon the minds of men. The great command of the gospel, and grace of Christ to poor sinners, is Ephphatha—Be opened. He opens the heart, and thereby opens the ear to receive the word of God, and opens the mouth in prayer and praises.

6. He ordered it to be kept very private, but it was made very public. It was his humility, that he charged them they should tell no man, v. 36. Most men will proclaim their own goodness, or, at least, desire that others should proclaim it. We should take pleasure in doing good, but not in its being known. It was their zeal, that they published it, before Christ would have had it published. But they meant honestly, and therefore it is to be reckoned rather an act of indiscretion than an act of disobedience, v. 36. But they that told it, and they that heard it, were beyond measure astonished. This was said by everybody, it was the common verdict, He hath done all things well (v. 37). They are ready to witness for him, not only that he has done no evil, but that he has done a great deal of good, and has done it well, and all gratis, without money and without price. He maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak; and that is well, and therefore they are inexcusable who will speak ill of him.

CHAP. VIII

I. Christ's miraculous feeding of four thousand with seven loaves and a few small fishes, ver. 1–9. II. His refusing to give the Pharisees a sign from heaven, ver. 10–13. III. His cautioning his disciples to take heed of the leaven of Pharisaism and Herodianism, ver. 14–21. IV. His giving of sight to a blind man at Bethsaida, ver. 22–26. V. Peter's confession of him, ver. 27–30. VI. The notice he gave his disciples of his own approaching sufferings (ver. 31–33), and the warning he gave them to prepare for sufferings likewise, ver. 34–38.

Verses 1–9

We had the story of a miracle very like this before, in this gospel (ch. vi. 35), and of this same miracle (Matt. xv. 32).

1. Our Lord Jesus was greatly followed; The multitude was very great (v. 1); the common people, who had more honesty, and therefore more true wisdom, than their leaders, kept up their high thoughts of him. With such Christ conversed, and was familiar; this encouraged the meanest to come to him for life and grace.

2. They were with him three days, and had nothing to eat; that was hard service. Never let the Pharisee say, that Christ's disciples fast not. Yet they continued with Christ, and did not speak of leaving him till he spoke of dismissing them. True zeal makes nothing of hardships in the way of duty. It was an old saying among the Puritans, Brown bread and the gospel are good fare.

3. Christ said, I have compassion on the multitude. Whom the proud Pharisees looked upon with disdain, the humble Jesus looked upon with pity and tenderness. But that which he chiefly considers, is, They have been with me three days, and have nothing to eat. Whatever losses we sustain, or hardships we go through, for Christ's sake, and in love to him, he will take care that they shall be made up to us one way or other. Observe with what sympathy Christ saith (v. 3), If I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way. He considered that many of them came from afar, and had a great way home. When we see multitudes attending upon the word preached, it is comfortable to think that Christ knows whence they all come, though we do not. Christ would by no means have them go home fasting, for it is not his manner to send those empty away from him, that in a right manner attend on him.

4. The doubts of Christians are sometimes made to work for the magnifying of the power of Christ. The disciples could not imagine whence so many men should be satisfied with bread here in this wilderness, v. 4. That therefore must needs be wonderful, which the disciples looked upon as impossible.

5. Christ's time to act for the relief of his people, is, when things are brought to the last extremity. That he might not invite them to follow him for the loaves, he did not supply them but when they were utterly reduced, and then he sent them away.

6. The bounty of Christ is inexhaustible. Christ repeated this miracle. His favours are renewed, as our wants and necessities are. In the former miracle, Christ used all the bread he had, which was five loaves, and fed all the guests he had, which were five thousand. He might have said, "If five loaves would feed five thousand, four may feed four thousand"; he took all the seven loaves, and fed with them the four thousand; for he would teach us to use what we have, and make the best of that which is.

7. In our Father's house there is bread enough, and to spare. Those need not fear wanting, that have Christ to live upon.

8. It is good for those that follow Christ, to keep together. Christ fed them all. Christ's sheep must abide by the flock, and verily they shall be fed.

Verses 10–21

Still Christ is upon motion; now he visits the parts of Dalmanutha. Meeting with occasions of dispute, there, and not with opportunities of doing good, he entered into the ship again (v. 13), and came back.

I. How he refused to gratify the Pharisees, who challenged him to give them a sign from heaven. They came forth on purpose to question with him, that they might ensnare him.

1. They demanded of him a sign from heaven, as if the signs he gave them on earth were not sufficient. They demanded this sign, tempting him; not in hopes that he would give it them, that they might imagine themselves to have a pretence for their infidelity.

2. He denied them their demand; He sighed deeply in his spirit, v. 12. He groaned (so some), being grieved for the hardness of their hearts. It troubles him, that sinners should thus stand in their own light, and put a bar in their own door. He expostulates with them upon this demand; "Why doth this generation seek after a sign; this generation, that is so unworthy to have the gospel brought to it, and to have any sign accompanying it; this generation, that has had such plenty of sensible and merciful signs given them in the cure of their sick? What an absurdity is it for them to desire a sign!" (2) He refuses to answer their demand; Verily, I say unto you, there shall no sign be given to this generation. He denied them, and then left them, as men not fit to be talked with; if they will not be convinced, they shall not; leave them to their strong delusions.

II. How he warned his disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod. Observe here,

1. What the caution was (v. 15); "Take heed, beware, lest ye partake of the leaven of the Pharisees." Matthew adds, and of the Sadducees; Mark adds, and of Herod. The leaven of both was the same; they were unsatisfied with the signs they had, and would have others of their own devising; "Take heed of this leaven" (saith Christ), "be convinced by the miracles ye have seen."

2. How they misunderstood this caution. It seems, at their putting to sea this time, they had forgotten to take bread, and had not in their ship more than one loaf, v. 14. They reasoned among themselves, what should be the meaning of this caution, and concluded "It is because we have no bread." They reasoned it, they disputed about it; one said, "It was owing to you"; and the other said, "It was owing to you, that we are so ill provided for this voyage." Thus distrust of God makes Christ's disciples quarrel among themselves.

3. The reproof Christ gave them for their uneasiness in this matter. The reproof is given with some warmth, for he knew their hearts, and knew they needed to be thus soundly chidden; "Perceive ye not yet, neither understand? Have ye your hearts yet hardened? Having eyes, see ye not? Having ears, hear ye not? How strangely stupid and senseless are ye! Do ye not remember when I broke the five loaves among the five thousand, and soon after, the seven loaves among the four thousand? Do ye not remember how many baskets full ye took up of the fragments?" Yes, they did remember, and could tell that they took up twelve baskets full one time, and seven another; "Why, then," saith he, "how is it that ye do not understand? As if he that multiplied five loaves, and seven, could not multiply one." They seemed to suspect that that one was not matter enough to work upon. As if it were not all alike to the Lord, to save by many or few, and as easy to make one loaf to feed five thousand as five. It was therefore proper to remind them, not only of the sufficiency, but of the overplus, of the former meals. The experiences we have had of God's goodness to us in the way of duty, greatly aggravate our distrust of him. Our not understanding of the true intent and meaning of God's favours to us, is equivalent to our not remembering of them. We are therefore overwhelmed with present cares and distrusts, because we do not understand, and remember, what we have known and seen of the power and goodness of our Lord Jesus. When we thus forget the works of God, and distrust him, we should chide ourselves severely for it, as Christ doth his disciples here.

This cure is related only by this evangelist.

I. Here is a blind man brought to Christ by his friends, with a desire that he would touch him, v. 22. Here appears the faith of those that brought him; but the man himself showed not that earnestness for, or expectation of, a cure that other blind men did. If those that are spiritually blind, do not pray for themselves, yet let their friends and relations pray for them, that Christ would be pleased to touch them.

II. Here is Christ leading this blind man, v. 23. He did not bid his friends lead him, he himself took him by the hand, and led him. Never had poor blind man such a Leader. He led him out of the town. Had he herein only designed privacy, he might have led him into a house, into an inner chamber, and have cured him there. Perhaps Christ took the blind man out of the town, that he might have a larger prospect in the open fields, to try his sight with, than he could have in the close streets.

III. Here is the cure of the blind man. In this cure we may observe, 1. That Christ used a sign; he spat on his eyes, and put his hand upon him. He could have cured him, as he did others, with a word, but thus he was pleased to assist his faith which was very weak, and to help him against his unbelief. 2. That the cure was wrought gradually, which was not usual in Christ's miracles. He asked him if he saw aught, v. 23. And he looked up; and he said, I see men as trees walking; he could not distinguish men from trees, otherwise than that he could discern them to move. He had some glimmerings of sight, and betwixt him and the sky could perceive a man erect like a tree. 3. It was soon completed; Christ never doeth his work by the halves. He put his hands again upon his eyes, to disperse the remaining darkness, and then bade him look up again, and he saw every man clearly, v. 25. Now Christ took this way, (1) Because he would not tie himself to a method. He did not cure by rote. Providence gains the same end in different ways, that men may attend its motions with an implicit faith. (2) Because it should be to the patient according to his faith; and perhaps this man's faith was at first very weak, but afterward gathered strength, and accordingly his cure was. (3) Thus Christ would show how, and in what method, those are healed by his grace, who by nature are spiritually blind; at first, their knowledge is confused, they see men as trees walking; but like the light of the morning, it shines more and more to the perfect day, and then they see all things clearly.

IV. The directions Christ gave the man he had cured, not to tell it to any in the town of Bethsaida, nor so much as to go into the town. Christ doth not forbid him to tell it to others, but he must not tell it to any in the town. Slighting Christ's favours is forfeiting them; and Christ will make those know the worth of their privileges by the want of them, that would not know them otherwise. They will not see, and therefore shall not see.

We have read a great deal of the doctrine Christ preached, and the miracles he wrought. It is now time for us to pause a little, and to consider what these things mean. What shall we think of them? Is the record of these things designed only for an amusement, or to furnish us with matter for discourse? No, certainly these things are written, that we may believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God (John xx. 31). Three things we are here taught to infer from the miracles Christ wrought.

I. They prove that he is the Son of God, and Saviour of the world. This his disciples, who were the eye-witnesses of those works, here profess their belief of.

1. Christ enquired of them: Who do men say that I am? v. 27. Though it is a small thing for us to be judged of men, yet it may sometimes do us good to know what people say of us, not that we may seek our own glory, but that we may hear of our faults.

2. The account they gave him, was such as plainly intimated the high opinion the people had of him. Though they came short of the truth, yet they were convinced by his miracles that he was an extraordinary person, with a divine commission. None of the people said that he was a Deceiver, but some said that he was John Baptist, others Elias, others one of the prophets, v. 28. All agreed that he was one risen from the dead.

3. The account they gave him of their own sentiments concerning him. But whom say ye that I am? To this they have an answer ready, Thou art the Christ, the Messiah often promised, and long expected, v. 29. This they knew, and must shortly publish and maintain; but for the present they must keep it secret (v. 30), till the proof of it was completed, and they were completely qualified to maintain it.

II. These miracles of Christ take off the offence of the cross, and assure us that Christ was, in it, not conquered, but a Conqueror. Now that the disciples are convinced that Jesus is the Christ, they may bear to hear of his sufferings, v. 31.

1. Christ taught his disciples that he must suffer many things, Though they had got over the vulgar error of the Messiah's being a temporal Prince, yet still they retained it, so far as to expect that he would shortly restore the kingdom to Israel. Christ here gives them a prospect of the contrary, that he must be rejected of the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes; that, instead of being crowned, he must be killed, he must be crucified, and after three days he must rise again to a heavenly life, and to be no more in this world. This he spoke openly (v. 32). He said it freely and plainly, and did not wrap it up in ambiguous expressions. He spoke it cheerfully and without any terror, and would have them to hear it so: he spoke that saying boldly, as one that not only knew he must suffer and die, but made it his own act and deed.

2. Peter opposed it; He took him, and began to rebuke him. Here Peter showed more love than discretion, a zeal for Christ, and his safety, but not according to knowledge. He took hold of him, as it were to stop and hinder him, took him in his arms, and embraced him (so some understand it); or he took him aside privately, and began to rebuke him. This was not the language of the least authority, but of the greatest affection. Our Lord Jesus allowed his disciples to be free with him, but Peter here took too great a liberty.

3. Christ checked him for his opposition (v. 33); He turned about, and looked on his disciples, to see if the rest of them were of the same mind, and he said, Get thee behind me, Satan. Peter little thought to have had such a sharp rebuke, but perhaps expected as much commendation now for his love as he had lately had for his faith. Christ knows what manner of spirit we are of, when we ourselves do not. (1) Peter spoke as one that did not rightly understand the purposes and counsels of God. The most potent enemies could not overpower him whom diseases and deaths, whom winds and waves and devils themselves, were forced to obey and yield to. He looked upon his death only as a martyrdom which he thought might be prevented. He knew not that the thing was necessary for the glory of God, the destruction of Satan, and the salvation of man, that the Captain of our salvation must be made perfect through sufferings. The wisdom of man is perfect folly, when it pretends to give measures to the divine counsels. The cross of Christ was to some a stumbling-block, and to others foolishness. (2) Peter spoke as one that did not rightly understand the nature of Christ's kingdom; he took it to be temporal and human, whereas it is spiritual and divine. Thou savourest not the things that are of God, but those that are of men. Peter seemed to mind more the things that relate to the lower world, than those which relate to the upper world, and the life to come. Minding the things of men more than the things of God, and his glory and kingdom, is a very great sin, and the root of much sin, and very common among Christ's disciples. Thou art not wise (so it may be read) in the things of God, but in the things of men. It seems policy to shun trouble, but if with that we shun duty it will be folly in the end.

III. These miracles of Christ should engage us all to follow him, whatever it cost us, not only as they were confirmations of his mission, but as they were explications of his design; plainly intimating that by his Spirit he would do that for our blind, deaf, lame, leprous, diseased, possessed souls, which he did for the bodies of those many who in those distresses applied themselves to him. This is written, that we may believe that he is the great Physician of souls, and may become his patients. He called all the people to him, to hear this. This is that which all are concerned to know, and consider, if they expect Christ should heal their souls.

1. They must not be indulgent of the ease of the body; for (v. 34), "Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and live a life of self-denial; let him not pretend to be his own physician, and let him take up his cross, and thus let him continue to follow me." Those that will be Christ's patients must attend on him, converse with him, receive instruction and reproof from him, and must resolve they will never forsake him.

2. They must not be solicitous, no, not for the life of the body, when they cannot keep it without quitting Christ, v. 35. Are we invited by the words and works of Christ to follow him? Let us sit down, and count the cost, whether we can prefer our advantages by Christ before life itself. When the devil is drawing away disciples and servants after him, he conceals the worst of it. What there is of trouble and danger in the service of Christ, he tells us of it before, and is not afraid that we should know the worst; because the advantages of his service abundantly suffice to balance the discouragements, if we will but impartially set the one over against the other.

(1) We must not dread the loss of our lives in the cause of Christ (v 35); Whosoever will save his life, by declining Christ, or by disowning him after he has in profession come to Christ, he shall lose it, and all his hopes of eternal life; such a bad bargain will he make for himself. But whosoever shall lose his life, shall be truly willing to lose it, when he cannot keep it without denying Christ, he shall save it, he shall be an unspeakable gainer. It is looked upon to be some kind of recompence to those who lose their lives in the service of their prince and country, to have their memories honoured and their families provided for; but what is that to the recompence which Christ makes in eternal life to all that die for him?

(2) We must dread the loss of our souls (v. 36, 37); For what shall it profit a man, if he should gain the whole world, by denying Christ, and lose his own soul? "True it is," said Bishop Hooper, the night before he suffered martyrdom, "that life is sweet, and death is bitter, but eternal death is more bitter, and eternal life is more sweet." The gain of all the world in sin, is not sufficient to countervail the ruin of the soul by sin.

What that is that men do, to save their lives, and gain the world, he tells us (v. 38), Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, in his adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed. The disadvantage that the cause of Christ labours under in this world, is, that it is to be owned and professed in an adulterous and sinful generation. Some ages, some places, are more especially sinful, as that was in which Christ lived; in such a generation the cause of Christ is opposed and run down, and those that own it, are exposed to reproach and contempt, and everywhere ridiculed and spoken against. There are many, who, though they cannot but own that the cause of Christ is a righteous cause, are ashamed of it. They are ashamed of their relation to Christ. They cannot bear to be frowned upon and despised, and therefore throw off their profession. There is a day coming, when the cause of Christ will appear as bright and illustrious as now it appears mean and contemptible. They shall not share with him in his glory then, that were not willing to share with him in his disgrace now.

CHAP. IX

I. Christ's transfiguration upon the mount, ver. 1–13. II. His casting the devil out of a child, when the disciples could not do it, ver. 14–29. III. His prediction of his own sufferings and death, ver. 30–32. IV. The check he gave to his disciples for disputing who should be greatest (ver. 33–37); and to John for rebuking one who cast out devils in Christ's name, and did not follow with them, ver. 38–41. V. Christ's discourse with his disciples of the danger of offending one of his little ones (ver. 42), and of indulging that in ourselves, which is an offence and an occasion of sin to us (ver. 43–50).

Verses 1–13

I. A prediction of Christ's kingdom now near approaching, v. 1. That which is foretold is, 1. That the kingdom of God would come, and would come so as to be seen. 2. That it would come with power, and bear down the opposition that was given to it. 3. That it would come while some now present were alive; There are some standing here, that shall not taste of death, till they see it.

II. A specimen of that kingdom in the transfiguration of Christ, six days after Christ spoke that prediction. He gives them this glimpse of his glory, to show that his sufferings were voluntary, and to prevent the offence of the cross.

1. It was on the top of a high mountain. Tradition saith, It was on the top of Mount Tabor that Christ was transfigured.

2. The witnesses of it were Peter, James, and John; these were the three that were to bear record on earth, answering to Moses, Elias, and the voice from heaven.

As there are distinguishing favours which are given to disciples and not to the world, so there are to some disciples and not to others. All the saints are a people near to Christ, but some lie in his bosom. James was the first of all the twelve that died for Christ, and John survived them all, to be the last eye-witness of this glory; he bore record (John i. 14); We saw his glory: and so did Peter, 2 Pet. i. 16–18.

3. The manner of it; He was transfigured before them. See what a great change human bodies are capable of, when God is pleased to put an honour upon them. His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow, beyond what the fuller's art could do toward whitening it.

4. His companions in this glory were Moses and Elias (v. 4); They appeared talking with him, to testify to him. Moses and Elias lived at a great distance of time one from another, but that breaks no squares in heaven, where the first shall be last, and the last first, that is, all one in Christ.

5. The great delight that the disciples took in seeing this sight, and hearing this discourse, is expressed by Peter; He said, Master, it is good for us to be here, v. 5. Though Christ was transfigured, and was in discourse with Moses and Elias, yet he gave Peter leave to speak to him. Many, when they are in their greatness, oblige their friends to keep their distance; but even to the glorified Jesus true believers have access with boldness. Even in this heavenly discourse there was room for Peter to put in a word; and this is it, "Lord, it is good to be here, for let us make tabernacles." Gracious souls reckon it good to be in communion with Christ, good to be in the mount with him. If it is good to be with Christ transfigured only upon a mountain with Moses and Elias, how good will it be to be with Christ glorified in heaven with all the saints! But observe, While Peter was for staying here, he forgot what need there was of the presence of Christ among the people. At this very time, the other disciples wanted them greatly, v. 14. When it is well with us, we are apt to be mindless of others. It was a weakness in Peter to prefer private communion with God before public usefulness. Peter talked of making three distinct tabernacles for Moses, Elias, and Christ, which was not well-contrived. One tabernacle will hold them all; they dwell together in unity. But whatever was incongruous in what he said, he may be excused, for they were all sore afraid; and he, for his part, wist not what to say (v. 6).

6. The voice that came from heaven, was an attestation of Christ's mediatorship, v. 7. There was a cloud that overshadowed them. Peter had talked of making tabernacles for Christ and his friends; but while he yet spoke God created his tabernacle not made with hands. Now out of this cloud it was said, This is my beloved Son, hear him. God owns him, and accepts him, as his beloved Son.

7. The vision disappeared (v. 8); Suddenly when they had looked round about all was gone, they saw no man any more. Jesus only remained with them, and he not transfigured, but as he used to be. Christ doth not leave the soul, when extraordinary joys and comforts leave it. Christ's disciples have, and shall have, his ordinary presence with them always, even to the end of the world. Let us thank God for daily bread, and not expect a continual feast on this side heaven.

8. The discourse between Christ and his disciples, as they came down from the mount.

(1) He charged them to keep this matter very private, till he was risen from the dead, v. 9. He, being now in a state of humiliation, would have nothing publicly taken notice of, that might seem disagreeable to such a state. This enjoining of silence to the disciples, would likewise be of use to them, to prevent their boasting. It is a mortification to a man, to be tied up from telling of his advancements, and may help to hide pride from him.

(2) The disciples were at a loss what the rising from the dead should mean. Here is another thing that embarrasses them (v. 11). Why say the Scribes, Elias must first come? But Elias was gone, and Moses too. The scribes taught them to expect the person of Elias, whereas the prophecy intended one in the spirit and power of Elias.

(3) Christ gave them a key to the prophecy concerning Elias (v. 12, 13); "It is indeed prophesied that Elias will come, and will restore all things. It is also prophesied of the Son of man that he must suffer many things, and be set at nought. Though the scribes do not tell you so, the scriptures do, and you have as much reason to expect that as the other. But as to Elias, I tell you he is come; and if you consider a little, you will understand whom I mean, it is one to whom they have done whatsoever they listed." The true Elias, as well as the true Messiah promised, is come, and we are to look for no other. He is come, and hath been, and done, according as was written of him.

We have here the story of Christ's casting the devil out of a child.

I. Christ's return to his disciples, and the perplexity he found them in. Christ's glory above does not make him forget the concerns of his church below, v. 14. And he came very seasonably, when the disciples were embarrassed and run a-ground. A child possessed with a devil was brought to them, and they could not cast out the devil, whereupon the scribes triumphed as if the day were their own. He found the scribes questioning with them. Christ's return was very welcome, no doubt, to the disciples, and *un*welcome to the scribes. But particular notice is taken of its being very surprising to the people. When they beheld him coming to them again, they were greatly amazed; and running to him, they saluted him. It is easy to give a reason why they should be glad to see him; but why were they amazed, greatly amazed, when they beheld him? Probably, there might remain something unusual in his countenance. Instead of seeming fatigued, there appeared a wonderful briskness and sprightliness in his looks, which amazed them.

II. The case which perplexed the disciples, brought before him. He asked the scribes, "What question ye with them? What is the quarrel now?" The scribes made no answer, for they were confounded at his presence; the disciples made none, for they were comforted, and now left all to him. But the father of the child opened the case, v. 17, 18. 1. His child is possessed with a dumb spirit, and in his fits is speechless; wheresoever the fit takes him, the spirit tears him, throws him into such violent convulsions as almost pull him to pieces; and, he foams at the mouth, and gnashes with his teeth. Though the fits go off presently, yet they leave him so weak, that he pines away, is worn to a skeleton. 2. The disciples cannot give him any relief; "I desired they would cast him out, but they could not; and therefore thou couldest never have come in better time; Master, I have brought him to thee."

III. The rebuke he gave to them all (v. 19); O faithless generation, how long shall I be with you? How long shall I suffer you? Them he calls a faithless generation, and speaks as one weary of being with them, and of bearing with them. "How long shall I be among these faithless people, and suffer them?"

IV. The deplorable condition that the child was actually in, when he was brought to Christ, and the doleful representation which the father made of it.

When the child saw Christ, he fell into a fit; The spirit straightway tore him, as if the devil would set Christ at defiance, and hoped to be too hard for him too, and to keep possession in spite of him. The child fell on the ground, and wallowed foaming. Christ asked, How long since this came to him? And, it seems, the disease was of long standing; it came to him of a child (v. 21), which made the case the more sad, and the cure the more difficult.

V. The pressing instances which the father of the child makes with Christ for a cure (v. 22); Oft-times it hath cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him. But if thou canst do anything, have compassion on us, and help us. The leper was confident of Christ's power, but put an if upon his will (Matt. viii. 2); If thou wilt, thou canst. This poor man referred himself to his goodwill, but put an if upon his power.

VI. The answer Christ gave to his address (v. 23); If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth. He tacitly checks the weakness of his faith. The sufferer put it upon Christ's power, If thou canst do anything; but Christ turns it upon him, and puts him upon questioning his own faith, and will have him impute the disappointment to the want of that; If thou canst believe. He graciously encourages the strength of his desire; "All things are possible to him that believes the almighty power of God, to which all things are possible." In dealing with Christ, very much is put upon our believing, and very much promised to it. Canst thou believe? Darest thou believe? If thou canst believe, it is possible that thy hard heart may be softened, thy spiritual diseases may be cured; and that, weak as thou art, thou mayest be able to hold out to the end.

VII. The profession of faith which the poor man made hereupon (v. 24); He cried out, "Lord, I believe; my cure shall not be prevented by the want of faith; Lord, I believe." He adds a prayer for grace to enable him more firmly to rely upon Christ to save; Help thou my unbelief. Those that complain of unbelief, must look up to Christ for grace to help them against it, and his grace shall be sufficient for them. "Help mine unbelief; help out what is wanting in my faith with thy grace, the strength of which is perfected in our weakness."

VIII. The cure of the child. Christ saw the people come running together, and therefore kept them in suspense no longer, but rebuked the foul spirit. 1. What the charge was which Christ gave to this unclean spirit; "Thou dumb and deaf spirit come out of him immediately, and enter no more into him. Let him not only be brought out of this fit, but let his fits never return." Whom Christ cures, he cures effectually. Satan may go out himself, and yet recover possession; but if Christ cast him out, he will keep him out. 2. How the unclean spirit took it; he grew yet more outrageous, he cried, and rent him sore, gave him such a twitch at parting, that he was as one dead. Many said, He is dead. 3. How the child was perfectly restored (v. 27); Jesus took him by the hand, took fast hold of him, and strongly bore him up, and he arose and recovered, and all was well.

IX. The reason he gave to the disciples why they could not cast out this devil. They enquired of him privately why they could not, and he told them (v. 29), This kind can come forth by nothing but prayer and fasting. The disciples must not think to do their work always with a like ease; but Christ can do that with a word's speaking, which they must prevail for the doing of by prayer and fasting.

I. Christ foretells his own approaching sufferings. He passed through Galilee, and would not that any man should know it (v. 30). The time of his sufferings drew nigh, and therefore he was willing to converse only with his disciples, to prepare them for the approaching trial, v. 31. He said to them, The Son of man is delivered into the hands of men (v. 31), and they shall kill him. That men, who have reason, and should have love, that they should be thus spiteful to the Son of man, who came to redeem and save them, is unaccountable. But still it is observable that when Christ spoke of his death, he always spoke of his resurrection. But they understood not that saying, v. 32. The words were plain enough, but they could not be reconciled to the thing, and they were afraid to ask him. Many remain ignorant because they are ashamed to enquire.

II. He rebukes his disciples for magnifying themselves. When he came to Capernaum, he privately asked his disciples what it was that they disputed among themselves by the way, v. 33. As our other discourses among ourselves by the way, so especially our disputes, will be all called over again, and we shall be called to an account about them. Of all disputes, Christ will be sure to reckon with his disciples for their disputes about precedency and superiority: that was the subject of the debate here, who should be the greatest, v. 34. Nothing could be more contrary to the two great laws of Christ's kingdom, which are humility and love, than desiring preferment in the world, and disputing about it. This ill temper he took all occasions to check. They were willing to cover this fault (v. 34); they held their peace. As they would not ask (v. 32), because they were ashamed to own their ignorance, so here they would not answer because they were ashamed to own their pride. He was willing to amend this fault in them, and therefore sat down, that he might have a solemn and full discourse with them. He called the twelve to him, and told them, 1. That ambition, instead of gaining them preferment in his kingdom, would but postpone their preferment; If any man desire and aim to be first, he shall be last; he that exalteth himself, shall be abased. 2. That there is no preferment to be had under him, but an opportunity for, and an obligation to, so much the more labour and condescension. 3. That those who are most humble and self-denying, do most resemble Christ, and shall be most tenderly owned by him. He took a child in his arms. "Look you," saith he; "whosoever shall receive one like this child, receives me. Those of a humble, meek, mild disposition are such as I will own and countenance, and so will my Father too, for he who thus receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me."

III. While they are striving which of them should be greatest, they will not allow those who are not in communion with them to be anything.

1. The account which John gave him, of the restraint they had laid upon one from making use of the name of Christ, because he was not of their society. Master, saith John, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, but he followeth not us, v. 38. (1) It was strange that one who was not a professed disciple and follower of Christ, should yet have power to cast out devils, in his name, for that seemed to be peculiar to those whom he called. And why might not he receive that power from Christ, whose Spirit, like the wind, blows where it listeth, without such an outward call as the apostles had? And perhaps there were many more such. Christ's grace is not tied to the visible church. (2) It was strange that one who cast out devils in the name of Christ, did not join himself to the apostles, and follow Christ with them, but should continue to act in separation from them. I know of nothing that could hinder him from following them, unless because he was loth to leave all to follow them. The thing did not look well, and therefore the disciples forbade him to make use of Christ's name as they did, unless he would follow him as they did. Thus apt are we to imagine that those do not follow Christ at all, who do not follow him with us, and that those do nothing well, who do not just as we do. But the Lord knows them that are his, however they are dispersed.

2. The rebuke he gave to them for this (v. 39); Jesus said, "Forbid him not." That which is good, and doeth good, must not be prohibited, though there may be some defect or irregularity in the manner of doing it. If Christ be preached, Paul therein doth, and will rejoice, though he be eclipsed by it, Phil. i. 18. Two reasons Christ gives why such should not be forbidden. (1) Because we cannot suppose that any man who makes use of Christ's name in working miracles, should blaspheme his name, as the scribes and Pharisees did. (2) Because those that differed in communion, while they agreed to fight against Satan under the banner of Christ, ought to look upon one another as on the same side. He that is not against us is on our part. As to the great controversy between Christ and Beelzebub, he had said, He that is not with me is against me, Matt. xii. 30. He that will not own Christ, owns Satan. But as to those that own Christ, that follow him, though not with us, we must reckon that they are not against us, and therefore are on our part.

I. Christ promiseth a reward to all those that are any way kind to his disciples (v. 41); "Whosoever shall give you a cup of water because you belong to Christ, he shall not lose his reward." It is the honour and happiness of Christians, that they belong to Christ; they wear his livery as retainers to his family; nay, they are more nearly related, they are members of his body. The relieving of Christ's poor in their distresses, is a good deed; he accepts it, and will reward it. What kindness is done to Christ's poor, must be done them for his sake, and because they belong to him; for that is it that sanctifies the kindness. This is a reason why we must not discountenance and discourage those who are serving the interests of Christ's kingdom, though they are not in everything of our mind and way. If Christ reckons kindnesses to us services to him, we ought to reckon services to him kindnesses to us, and to encourage them, though done by those that follow not with us.

II. He threatens those that offend his little ones, v. 42. Whosoever shall grieve any true Christians, though they be of the weakest, shall either restrain them from doing good, or draw them in to commit sin, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea: his punishment will be very great.

III. He warns all his followers to take heed of ruining their own souls. This charity must begin at home; if we must take heed of doing anything to hinder others from good, much more careful must we be to avoid everything that will take us off from our duty, or lead us to sin; and that which doth so we must part with, though it be ever so dear to us. Observe,

1. The case supposed, that our own hand, or eye, or foot, offends us; that the impure corruption we indulge is as dear to us as an eye or a hand. Suppose the beloved is become a sin, or the sin a beloved. Suppose we must part with it, or part with Christ and a good conscience.

2. The duty prescribed in that case; Pluck out the eye, cut off the hand and foot, mortify the darling lust, crucify it. Let the idols that have been delectable things, be cast away as detestable things. It is necessary that the part which is gangrened should be taken off for the preservation of the whole. Self must be denied, that it may not be destroyed.

3. The necessity of doing this. The flesh must be mortified, that we may enter into life (v. 43, 45), into the kingdom of God, v. 47. Though, by abandoning sin, we may, for the present, feel ourselves as if we were halt and maimed, yet it is for life; and all that men have, they will give for their lives. These halts and maims will be the marks of the Lord Jesus, will be in that kingdom scars of honour.

4. The danger of not doing this. The matter is brought to this issue, that either sin must die, or we must die. If we be ruled by sin, we shall inevitably be ruined by it. With what an emphasis of terror are those words repeated three times here, Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched! The reflections and reproaches of the sinner's own conscience are the worm that dieth not. The wrath of God fastening upon a guilty and polluted conscience, is the fire that is not quenched; for it is the wrath of the living God, into whose hands it is a fearful thing to fall. Philo saith, The punishment of the wicked is to live for ever dying.

The last two verses are somewhat difficult, and interpreters agree not in the sense of them; for every-one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Therefore have salt in yourselves. It was appointed by the law of Moses, that every sacrifice should be salted with salt, not to preserve it but because it was the food of God's table. The nature of man, being corrupt, and as such being called flesh, some way or other must be salted, in order to its being a sacrifice to God. Our chief concern is, to present ourselves living sacrifices to the grace of God (Rom. xii. 1), and, in order to our acceptableness, we must be salted with salt. We must have in our souls a savour of grace. Those that have the salt of grace, must make it appear that they have it; that they have salt in themselves, a living principle of grace in their hearts, which works out all corrupt dispositions. Our speech must be always with grace seasoned with this salt, that no corrupt communication may proceed out of our mouth, but we may loathe it as much as we would to put putrid meat into our mouths. As this gracious salt will keep our own consciences void of offence, so it will keep our conversation with others so, that we may not offend any of Christ's little ones. We must not only have this salt of grace, but we must always retain the relish and savour of it; for if this salt lose its saltness, wherewith will ye season it? They who will not be salted with the salt of divine grace, will be salted with fire. The pleasures they have lived in, shall eat their flesh, as it were fire. Now since this will certainly be the doom of those that do not crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts, let us, knowing this terror of the Lord, be persuaded to do it.

CHAP. X

I. Christ's dispute with the Pharisees concerning divorce, ver. 1–12. II. The kind entertainment he gave to the little children that were brought to him to be blessed, ver. 13–16. III. His trial of the rich man that enquired what he must do to get to heaven, ver. 17–22. IV. His discourse with his disciples, upon that occasion (v. 23–27), and the advantage of being impoverished for his sake, ver. 28–31. V. The repeated notice of his sufferings and death approaching, ver. 32–34. VI. The counsel he gave to James and John, to think of suffering with him, ver. 15–45. VII. The cure of Bartimæus, ver. 46–52.

Verses 1–12

Our Lord Jesus did not continue long in a place, for the whole land of Canaan was his parish, and therefore he would visit every part of it. Here we have him in the coasts of Judæa, eastward, as we found him, not long since, in the utmost borders westward, near Tyre and Sidon. Thus was his circuit like that of the sun, from whose light and heat nothing is hid.

I. Resorted to by the people, v. 1. They came to him again, and, as he was wont, he taught them again. He did as he was wont. In Matthew it is said, He healed them; here it is said, He taught them. His teaching was healing to poor souls. He taught them again. Such is the fulness of the Christian doctrine, that there is still more to be learned; and such our forgetfulness, that we need to be reminded of what we do know.

II. Disputed with by the Pharisees.

1. A question they started concerning divorce (v. 2); Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? They proposed it, tempting him, seeking an occasion against him, which side soever he should take of the question. Ministers must stand upon their guard, lest, under pretence of being advised with, they be ensnared.

2. Christ's reply to them with a question (v. 3); What did Moses command you? This he asked them, to testify his respect to the law of Moses, and to show that he came not to destroy it.

3. The fair account they gave of the law of Moses, expressly concerning divorce, v. 4. Christ asked, What did Moses command you? They own that Moses only suffered, or permitted, a man to write his wife a bill of divorce, and to put her away, Deut. xxiv. 1.

4. The answer that Christ gave to their question, in which he abides by the doctrine he had formerly laid down in this case (Matt. v. 32), That whosoever puts away his wife, except for fornication, causeth her to commit adultery. He here shows,

(1) That the reason why Moses, in his law, permitted divorce, was only for the hardness of their hearts (v. 5).

(2) That the account which Moses, in this history, gives of the institution of marriage, affords such a reason against divorce, as amounts to a prohibition of it.

Moses tells us, God made man male and female, one male, and one female; so that Adam could not put away his wife and take another. The law was, That a man must leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife (v. 7); which intimates not only the nearness of the relation, but the perpetuity of it. The result of the relation is, that, though they are two, yet they are one, they are one flesh, v. 8. The union between them is a sacred thing that must not be violated. God himself has joined them together; he has in wisdom and goodness appointed them who are thus joined together, to live together in love till death parts them. Marriage is not an invention of men, but a divine institution. The bond which God himself has tied, is not to be lightly untied.

5. Christ's discourse with his disciples, in private, about this matter, v. 10–12. It was an advantage to them, that they had opportunity of personal converse with Christ, not only about gospel mysteries, but about moral duties. No more is here related of this private conference, than the law Christ laid down in this case—That it is adultery for a man to put away his wife, and marry another; it is adultery against the wife he puts away, v. 11. He adds, If a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, she commits adultery (v. 12). Wisdom and grace, holiness and love, reigning in the heart, will make those commands easy which to the carnal mind may be as a heavy yoke.

It is looked upon as the indication of a kind and tender disposition to take notice of little children, and this was remarkable in our Lord Jesus, which is an encouragement not only to little children to apply themselves to Christ, but to grown people, who are conscious to themselves of weakness and childishness, and of being helpless and useless, like little children.

I Little children brought to Christ, v. 13. It doth not appear that they needed any bodily cure, nor were they capable of being taught. They that had the care of them were mostly concerned about their souls, their better part. They believed that Christ's blessing would do their souls good; and therefore to him they brought them, that he might touch them, knowing that he could reach their hearts, when nothing their parents could say to them, or do for them, would reach them. We may present our children to Christ, now that he is in heaven, and therein we may act faith upon the fulness and extent of his grace, and the promise to us and to our children.

II. The *dis*couragement which the disciples gave to the bringing of children to Christ; They rebuked them that brought them.

III. The *en*couragement Christ gave to it. He took it very ill that his disciples should keep them off; When he saw it, he was much displeased, v. 14. Christ is very angry with his own disciples, if they discountenance any in coming to him themselves, or in bringing their children to him. He ordered that they should be brought to him; suffer little children to come to me. Little children are welcome betimes to the throne of grace with their Hosannas. He came to set up the kingdom of God among men, and took this occasion to declare that that kingdom admitted little children to be the subjects of it. There must be something of the temper and disposition of little children found in all that Christ will own and bless. We must receive the kingdom of God as little children (v. 15); that is, we must stand affected to Christ and his grace as little children do to their parents, nurses, and teachers. We must be inquisitive, as children, must learn as children, and in learning must believe. The mind of a child is white paper, you may write upon it what you will; such must our minds be to the pen of the blessed Spirit. Children are under government; so must we be. Little children depend upon their parents' wisdom and care, are carried in their arms, and take what they provide for them; and thus must we receive the kingdom of God, with a humble resignation of ourselves to Jesus Christ, and an easy dependence upon him. He received the children, and gave them what was desired (v. 16); He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them. They begged he would touch them, but he did more. He took them in his arms. He shall gather the lambs in his arms, and carry them in his bosom. Time was, when Christ himself was taken up in old Simeon's arms, Luke ii. 28. And now he took up these children, not complaining of the burthen, but pleased with it. He put his hands upon them. He blessed them. Our children are happy, if they have but the Mediator's blessing for their portion.

Verses 17–31

I. Here is a hopeful meeting between Christ and a young man; such he is said to be (Matt. xix. 20, 22), and a ruler (Luke xviii. 18).

1. He came running to Christ; he laid aside the gravity and grandeur of a ruler; he manifested his earnestness and importunity; he ran as one in haste. He had now an opportunity of consulting this great Prophet, and he would not let slip the opportunity.

2. He came to him when he was in the way, in the midst of company.

3. He kneeled to him, in token of the great value and veneration he had for him, and his earnest desire to be taught by him. He bowed the knee, as one that meant to bow the soul to him.

4. His address to him was serious and weighty; Good Master, what shall I do, that I may inherit eternal life? He thinks it a thing possible, that he may inherit eternal life, looking upon it not only as set before us, but as offered to us. Most men enquire for good to be had in this world, he asks for good to be done in this world; not, Who will make us to see good? But, "Who will make us to do good?" He enquires for happiness in the way of duty. Now this was, (1) A very serious question. Then there begins to be some hope of people, when they begin to enquire solicitously, what they shall do to get to heaven. (2) It was proposed to a right person, one that was every way fit to answer it, being himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life; who came from heaven on purpose, first to make, and then to make known, the way to heaven. It is peculiar to the Christian religion, both to show eternal life, and to show the way to it. (3) It was proposed with a good design—to be instructed. We find this same question put by a lawyer (Luke x. 25), with a bad design; he tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do? It is not so much the good words as the good intention of them that Christ looks at.

5. Christ encouraged this address by assisting his faith, v. 18. He called him good Master; Christ would have him mean thereby, that he looked upon him to be God, since there is none good but one, that is God. Our English word God doubtless hath affinity with good. Further, he directed his practice (v. 19); Keep the commandments. He mentions the six commandments of the second table, which prescribe our duty to our neighbour. The fifth commandment is here put last, as that which should especially be remembered and observed, to keep us to all the rest.

6. The young man bid fair for heaven, having been free from any open gross violations of the divine commands. Master, all these have I observed from my youth. He thought he had, and his neighbours thought so too. He that could say he was free from scandalous sin, went further than many in the way to eternal life.

7. Christ had a kindness for him; Jesus, beholding him, loved him, v. 21. Christ particularly loves to see young people, and rich people, asking the way to heaven, with their faces thitherward.

II. Here is a sorrowful parting between Christ and this young man.

1. Christ gave him a command of trial. Has he indeed his heart upon it? Bring him to the touchstone. Can he find in his heart to part with his riches for the service of Christ? Let him know the worst now; if he will not come up to these terms, let him quit his pretensions; as good at first as at last. "Sell whatsoever thou hast; and be a father to the poor." Every man, according to his ability, must relieve the poor. Worldly wealth is given us as a talent, to be used and employed for the glory of our great Master in the world, who hath so ordered it, that the poor we should have always with us as his receivers. Can he find in his heart to go through the hardest, costliest services he may be called to as a disciple of Christ, and depend upon him for a recompence in heaven? Doth he really believe there is a treasure in heaven sufficient to make up all he can leave, or lose, or lay out, for Christ? Is he willing to deal with Christ upon trust? Can he give him credit for all he is worth; and be willing to bear a present cross, in expectation of a future crown?

2. Upon this he flew off (v. 22); He was sad at that saying; was sorry that he could not be a follower of Christ upon any easier terms, that he could not lay hold on eternal life, and keep hold of his temporal possessions too. But since he could not come up to the terms of discipleship, he was so fair as not to pretend to it; He went away grieved. Here appeared the truth of that (Matt. vi. 24), Ye cannot serve God and mammon; while he held to mammon he did in effect despise Christ. He bids for what he has a mind for in the market, yet goes away grieved, and leaves it, because he cannot have it at his own price.

III. Here is Christ's discourse with his disciples. We are tempted to wish that Christ had mollified that saying and taken off the hardness of it: but he knew all men's hearts; he would not court him to be his follower, because he was a rich man and a ruler; but, if he will go, let him go. Christ will keep no man against his will.

1. The difficulty of the salvation of those who have an abundance of this world; because there are few who have a deal to leave, that can be persuaded to leave it for Christ.

(1) Christ asserts this here; He looked about upon his disciples; How hardly shall they who have riches enter into the kingdom of God! v. 23. They have many temptations to grapple with, and many difficulties to get over, which lie not in the way of poor people. But he explains himself, v. 24, where he calls the disciples children, because as such they should be taught by him. Whereas he had said, How hardly will those who have riches get to heaven; here he tells them, that the danger arose not so much from their having riches as from their trusting to them. They that have such a value as this for the wealth of the world, will never be brought to put a right value upon Christ and his grace. They that have ever so much riches, but do not trust in them, have got over the difficulty, and can easily part with them for Christ: but they that have ever so little, if they set their hearts upon that little, it will keep them from Christ. He enforces this assertion with, v. 25, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. [1] Some imagine there might be some wicket-gate, or door, to Jerusalem, commonly known by the name of the needle's eye, for its straitness, through which a camel could not be got, unless he were unloaded. So a rich man cannot get to heaven, unless he be willing to part with the burthen of his worldly wealth, and stoop to the duties of a humble religion. [2] Others suggest that the word we translate a camel, sometimes signifies a cable-rope. A rich man, compared with the poor, is as a cable to a single thread, and it will not go through the needle's eye, unless it be untwisted. So the rich man must be loosed and disentangled from his riches, that thread by thread he may be got through the eye of the needle, otherwise he is good for nothing but to cast anchor in the earth.

(2) This truth was very surprising to the disciples; They were astonished at his words, v. 24. They were astonished out of measure, and said among themselves, Who then can be saved? They knew what abundance of promises there were, in the Old Testament, of temporal good things; they knew likewise that they who are rich have so much the larger opportunities of doing good, and therefore were amazed to hear that it should be so hard for rich people to go to heaven.

(3) Christ reconciled them to it, by referring it to the almighty power of God, to help even rich people over the difficulties that lie in the way of their salvation (v. 27); He looked upon them: "With men it is impossible, but the grace of God can do it, for with him all things are possible,"

2. The greatness of the salvation of those that have but a little of this world, and leave it for Christ. This he speaks of, upon occasion of Peter's mentioning what he and the rest of the disciples had left to follow him; Behold (saith he), we have left all to follow thee, v. 28. "You have done well," saith Christ, "you shall be abundantly recompensed, and not only you shall be reimbursed, who have left but a little, but those that have ever so much, though it were so much as this young man had." (1) The loss is supposed to be very great; he specifies, Worldly wealth; houses are here put first, and lands last: a man may quit his house, which should be for his habitation, and his land, which should be for his maintenance; or his dear relations. Father and mother, wife and children, brethren and sisters. Without these the world would be a wilderness; yet, when we must either forsake these or Christ, we must remember that we stand in nearer relation to Christ than we do to any creature. The greatest trial of a good man's constancy is, when his love to Christ comes to stand in competition with a love that is lawful, nay, that is his duty. It is easy to such a one to forsake a lust for Christ; but to forsake a father, a brother, a wife, for Christ, that is, to forsake those whom he knows he must love, is hard. And yet he must do so, rather than deny or disown Christ. It is not the suffering, but the cause, that makes the martyr. And therefore, (2) The advantage will be great. They shall receive a hundred-fold in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters. He shall have abundance of comfort while he lives, sufficient to make up all his losses. Suffering Christians shall have a hundred-fold in the comforts of the Spirit sweetening their creature comforts. It is added here in Mark, with persecutions. Even when they are gainers by Christ, let them still expect to be sufferers for him. They shall have eternal life in the world to come. If they receive a hundred-fold in this world, one would think they should not be encouraged to expect any more. Yet, as if that were a small matter, they shall have life eternal into the bargain. But because they talked so much, and really more than became them, of leaving all for Christ, he tells them, though they were first called, that there should be disciples called after them, that should be preferred before them. Then the first were last, and the last first.

I. Christ's prediction of his own sufferings.

1. See here how bold he was; when they were going up to Jerusalem, Jesus went before them, v. 32. Now that the time was at hand, more than ever, he pressed forward. Jesus went before them, and they were amazed. They began now to consider what imminent danger they ran themselves into, when they went to Jerusalem; and they were ready to tremble at the thought of it. To hearten them, therefore, Christ went before them. When we see ourselves entering upon sufferings, it is encouraging to see our Master go before us. Or, He went before them, and therefore they were amazed; they admired to see with what cheerfulness and alacrity he went on. Christ's courage and constancy are, and will be, the wonder of all his disciples.

2. See here how timorous and faint-hearted his disciples were; As they followed, they were afraid. Their Master's courage should have put spirit into them.

3. See here what method he took to silence their fears. He did not go about to make the matter better than it was, but told them again the things that should happen to him. He knew the worst of it, and therefore went on thus boldly, and he will let them know the worst of it. Come, be not afraid. He shall rise again; the issue of his sufferings will be glorious to himself, and advantageous to all that are his, v. 33, 34. The method and particulars of Christ's sufferings are more largely foretold here than in any other of the predictions. Christ had a perfect foresight, not only of his own death, but of all the aggravating circumstances of it; and yet he thus went forth to meet it.

II. The check he gave to two of his disciples for their ambitious request. This story is much the same here as we had it Matt. xx. 20. Only there they are said to have made their request by their mother, here they are said to make it themselves. As, on the one hand, there are some that do not use, so, on the other hand, there are some that abuse, the great encouragements Christ has given us in prayer. It was a culpable presumption in these disciples to make such a boundless demand upon their Master; We would that thou shouldst do for us whatsoever we shall desire. We had much better leave it to him to do for us what he sees fit, and he will do more than we can desire, Eph. iii. 20. We must be cautious how we make general promises. What would ye that I should do for you? He would have them go on with their suit, that they might be made ashamed of it. James and John conclude, If Christ rise again, he must be a king, and if he be a king, his apostles must be peers, and one of these would willingly be the first peer of the realm, and the other next him. To be good should be more our care than to look great, or to have the pre-eminence. Our weakness and short-sightedness appear as much in our prayers as in any thing. It is folly to *pre*scribe to God, and wisdom to *sub*scribe. It is the will of Christ that we should prepare for sufferings, and leave it to him to recompense us for them. Our care must be, that we may have wisdom and grace to know how to suffer with him, and then we may trust him to provide in the best manner how we shall reign with him.

III. The check he gave to the rest of the disciples, for their uneasiness at it. They began to be much displeased, to have indignation about James and John, v. 41. They were angry at them for affecting precedency, because each of them hoped to have it himself. So these discovered their own ambition, in their displeasure at the ambition of James and John; and Christ took this occasion to warn them against it, v. 42–44. He called them to him in a familiar way, to give them an example of condescension. He shows them,

1. That dominion was generally abused in the world (v. 42); They that seem to rule over the Gentiles, they exercise lordship over them, that is all they study and aim at. Their care is, what they shall get by their subjects to support their own pomp and grandeur, not what they shall do for them.

2. That therefore it ought not to be admitted into the church; "It shall not so be among you; those that shall be put under your charge, must be as sheep under the charge of the shepherd, who is to tend them and feed them, and be a servant to them, not as horses under the command of the driver, that works them and beats them, and gets his pennyworths out of them. He that affects to be great and chief, he shall be servant of all. He that would be truly great and chief, he must lay out himself to do good to all. Those not only shall be most honoured hereafter, but are most honourable now, who are most useful." To convince them of this, he sets before them his own example (v. 45). He takes upon him the form of a servant, comes not to be ministered to, and waited upon, but to minister. He becomes obedient to death, for he gives his life a ransom for many.

This passage of story agrees with that in Matt. xx. 29, &c. Only that there we were told of two blind men; here, and Luke xviii. 35, only of one: but if there were two, there was one. This one is named here; he was called Bartimæus, that is, the son of Timæus.

I. This blind man sat begging. Those who are disabled to get a livelihood by their own labour, are the most proper objects of charity; and particular care ought to be taken of them.

II. He cried out; Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David. Misery is the object of mercy.

III. Christ encouraged him, for he stood still, and commanded him to be called. We must never reckon it a hindrance to us in our way, to stand still, when it is to do a good work. Those about him, who had discouraged him at first, perhaps were now the persons that signified to him the gracious call of Christ; "Be of good comfort, rise, he calls thee." The gracious invitations Christ gives us to come to him, are great encouragements to our hope, that we shall have what we come for.

IV. The poor man, hereupon, cast away his loose upper garment, and came to Jesus (v. 50); he cast away everything that might be in danger of throwing him down, or might any way hinder him. Those who would come to Jesus must cast away the garment of their own sufficiency, and the sin that, like long garments, doth most easily beset them, Heb. xii. 1.

V. The particular favour he begged, was, that his eyes might be opened; that so he might be able to work for his living, and might be no longer burthensome to others.

VI. This favour he received; his eyes were opened (v. 52). "Thy faith hath made thee whole; not thy importunity, but thy faith, setting Christ on work, or rather Christ setting thy faith on work." Those supplies are most comfortable, that are fetched in by our faith. When he had received his sight, he followed Jesus by the way. By this he made it appear that he was thoroughly cured, that he no more needed one to lead him. When he had his sight, he made this use of it. It is not enough to come to Christ for spiritual healing, but, when we are healed, we must continue to follow him. Those that have spiritual eye-sight, see that beauty in Christ, that will effectually draw them to run after him.

CHAP. XI

We are now come to the Passion-Week, and the great occurrences of that week. I. Christ's riding in triumph into Jerusalem, ver. 1–11. II. His cursing the barren fig-tree, ver. 12–14. III. His driving those out of the temple that turned it into an exchange, ver. 15–19. IV. His discourse with his disciples on occasion of the withering of the fig-tree he cursed, ver. 20–26. V. His reply to those who questioned his authority, ver. 27–33.

Verses 1–11

We have here the story of the public entry Christ made into Jerusalem. And he came into town thus remarkably, 1. To show that he was not afraid of the power and malice of his enemies in Jerusalem. He did not steal into the city incognito, as one that durst not show his face. 2. To show that he was not cast down or disquieted at the thoughts of his approaching sufferings. He came, not only publicly, but cheerfully.

I. The outside of this triumph was very mean; he rode upon an ass's colt. This colt was borrowed too. Christ went upon the water in a borrowed boat, ate the passover in a borrowed chamber, was buried in a borrowed sepulchre, and here rode on borrowed ass. Let not Christians scorn to be beholden one to another, and, when need is, to go borrowing, for our Master did not. He had no rich trappings; they threw their clothes upon the colt, and so he sat upon him, v. 7. All the show they could make was, by spreading their garments in the way, and strewing branches of trees in the way (v. 8), as they used to do at the feast of tabernacles. They are instructions to us, not to mind high things, but to condescend to them of low estate. How ill doth it become Christians to take state, when Christ was so far from affecting it!

II. The inside of this triumph was very great. Christ showed his knowledge of things distant, and his power over the wills of men, when he sent his disciples for the colt, v. 1–3. He showed his dominion over the creatures in riding on a colt that was never backed. Perhaps Christ, in riding the ass's colt, would give a shadow of his power over the spirit of man, who is born as the wild ass's colt, Job xi. 12. The colt was brought from a place where two ways met (v. 4), as if Christ would show that he came to direct those into the right way, who had two ways before them, and were in danger of taking the wrong. Christ received the joyful hosannas of the people. It was God that put it into the hearts of these people to cry Hosanna.

(1) They welcomed his person (v. 9); Blessed is he that cometh, so often promised, so long expected; he comes in the name of the Lord; Blessed be he: let him have our applauses, and best affections; he is a blessed Saviour, and brings blessings to us, and blessed be he that sent him.

(2) They wished well to his interest, v. 10. They believed that he had a kingdom, that it was the kingdom of their father David; a kingdom that came in the name of the Lord. Blessed be this kingdom; let it come in the power of it. Let it go on conquering, and to conquer. Hosanna to this kingdom; all happines attend it.

Christ, thus attended, thus applauded, came into the city, and went directly to the temple. He came to the temple, and took a view of the present state of it, v. 11. He looked round about upon all things, but as yet said nothing. He let things be as they were for this night, intending the next morning to apply himself to the necessary reformation. We may be confident that God sees all the wickedness that is in the world, though he do not presently reckon for it, nor cast it out. Christ, having made his remarks upon what he saw in the temple, retired in the evening to a friend's house at Bethany.

I. Christ's cursing the fruitless fig-tree. He returned in the morning, at working-time; and so intent was he upon his work, that he went out from Bethany without breakfast, and was hungry (v. 12). He went to a fig-tree, being well adorned with green leaves which he hoped to find enriched with some fruit. But he found nothing but leaves; he hoped to find some fruit, for though the time of gathering in figs was near, it was not yet. There was not so much as one fig to be found upon it, though it was so full of leaves. However, Christ was willing to make an example of it, not to the trees, but to the men, of that generation, and therefore cursed it. He said unto it, Never let any man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever, v. 14. This was intended to be a type and figure of the doom passed upon the Jewish church, to which he came, seeking fruit, but found none (Luke xiii. 6, 7). The disciples heard what sentence Christ passed on this tree, and took notice of it. Woes from Christ's mouth are to be observed and kept in mind, as well as blessings.

II. His clearing the temple of the market people that frequented it, and of those that made it a thoroughfare. He came, hungry as he was, to Jerusalem, and went straight to the temple, and began to reform those abuses which the day before he had marked out. He came not, as he was falsely accused, to destroy the temple, but to purify and refine it.

1. He cast out the buyers and sellers, overthrew the tables of the money-changers (and threw the money to the ground, the fitter place for it), and threw down the seats of them that sold doves. And he did it without opposition; for what he did, was manifested to be right and good, even in the consciences of those that had connived at it, and countenanced it, because they got money by it. It may be some encouragement to zealous reformers, that frequently the purging out of corruptions, and the correcting of abuses, prove an easier piece of work than was apprehended. Prudent attempts sometimes prove successful beyond expectation.

2. He would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel through the temple, v. 16. The Jews owned that it was one of the instances of honour due to the temple, not to make the mountain of the house, or the court of the Gentiles, a road, or common passage, or to come into it with any bundle.

3. He gave a good reason for this; because it was written, My house shall be called of all nations, The house of prayer, v. 17. It shall pass among all people under that character. It shall be the house of prayer to all nations; it was so in the first institution of it. Christ will have the temple to be, (1) A house of prayer. After he had turned out the oxen and doves, which were things for sacrifice, he revived the appointment of it as a house of prayer. (2) That it should be so to all nations, and not to the people of the Jews only; for whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved. When Christ drove out the buyers and sellers at the beginning of his ministry, he only charged them with making the temple a house of merchandise (John ii. 16); but now he chargeth them with making it a den of thieves. Those that suffer vain worldly thoughts to lodge within them when they are at their devotions, turn the house of prayer into a house of merchandise; but they that make long prayers for a pretence to devour widows' houses, turn it into a den of thieves.

4. The scribes and the chief priests were extremely nettled at this, v. 18. They hated him, and yet they feared him, lest he should next overthrow their seats, and expel them. They found that all the people were astonished at his doctrine, and that everything he said was an oracle and a law to them; and what durst he not attempt, being thus supported? They therefore sought, not how they might make their peace with him, but how they might destroy him. They care not what they do, to support their own power and grandeur.

III. His discourse with his disciples, upon occasion of the fig-tree's withering away. At even, as usual, he went out of the city (v. 19), to Bethany. The next morning, as they passed by, they observed the fig-tree dried up from the roots, v. 20. The curse was no more than that it should never bear fruit again, but the effect goes further, it is dried up from the roots. If it bear no fruit, it shall bear no leaves to cheat people.

1. How the disciples were affected with it. Peter remembered Christ's words, and said, with surprise, Master, behold, the fig-tree which thou cursedst is withered away, v. 21. Christ's curses have wonderful effects, and make those to wither that flourished like the green bay-tree. And this seemed very strange to the disciples. They could not imagine how that fig-tree should so soon wither away: but this comes of rejecting Christ, and being rejected by him.

2. The good instructions Christ gave them from it; for of those even this withered tree was fruitful.

(1) Christ teacheth them from hence to pray in faith (v. 22); Have faith in God. They admired the power of Christ's word of command; "Why," saith Christ, "a lively active faith would put as great a power into your prayers, v. 23, 24. Whosoever shall say to this mountain, Be removed, and be cast into the sea; and if he shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he saith." Through the strength and power of God in Christ, the greatest difficulty shall be got over, and the thing shall be effected. And therefore (v. 24), "What things soever ye desire, when ye pray believe that ye shall receive them; nay, believe that ye do receive them, and he that has power to give them, saith, Ye shall have them. I say unto you, Ye shall, v. 24. Verily I say unto you, Ye shall," v. 23. Now this is to be applied, [1] To that faith of miracles which the apostles and first preachers of the gospel were endued with. [2] It may be applied to that miracle of faith, which all true Christians are endued with. It justifies us (Rom. v. 1), and so removes mountains of guilt, and casts them into the depths of the sea. It purifies the heart (Acts xv. 9), and so removes mountains of corruption. It is by faith that the world is conquered, Satan's fiery darts are quenched, a soul is crucified with Christ, and yet lives.

(2) To this is added here that necessary qualification of the prevailing prayer, that we freely forgive, and be in charity with all men (v. 25, 26); When ye stand praying, forgive. When we are at prayer, we must remember to pray for others, particularly for our enemies, and those that have wronged us. If we have injured others before we pray, we must go and be reconciled to them, Matt. v. 23, 24. But if they have injured us, we go a nearer way to work, and must immediately from our hearts forgive them; because this is a good step towards obtaining the pardon of our own sins: Forgive, that your Father may forgive you; because the want of this is a certain bar to the obtaining of the pardon of our sins; "If ye do not forgive, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." This ought to be remembered in prayer, because one great errand we have to the throne of grace, is, to pray for the pardon of our sins. Our Saviour often insists on this, for it was his great design to engage his disciples to love one another.

We have here Christ examined by the great Sanhedrim concerning his authority. They came to him when he was walking in the temple, teaching the people. The cloisters, in the courts of the temple, were fitted for this purpose. The great men came to him, and did as it were arraign him at the bar with this question, By what authority doest thou these things? v. 28.

I. How they designed hereby to run him aground, and embarrass him. If they could make it out before the people, that he had not a legal mission, that he was not duly ordained, they would tell the people that they ought not to hear him. This they made the last refuge of an obstinate unbelief; they were resolved to find some flaw or other in his commission. This is indeed a question, which all that act either as magistrates or as ministers, ought to be furnished with a good answer to, By what authority do I these things? For how can men preach except they be sent?

II. How he effectually ran them aground, and embarrassed them, with this question, "What are your thoughts concerning the baptism of John? Was it from heaven, or of men? Answer me," v. 30. By the resolving of their question into this, our Saviour intimates how near akin his doctrine and baptism were to John's; they had the same design and tendency—to introduce the gospel kingdom.

They knew what they thought of this question; they could not but think that John Baptist was a man sent of God. But the difficulty was, what they should say to it now.

1. If they own the baptism of John to be from heaven, they shame themselves; for Christ will presently turn it upon them, Why did ye not then believe him? They could not bear that Christ should say this, but they could bear it that their own consciences should say so.

2. If they say, "It is of men, he was not sent of God," they expose themselves; the people will be ready to do them a mischief; for all men counted John that he was a prophet indeed. There is a carnal slavish fear, which not only wicked subjects but wicked rulers likewise are liable to. (1) They were confounded and forced to make a dishonourable retreat; to pretend ignorance—We cannot tell. What Christ did by his wisdom we must labour to do by our well doing—put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, 1 Pet. ii. 15. (2) Christ justified himself in refusing to give them an answer to their imperious demand; Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things. They did not deserve to be told; nor did he need to tell them, since no man could do those miracles which he did unless God were with him.

CHAP. XII

I. The parable of the vineyard let out to unthankful husbandmen, ver. 1–12. II. A question about paying tribute to Caesar, ver. 13–17. III. His silencing the Sadducees, ver. 18–27. IV. His conference with a scribe about the first and great command of the law, ver. 28–34. V. A question about Christ's being the Son of David, ver. 35–37. VI. The caution he gave the people, to take heed of the scribes, ver. 38–40. VII. His commendation of the poor widow that cast her two mites into the treasury, ver. 41–44.

Verses 1–12

Christ had formerly in parables showed how he designed to set up the gospel church; now he begins in parables to show how he would lay aside the Jewish church.

I. They that enjoy the privileges of the visible church, have a vineyard let out to them, from the occupiers of which rent is justly expected. Members of the church are God's tenants, and they have both a good Landlord and a good bargain, and may live well upon it, if it be not their own fault.

II. Those whom God lets out his vineyard to, he sends his servants to, to put them in mind of his just expectations from them, v. 2.

III. It is sad to think what base usage God's faithful ministers have met with, in all ages. The Old Testament prophets were persecuted. They beat them, and sent them empty away (v. 3); that was bad: they wounded them, and sent them away shamefully entreated (v. 4); that was worse: nay, at length, they came to such a pitch of wickedness, that they killed them, v. 5.

IV. It was no wonder if those who abused the prophets, abused Christ himself. God did at length send them his Son, his well-beloved. And it might be expected that he whom their Master loved, they also should respect and love (v. 6); "They will reverence my son." But, instead of reverencing him because he was the son and heir, they therefore hated him, v. 7. They were the more enraged against him, and determined to put him to death, that all the respect might be paid to them only; "The inheritance shall be ours." There is an inheritance, which, if they had duly reverenced the Son, might have been theirs, a heavenly inheritance. So they took him, and killed him; and they cast him out of the vineyard.

V. For such sinful and shameful doings nothing can be expected but a fearful doom (v. 9); What shall therefore the Lord of the vineyard do?

1. He will come, and destroy the husbandmen. When they killed his servants, and his Son, he determined to destroy them; and this was fulfilled when Jerusalem was laid waste.

2. He will give the vineyard to others. This was fulfilled in the taking in of the Gentiles, and the abundance of fruit which the gospel brought forth in all the world, Col. i. 6. If some from whom we expected well, prove bad, it doth not follow but that others will be better.

3. Their opposition to Christ's exaltation shall be no obstruction to it (v. 10, 11); The stone which the builders rejected, is become the Head of the corner. God will set Christ as his King, upon his holy hill of Zion. And all the world shall see and own this to be the Lord's doing.

Now what effect had this parable upon the chief priests and scribes? They knew he spoke this parable against them, v. 12. They could not but see their own faces in the glass of it. (1) They sought to lay hold on him, and make him their prisoner immediately, and so to fulfil what he had just now said they would do to him, v. 8. (2) Nothing restrained them from it but the awe they stood in of the people; they did not reverence Christ, nor had any fear of God before their eyes. (3) They left him, and went their way; if they could not do hurt to him, they resolved he should not do good to them, and therefore they got out of the hearing of his powerful preaching. If men's prejudices be not conquered by the evidence of truth, they are but confirmed. If the gospel be not a savour of life unto life, it will be a savour of death unto death.

Here we have him tempted, or *at*tempted rather, with a question about the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar.

I. The persons they employed were the Pharisees and the Herodians, v. 13. The Pharisees were great sticklers for the liberty of the Jews, and, if he should say, It is lawful to give tribute to Caesar, they would incense the common people against him. The Herodians were great sticklers for the Roman power, and, if he should discountenance the paying of tribute to Caesar, they would incense the governor against him. It is no new thing for those that are at variance in other things, to join in a confederacy against Christ.

II. The pretence they made was, that they desired him to resolve them a case of conscience, v. 14. They complimented him at a high rate, called him Master, owned him for a Teacher of the way of God, a Teacher of it in truth, who would not be brought by smiles or frowns to depart a step from the rules of equity and goodness; "Thou carest for no man, nor regardest the person of men; thou art right, and dost in a right manner declare good and evil, truth and falsehood." They knew that he taught the way of God in truth, and yet rejected the counsel of God against themselves.

III. The question they put was, Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar, or not? They would be thought desirous to know their duty. Really they desired nothing but to know what he would say, in hopes that, which side soever he took of the question, they might take occasion from it to accuse him. They seemed to refer the determining of this matter to Christ; they put the question fairly, Shall we give, or shall we not give? They seemed resolved to stand to his award. Many seem desirous to know their duty, who are no ways disposed to do it.

IV. Christ determined the question, and evaded the snare, v. 15–17. He knew their hypocrisy. Hypocrisy, though ever so artfully managed, cannot be concealed from the Lord Jesus. He sees the potsherd that is covered with the silver dross. He knew they intended to ensnare him, and therefore contrived the matter so as to ensnare them. He made them acknowledge that the current money of their nation was Roman money, had the emperor's image on one side, and his superscription on the reverse; and if so, 1. Caesar might command their money for the public benefit. Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's. The circulation of the money is from him as the fountain, and therefore it must return to him. 2. Caesar might not command their consciences, nor did he pretend to it. "Pay your tribute, therefore, without murmuring or disputing, but be sure to render to God the things that are God's." Many that seem careful to give to men their due, are in no care to give to God the glory due to his name. All that heard Christ, marvelled at the discretion of his answer, but I doubt none were brought by it, as they ought to be, to render to God themselves and their devotions. Many will commend the wit of a sermon, that will not be commanded by the divine laws of a sermon.

Verses 18–27

The Sadducees, who were the deists of that age, here attack our Lord Jesus. They were not bigots and persecutors, but sceptics and infidels, and their design was upon his doctrine. They denied that there was any resurrection, any world of spirits, any state of rewards and punishments on the other side of death; now those great and fundamental truths which they denied, Christ had made it his business to establish and prove, and therefore they set themselves to perplex his doctrine.

I. See here the method they take to entangle it; they quote the ancient law, by which, if a man died without issue, his brother was obliged to marry his widow, v. 19. They suppose a case to happen that, according to that law, seven brothers were, successively, the husbands of one woman, v. 20. Probably, these Sadducees intended hereby to ridicule that law. Those who deny divine truths, commonly set themselves to disparage divine laws and ordinances. Their design was to expose the doctrine of the resurrection; for they suppose that if there be a future state, it must be such a one as this, and then the doctrine, they think, is clogged either with this invincible absurdity, that a woman in that state must have seven husbands, or else with this insolvable difficulty, whose wife she must be. See with what subtlety these heretics undermine the truth; they do not deny it, they do not seem to doubt of it. They pretend to own the truth, as if they were not Sadducees. They take it for granted that there is a resurrection, and would be thought to desire instruction concerning it, when really they are designing to give it a fatal stab, and think that they shall do it. It is the common artifice of heretics and Sadducees to perplex and entangle the truth, which they have not the impudence to deny.

II. See here the method Christ takes to clear and establish this truth. This was a matter of moment, and therefore Christ does not pass it over lightly, but enlarges upon it.

1. He charges the Sadducees with error, and charges that upon their ignorance. Do ye not therefore err? Ye cannot but be sensible of it yourselves, and that the cause of your error is, (1) Because ye do not know the scriptures. Not but that the Sadducees had read the scriptures, and perhaps were ready in them; yet they might be truly said not to know the scriptures, because they did not know the sense and meaning of them, but put false constructions upon them. A right knowledge of the scripture, as the fountain whence all revealed religion now flows, and the foundation on which it is built, is the best preservative against error. Keep the truth, the scripture-truth, and it shall keep thee. (2) Because ye know not the power of God. They could not but know that God is almighty, but they would not apply that doctrine to this matter, but gave up the truth to the objections of the impossibility of it. The power of God, seen in the return of the spring (Ps. civ. 30), in the reviving of the corn (John xii. 24), in the restoring of an abject people to their prosperity (Ezek. xxxvii. 12–14), in the raising of so many to life, miraculously, both in the Old Testament and in the New, and especially, in the resurrection of Christ (Eph. i. 19, 20), are all earnests of our resurrection by the same power (Phil. iii. 21); according to the mighty working whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself.

2. He sets aside all the force of their objection, by setting the doctrine of the future state in a true light (v. 25); When they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage. It is a folly to ask, Whose wife shall she be of the seven? It is no wonder if we confound ourselves with endless absurdities, when we measure our ideas of the world of spirits by the affairs of this world of sense.

III. He builds the doctrine of the future state, and of the blessedness of the righteous in that state, upon the covenant of God with Abraham, which God was pleased to own, after Abraham's death, v. 26, 27. He appeals to the scriptures; Have ye not read in the book of Moses? Now that which he refers them to is, what God said to Moses at the bush, I am the God of Abraham; not only, I was so, but I am so. It is absurd to think that God's relation to Abraham should be continued, and thus solemnly recognized, if Abraham was annihilated, or that the living God should be the portion and happiness of a man that is dead, and must be for ever so. You must conclude, 1. That Abraham's soul exists and acts in a state of separation from the body. 2. That therefore, some time or other, the body must rise again. Upon the whole matter, he concludes, Ye therefore do greatly err. Those that deny the resurrection, greatly err, and ought to be told so.

Only we have here an account of one of them, a scribe, who had so much civility in him as to take notice of Christ's answer to the Sadducees, and to own that he had answered well, and much to the purpose (v. 28). We have his application to Christ for instruction, and it was such as became him; not tempting Christ, but desiring to improve his acquaintance with him.

I. He enquired, Which is the first commandment of all? v. 28. He doth not mean the first in order, but the first in weight and dignity. Not that any commandment of God is little, but some are greater than others, moral precepts than rituals, and of some we may say, They are the greatest of all.

II. Christ gave him a direct answer to this enquiry, v. 29–31. Those that sincerely desire to be instructed concerning their duty, Christ will guide in judgment, and teach his way. He tells him,

1. That the great commandment of all, which is indeed inclusive of all, is, that of loving God with all our hearts. Where this is the commanding principle in the soul, there is a disposition to every other duty. Love is the leading affection of the soul; the love of God is the leading grace in the renewed soul. Where this is not, nothing else that is good is done. Loving God with all our heart, will effectually take us off from all those things that are rivals with him for the throne in our souls. No commandment will be grievous where this principle commands, and has the ascendant. Now here in Mark, our Saviour prefixes to this command the great doctrinal truth upon which it is built (v. 29); Hear, O Israel, The Lord our God is one Lord; if we firmly believe this, it will follow, that we shall love him with all our heart. If he be one, our hearts must be one with him, and since there is no God besides, no rival must be admitted with him upon the throne.

2. That the second great commandment is, to love our neighbour as ourselves (v. 31), and we must show it by doing as we would be done by. As we must therefore love God better than ourselves, so we must love our neighbour as ourselves, because he is of the same nature with ourselves; and if a fellow-Christian, and of the same sacred society, the obligation is the stronger. Hath not one God created us? Has not one Christ redeemed us? Well might Christ say, There is no other commandment greater than these; for in these all the law is fulfilled, and if we make conscience of obedience to these, all other instances of obedience will follow of course.

III. The scribe consented to what Christ said, v. 32, 33. 1. He commends Christ's decision of this question; Well, Master, thou hast said the truth. It shall be brought in evidence against those who persecuted Christ, as a deceiver, that one of themselves confessed that he said the truth, and said it well. And thus must we subscribe to Christ's sayings, must set to our seal that they are true. 2. He comments upon it. Christ had quoted that great doctrine, that the Lord our God is one Lord; and this he not only assented to, but added, "There is none other but he." This excludes all rivals with him, and secures the throne in the heart entire for him. Christ had laid down that great law, of loving God with all our heart; and this also he explains—that it is loving him with the understanding. Our love to God, as it must be an entire, so it must be an intelligent, love; we must love him with all the understanding; our rational powers and faculties must all be set on work to lead out the affections of our souls toward God. Christ had said, "To love God and our neighbour is the greatest commandment of all"; "Yea," saith the scribe, "it is more than all whole-burnt offerings and sacrifices, more acceptable to God." There were those who held, that the law of sacrifices was the greatest commandment of all; but this scribe readily agreed with our Saviour in this—that the law of love to God and our neighbour is greater than that of sacrifice, even than that of whole-burnt-offerings.

IV. Christ approved of what he said, and encouraged him to proceed in his enquiries of him, v. 34. 1. He owned that he understood well, as far as he went; so far, so good. Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, and was the more pleased with it, because he had of late met with so many that answered indiscreetly. He answered as one that had a mind; as one that had his wits about him; whose judgment was not biassed. He answered as one that allowed himself liberty and leisure to consider, and as one that had considered. 2. He owned that he stood fair for a further advance; "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God, the kingdom of grace and glory." There is hope of those who make a good use of the light they have, and go as far as that will carry them, that by the grace of God they will be led further. What became of this scribe we are not told, but would willingly hope that he took the hint Christ hereby gave him, and that he proceeded to enquire of him what was the great commandment of the gospel too. Yet, if he did not, we are not to think it strange; for there are many who are not far from the kingdom of God, and yet never come thither. No man, after that, durst ask him any question; those that desired to learn, were ashamed to ask, and those that designed to cavil, were afraid to ask.

Verses 35–40

I. Christ shows the people how weak and defective the scribes were in their preaching, and how unable to solve the difficulties that occurred in the scriptures of the Old Testament. Of this he gives an instance, which is not so fully related here as it was in Matthew.

1. They told the people that the Messiah was to be the Son of David (v. 35), and they were in the right. The people took it as what the scribes said; whereas the truths of God should rather be quoted from our Bibles than from our ministers, for there is the original of them.

2. Yet they could not tell them how to call him his Lord, as he doth, Ps. cx. 1. They had taught the people that concerning the Messiah, which would be for the honour of their nation—that he should be a branch of their royal family; but they had not taken care to teach them that he should be the Son of God, and, as such, and not otherwise, David's Lord. If any should object, How then doth David himself call him Lord? they would not know how to avoid the force of the objection. Note, Those are unworthy to sit in Moses's seat, who, though they are able to preach the truth, are not in some measure able to defend it when they have preached it, and to convince gainsayers.

Now this galled the scribes, to have their ignorance thus exposed; but the common people heard him gladly, v. 37. What he preached was surprising and affecting, and they had never heard such preaching. Probably there was something more than ordinarily commanding and charming in his voice and way of delivery which recommended him to the affections of the common people; for we do not find that any were wrought upon to believe in him, and to follow him. And perhaps some of these cried, Crucify him, as Herod heard John Baptist gladly, and yet cut off his head.

II. He cautions the people to take heed of suffering themselves to be imposed upon by the scribes; He said unto them in his doctrine, "Beware of the scribes" (v. 38).

1. They affect to appear very great; for they go in long clothing, as princes, or judges. Their going in such clothing was not sinful, but their loving to go in it, this was a product of pride. Christ would have his disciples go with their loins girt.

2. They affect to appear very good; for they pray, they make long prayers. They took care it should be known that they prayed, that they prayed long. This they did for a pretence, that they might seem to love prayer.

3. They coveted applause, and were fond of it; they loved salutations in the market-places, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms at feasts. To have these given them, they thought, expressed the value they had for them, who did know them, and gained them respect for those who did not.

4. They herein aimed to enrich themselves. They devoured widows' houses; it was to screen themselves from the suspicion of dishonesty, that they put on the mask of piety; and that they might not be thought as bad as the worst, they were studious to seem as good as the best. Let not prayers, no nor long prayers, be thought the worse of, if made in humility and sincerity, for their having been by some thus abused. Iniquity, thus disguised with a show of piety, is double iniquity, so its doom will be doubly heavy; These shall receive greater damnation.

This passage of story was not in Matthew, but is here and in Luke; it is Christ's commendation of the poor widow, that cast two mites into the treasury.

I. There was a public fund for charity, a poor's-box, and this in the temple; for works of charity and works of piety very fitly go together. We often find prayers and alms in conjunction, as Acts x. 2, 4. It is good for those to lay by as God has prospered them (1 Cor. xvi. 2), that they may have something ready to give when an object of charity offers itself.

II. Jesus Christ has an eye upon it; He sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast money into it. Our Lord Jesus takes notice of what we contribute to pious and charitable uses; whether we give liberally or sparingly; whether we do it as unto the Lord, or only to be seen of men.

III. He saw many that were rich cast in much: and it was a good sight to see rich people charitable, to see many rich people so, and to see them cast in much. Those that are rich, ought to give richly; if God give abundantly to us, he expects we should give abundantly.

IV. There was a poor widow that cast in two mites, which make a farthing (v. 42); and our Lord Jesus highly commended her; called his disciples to him, and bid them take notice of it (v. 43); told them that she could very ill spare that which she gave, it was all her living. He reckoned it more than all that put together, which the rich people threw in; for they did cast in of their abundance, but she of her want, v. 44. Now many would have been ready to censure this poor widow; why should she give to others, when she had little enough for herself? Charity begins at home. It is so rare a thing to find any that would not blame this widow, that we cannot expect to find any that will imitate her; and yet our Saviour commends her. We must hence learn, 1. That giving alms, is an excellent good thing, and highly pleasing to the Lord Jesus; he will graciously accept of it, though in some circumstances there may not be all the discretion in the world. 2. Those that have but a little, ought to give alms out of their little. We should in many cases pinch ourselves, that we may supply the necessities of others; this is loving our neighbours as ourselves. 3. Public charities should be encouraged, and though there may be some mismanagement of them, yet that is not a good reason why we should not bring in our quota to them. 4. Though we can give but a little in charity, it shall be accepted of Christ, who requires according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not; two mites shall be put upon the score, and brought to account, if given in a right manner, as if they had been two pounds. 5. It is much to the praise of charity, when we give not only to our power, but beyond our power, as the Macedonian churches, whose deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality, 2 Cor. viii. 2, 3, and trust God to provide for us some other way, this is thank-worthy.

CHAP. XIII

That prophetical sermon which our Lord Jesus preached, pointing at the destruction of Jerusalem, and the consummation of all things; preached only to four of his disciples. I. His disciples' admiring the buildings of the temple (ver. 1, 2), and their enquiry concerning the time of the desolation of them, ver. 3, 4. II. The predictions themselves, 1. Of the rise of deceivers, ver. 5, 6, 21–23. 2. Of the wars of the nations, ver. 7, 8. 3. Of the persecution of Christians, ver. 9–13. 4. Of the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 14–20. 5. Of the end of the world, ver. 24–27. III. Some general intimations concerning the time of them, ver. 28–32. IV. Some practical inferences from all, ver. 33–37.

Verses 1–4

I. How apt many of Christ's own disciples are to idolize things that look great, and have been long looked upon as sacred. One of them said to him, "Look, Master, what manner of stones, and what buildings are here (v. 1). We never saw the like in Galilee; O do not leave this fine place."

II. How little Christ values external pomp, where there is not real purity; "Seest thou these great buildings" (saith Christ)? "I tell thee, the time is at hand when there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down," v. 2. He looks with pity upon the ruin of precious souls, and weeps over them, for on them he has put a great value; but we do not find him look with any pity upon the ruin of a magnificent house, when he is driven out of it by sin. With what little concern doth he say, Not one stone shall be left on another! While any part remained standing, there might be some hopes of the repair of it; but what hope is there, when not one stone is left upon another?

III. How natural it is to us to desire to know things to come, and the times of them; more inquisitive we are apt to be about that than about our duty. His disciples knew not how to digest this doctrine, and therefore they were in pain till they got him alone, and got more out of him concerning this matter. As he was returning to Bethany therefore, he sat upon the mount of Olives, over against the temple; and there four of them agreed to ask him privately, what he meant by the destroying of the temple. Probably, Christ's discourse, in answer to it, was in the hearing of the rest of the disciples, yet privately, that is, apart from the multitude. Their enquiry is, When shall these things be? They will not question whether they shall be or no, but are willing to hope it is a great way off. "Tell us what shall be the sign, when all these things shall be fulfilled?"

Our Lord Jesus, in reply to their question, sets himself, not so much to satisfy their curiosity as to direct their consciences; but gives them the cautions which were needful, with reference to the events that should now shortly come to pass.

I. They must take heed that they be not deceived by the seducers and impostors that should now shortly arise (v. 5, 6); "Take heed lest any man deceive you. Many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ." After the Jews had rejected the true Christ, they were imposed upon by many false Christs. Those false Christs deceived many; Therefore take heed lest they deceive you. When many are deceived, we should thereby be awakened to look to ourselves.

II. They must take heed that they be not disturbed at the noise of wars, which they should be alarmed with, v. 7, 8. At some times the nations are more distracted and wasted with wars than at other times; so it shall be now; Christ was born into the world when there was a general peace, but soon after he went out of the world there were general wars; Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. "But be not troubled at it. Let it be no surprise to you; such things must needs be. Let it be no terror to you, you have no concern in them, and therefore need not be apprehensive of any damage by them." Those that despise the smiles of the world, and do not court and covet them, may despise the frowns of the world, and need not fear them. "Let it not be looked upon as an omen of the approaching period of the world, for the end is not yet (v. 7). Think not that these wars will bring the world to a period. Let it not be looked upon as if in them God had done his worst. Be not troubled at the wars you shall hear of, for they are but the beginnings of sorrows, and therefore, you ought to prepare for worse; for there shall also be earthquakes in divers places, and there shall be famines and troubles. The world shall be full of troubles, but be not ye troubled; but fear not ye their fear." The disciples of Christ may enjoy a holy security and serenity of mind, when all about them is in the greatest disorder.

III. They must take heed that they be not drawn away from Christ by the sufferings they should meet with for Christ's sake. Again, he saith, "Take heed to yourselves, v. 9. Though you may escape the sword of war, better than some of your neighbours, yet be not secure; you will be exposed to the sword of justice more than others. Take heed therefore lest you deceive yourselves with the hopes of outward prosperity, when it is through many tribulations that you must enter into the kingdom of God. Take heed what you say and do, for you will have many eyes upon you."

1. What the trouble is which they must expect. They shall be hated of all men; trouble enough! The thoughts of being hated are grievous to a tender spirit. Those that are malicious, will be mischievous. It was not for anything amiss in them, or done amiss by them, that they were hated, but for Christ's name's sake. The world hated them because he loved them. Their own relations shall betray them, those to whom they were most nearly allied, and on whom therefore they depended for protection. Their church-rulers shall inflict their censures upon them; "You shall be delivered up, and shall be beaten in the synagogues with forty stripes at a time, as offenders against the law." It is no new thing for the church's artillery, through the treachery of its officers, to be turned against some of its best friends. Governors and kings shall use their power against them. They shall cause you to be put to death, as enemies to the empire. They must resist unto blood and still resist.

2. What they shall have to comfort themselves with.

(1) That the work they were called to should be carried on and prosper (v. 10); "The gospel shall, for all this, be published among all nations, and the sound of it shall go forth into all the earth." It is comfort to those who suffer for the gospel, that, though they may be crushed and borne down, the gospel cannot; it shall keep its ground, and carry the day.

(2) That their sufferings, instead of obstructing their work, should forward it; "Your being brought before governors and kings shall be for a testimony of them (so some read it, v. 9); it shall give you an opportunity of preaching the gospel to those before whom you are brought as criminals." Or, as we read it, It shall be for a testimony against them, against both the judges and the prosecutors. The gospel is a testimony to us concerning Christ and heaven. If we receive it, it will be a testimony for us: it will justify and save us; if not, it will be a testimony against us in the great day.

(3) That, when they were brought before kings and governors for Christ's sake, they should have special assistance from heaven (v. 11); "Take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour that speak ye, and fear not the success of it, because it is offhand, for it is not ye that speak, but it is the Holy Ghost." When we are engaged in the service of Christ, we may depend upon the aids of the Spirit of Christ.

(4) That heaven at last would make amends for all; he that shall endure to the end, the same shall be saved," v. 13. Perseverance gains the crown. The salvation here promised is more than a deliverance from evil, it is an everlasting blessedness.

Verses 14-23

The Jews, in rebelling against the Romans, and in persecuting the Christians, were setting both God and man against them. Now here we have a prediction of that ruin which came upon them within less than forty years after this.

I. What is here foretold concerning it.

1. That the Roman armies should make a descent upon Judæa, and invest Jerusalem, the holy city. These were the abomination of desolation. They had rejected Christ as an abomination, who would have been their salvation; and now God brought upon them an abomination that would be their desolation. This army stood where it ought not, in and about the holy city, which the heathen ought not to have approached. Sin made the breach, at which the glory went out, and the abomination of desolation broke in, and stood where it ought not.

2. That when the Roman army should come into the country, there would be no safety anywhere but by quitting the country, and that with all possible expedition. A man cannot have so much as his life given him for a prey, but by fleeing to the mountains out of Judæa; and let him take the first alarm, and make the best of his way. If he be on the house-top, and spies them coming, let him not go down to take anything out of the house, for it will occasion his losing of time. If he be in the field, let him get away as he is, and not turn back again, to take up his garment, v. 16. If he can save his life, let him reckon it a good bargain, though he can save nothing else, and be thankful to God, that, though he is cut short, he is not cut off.

3. That it would go very hard at that time with poor mothers and nurses (v. 17); "Woe to them that are with child, that cannot shift for themselves, nor make haste as others can. And woe to them that give suck, that know not how either to leave the tender infants behind them, or to carry them along with them." The time may often be, when the greatest comforts may prove the greatest burthens. It would likewise be very uncomfortable, if they should be forced to flee in the winter (v. 18). If there be no remedy but that trouble must come, yet we may desire and pray that the circumstances of it may be so ordered as to be a mitigation of the trouble; and when things are bad, we ought to consider they might have been worse

4. There should be such destruction and desolation made, as could not be paralleled in any history (v. 19); In those days shall be affliction, such as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created unto this day, neither shall be. It threatened a universal slaughter of all the people of the Jews; so barbarously did they devour one another, and the Romans devour them all, that, if their wars had continued a little longer, no flesh could have been saved. But in the midst of wrath God remembered mercy. He shortened the days. Many particular persons had their lives given them for a prey, by the storm's subsiding when it did. It was for the elects' sake that those days were shortened; many among them fared the better for the sake of the few among them that believed in Christ. There was a promise, that a remnant should be saved (Isa. x. 22). God's own elect cry day and night to him, and their prayers must be answered, Luke xviii. 7.

II. What directions are given to the disciples with reference to it.

1. They must shift for the safety of their lives; "When you see the country invaded, and the city invested, without further deliberation or delay, let them that are in Judæa, flee to the mountains, v. 14. Do you go out of the ship when you see it sinking"

2. They must provide for the safety of their souls. Then, if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or, Lo, he is there, believe them not; for false christs, and false prophets, shall arise, v. 22. False christs shall rise, and false prophets that shall preach them up; or such, as set up for prophets, and they shall show signs and lying wonders. They shall seduce, if it were possible, the very elect; so plausible shall their pretences be, that they shall draw away many that were forward and zealous professors of religion, many that were very likely to have persevered. They shall seduce, if it were possible, the very elect. In consideration hereof, let the disciples be cautious whom they give credit to (v. 23); But take ye heed. Christ knew that they were of the elect, and yet he said to them, Take heed. An assurance of persevering, and cautions against apostasy, will very well consist with each other. God will keep them, but they must keep themselves. "I have foretold you all things; that, being forewarned, you may be fore-armed."

These verses seem to point at Christ's second coming, to judge the world; the disciples, in their question, had confounded the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world (Matt. xxiv. 3), which was built upon a mistake, as if the temple must needs stand as long as the world stands; this mistake Christ rectifies. And here he foretells,

1. The final dissolution of the present frame and fabric of the world; The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall no more give her light. The stars of heaven shall fall as leaves in autumn; and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken.

2. The visible appearance of the Lord Jesus, to whom the judgment of that day shall be committed (v. 26); Then shall they see the Son of man coming in the clouds. He shall come with great power and glory. Every eye shall then see him.

3. The gathering together of all the elect to him (v. 27); He shall send his angels, and gather together his elect to him. They shall be fetched from the uttermost parts of the earth, most remote from the place where Christ's tribunal shall be set, and shall be brought to the uttermost part of heaven. A faithful Israelite shall be carried safely, though it were from the utmost border of the land of bondage to the utmost border of the land of promise.

We have here the application of this prophetical sermon.

I. "As to the destruction of Jerusalem, expect it to come very shortly; as when the branch of the fig-tree becomes soft, and the leaves sprout forth, ye expect that summer will come shortly, v, 28. So when ye see these things come to pass, when ye see the Jewish nation embroiled in wars, distracted by false christs and prophets, and drawing upon them the displeasure of the Romans, then say that their ruin is nigh, even at the door." The disciples themselves were indeed all of them, except John, taken away from the evil to come, but the next generation would live to see it. "This generation that is now rising up, shall not all be worn off before all these things come to pass. And as this destruction is near and within ken, so it is sure." Christ doth not speak these things, merely to frighten them; no, they are the declarations o' God's fixed purpose; "Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away" (v. 31).

II. "As to the end of the world, do not enquire when it will come, for of that day, and that hour, knoweth no man; it is not revealed by any word of God, either to men on earth, or to angels in heaven." But it follows, neither the Son; but is there anything which the Son is ignorant of? There were those in the primitive times, who taught from this text, that there were some things that Christ, as man, was ignorant of; they said, "It was no more absurd to say so, than to say that his human soul suffered grief and fear." Christ, as God, could not be ignorant of anything; but the divine wisdom which dwelt in our Saviour, did communicate itself to his human soul, according to the divine pleasure, so that his human nature might sometimes not know some things; therefore Christ is said to grow in wisdom (Luke ii. 52).

III. "As to both, your duty is to watch and pray (v. 33); Take ye heed of everything that would indispose you for your Master's coming; watch for his coming, that it may not at any time be a surprise to you, and pray for that grace which is necessary to qualify you for it, for ye know not what the time is; and you are concerned to be ready for that every day, which may come any day." This he illustrates, in the close, by a parable.

1. Our Master is gone away, and left us something which we must give account of, v. 34. He is as a man taking a far journey; he has left his house on earth, and left his servants in their offices, given authority to some, and work to others. They that have authority given them, in that had work assigned them, for those that have the greatest power have the most business; and to them to whom he gave work, he gave authority, to do that work. And when he took his last leave, he appointed the porter to watch, to be sure to be ready to open to him at his return. Thus our Lord Jesus, when he ascended on high, left something for all his servants to do. All are appointed to work, and some authorized to rule.

2. We ought to be always upon our watch, in expectation of his return, v. 35–37. Our Lord will come, and will come as the Master of the house, to take account of his servants. We know not when he will come. This is applicable to his coming to us in particular, at our death, as well as to the general judgment. Our present life is a night, a dark night, compared with the other life; we know not in which watch of the night our Master will come, whether in the days of youth, or middle age, or old age; but as soon as we are born, we begin to die, and therefore, as soon as we are capable of expecting anything, we must expect death. Our great care must be, that, whenever our Lord comes, he does not find us sleeping, secure in ourselves, off our guard, ready to say, He will not come, and unready to meet him. His coming will indeed be coming suddenly. It is therefore the indispensable duty of all Christ's disciples, to watch, to be awake, and keep awake; "What I say unto you four (v. 37), I say unto all, what I say to you of this generation, I say to all that shall believe in me, in every age, Watch, watch, expect my second coming, prepare for it, that you may be found in peace, without spot, and blameless."

CHAP. XIV

In this chapter begins the account of the death and sufferings of our Lord Jesus. I. The plot of the chief priests and scribes against Christ, ver. 1, 2. II. The anointing of Christ's head at a supper in Bethany, ver. 3–9. III. The contract Judas made to betray him, ver. 10, 11. IV. Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, his instituting the Lord's supper, and his discourse with his disciples, ver. 12–31. V. Christ's agony in the garden, ver. 32–42. VI. The betraying of him by Judas, and the apprehending of him by the chief priests' agents, ver. 43–52. VII. His arraignment before the high priests, his conviction, and the indignities done him, ver. 53–65. VIII. Peter's denying him.

Verses 1–11

We have here instances,

I. Of the kindness of Christ's friends. Some friends he had, even in and about Jerusalem, that loved him, and never thought they could do enough for him.

1. Here was one friend, that was so kind as to invite him to sup with him, v. 3. Though he had a prospect of his death approaching, yet he did not abandon himself to a melancholy retirement from all company.

2. Here was another friend, that was so kind as to anoint his head with very precious ointment as he sat at meat. This was an extraordinary piece of respect paid him by a good woman that thought nothing too good to bestow upon Christ. Did he pour out his soul unto death for us, and shall we think any box of ointment too precious to pour out upon him? It is observable that she took care to pour it all out upon Christ's head; she broke the box. Christ must be honoured with all we have. Do we give him the precious ointment of our best affections? Let him have them all; love him with all the heart.

(1) There were those that put a worse construction upon this than it deserved. They called it a waste of the ointment, v. 4. The liberal and bountiful ought not to be called wasteful. They pretended it might have been sold, and given to the poor, v. 5. A common charity to the poor will not excuse from a particular act of piety to the Lord Jesus.

(2) Our Lord Jesus put a better construction upon it than, for aught that appears, was designed. Christ makes it to be an act of great faith, as well as great love (v. 8); "She is come aforehand, to anoint my body to the burying." See how Christ's heart was filled with the thoughts of his death, how familiarly he spoke of it upon all occasions. It is usual for those who are condemned to die, to have their coffins prepared, and other provision made for their funerals, while they are yet alive; and so Christ accepted this. Christ never rode in triumph into Jerusalem, but when he came thither to suffer; nor had ever his head anointed, but for his burial.

(3) He recommended this piece of heroic piety to all ages; Wherever this gospel shall be preached, it shall be spoken of, for a memorial of her, v. 9. Thus was this good woman repaid for her box of ointment. She lost neither her oil nor her labour. She got by it that good name which is better than precious ointment, Those that honour Christ he will honour.

II. Of the malice of Christ's enemies.

1. The chief priests consulted how they might put him to death, v. 1, 2. The feast of the passover was now at hand, and at that feast he must be crucified, (1) That his death and sufferings might be the more public. (2) That the anti-type might answer to the type. Christ, our Passover, was sacrificed for us, at the same time that the paschal lamb was sacrificed, and Israel's deliverance out of Egypt was commemorated.

Now see, How spiteful Christ's enemies were, for they aimed not only to silence him, but to be revenged on him for all the good he had done. How subtle they were; Not on the feast-day, Lest there should be an uproar (v. 2); lest they should rise, and rescue him. They who desired nothing more than the praise of men, dreaded nothing more than the rage and displeasure of men.

2. Judas, his disguised enemy, contracted with them for the betraying of him, v. 10, 11. He went to the chief priests, to tender his service in this affair.

(1) That which he proposed to them, was, to betray Christ to them without making an uproar among the people, which they were afraid of. Did they know that he had a mind to serve them, and make court to him? No, they could not imagine that any of his intimates should be so base. The spirit that works in all the children of disobedience, knows how to bring them in to the assistance one of another in a wicked project.

(2) That which he proposed to himself, was, to get money by the bargain; they promised to give him money. Covetousness was Judas's master-lust. They promised him money. Perhaps it was Judas's covetousness that brought him at first to follow Christ, having a promise that he should be cash-keeper, or purser, to the society, and he loved in his heart to be fingering money; and now that there was money to be got on the other side, he was as ready to betray him as ever he had been to follow him.

(3) Having secured the money, he set himself to make good his bargain; he sought how he might conveniently betray him. See what need we have to be careful that we do not ensnare ourselves in sinful engagements. It is a rule in our law, as well as in our religion, that an obligation to do an evil thing is null and void; it binds to repentance, not to performance. See how the way of sin is down-hill—when men are in, they must on.

I. Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, the night before he died. No apprehension of trouble, come or coming, should put us out of frame for our attendance on holy ordinances.

1. Christ ate the passover at the usual time, when the other Jews did. It was on the first day of that feast, which was called, The feast of unleavened bread, even that day when they killed the passover, v. 12.

2. He directed his disciples how to find the place where he intended to eat the passover. "Go into the city and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water; follow him, go in where he goes, enquire for his master, the good man of the house (v. 14), and desire him to show you a room." No doubt, the inhabitants of Jerusalem had rooms fitted up to be let out, for this occasion, to those that came out of the country to keep the passover and one of those Christ made use of. Probably he went where he was not known, that he might be undisturbed with his disciples. Perhaps he notified it by a sign, and by such a sign to intimate that he will dwell in the clean heart, that is, washed as with pure water. Where he designs to come, a pitcher of water must go before him.

3. He ate the passover in an upper room furnished. In eating his common meals he chose that which was homely, sat down on the grass: but, when he was to keep a sacred feast, in honour of that he would be at the expense of as good a room as he could get.

4. He ate it with the twelve. If Christ came with the twelve, then Judas was with them, though he was at this time contriving to betray his Master; and it is plain by what follows (v. 20), that he was there: he did not absent himself, lest he should have been suspected. Christ did not exclude him from the feast, though he knew his wickedness, for it was not as yet become public.

II. Christ's discourse with his disciples, as they were eating the passover.

1. They were pleasing themselves with the society of their Master; but he tells them that they must now presently lose him; The Son of man is betrayed. If he be betrayed, the next news you will hear of him, is, that he is crucified and slain; The Son of man goes, as it is written of him, v. 21.

2. They were pleasing themselves with the society one of another, but Christ casts a damp upon the joy of that, by telling them, One of you that eateth with me shall betray me, v. 18. Christ said this, if it might be, to startle the conscience of Judas, and to awaken him to repent of his wickedness, and to draw back from the brink of the pit. But for aught that appears, he who was most concerned in the warning, was least concerned at it. All the rest were affected with it. They began to be sorrowful. Here were the bitter herbs, with which this passover-feast was taken. They began to be suspicious of themselves; they said one by one, Is it I? And another said, Is it I? They were more jealous of themselves than of one another. It is the law of charity, to hope the best (1 Cor. xiii. 5-7), because we assuredly know, therefore we may justly suspect, more evil by ourselves than by our brethren. They trusted more to his words than to their own hearts; and therefore do not say, "I am sure it is not I", but, "Lord, is it I?"

Now, in answer to their enquiry, Christ saith that, [1] Which would make them easy; "It is not you, nor you; it is this that now dips with me in the dish." [2] Which, one would think, should make Judas very uneasy. If he go on in his undertaking, it is upon the sword's point, for woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed; it were better for him that he had never been born. It is very probable that Judas encouraged himself in it with this thought, that his Master had often said he must be betrayed; "And if it must be done, surely God will not find fault with him that doth it." But Christ tells him that this will be no shelter or excuse to him; The Son of man indeed goes, as it is written of him, but woe to that man by whom he is betrayed. Christ was delivered indeed by the determinate counsel and fore-knowledge of God; but, notwithstanding that, it is with wicked hands that he is crucified and slain, Acts ii. 23.

III. The institution of the Lord's supper.

1. It was instituted in the close of a supper. In the Lord's supper there is no bodily repast intended. It is food for the soul only, and therefore a very little of that which is for the body, as much as will serve for a sign, is enough.

2. It was instituted by the example of Christ himself; by the practice of our Master himself, because intended for those who are already his disciples.

3. It was instituted with blessing and giving of thanks; the gifts of common providence are to be so received much more the gifts of special grace. He blessed (v. 22), and gave thanks, v. 23.

4. It was instituted to be a memorial of his death; and therefore he broke the bread, to show how it pleased the Lord to bruise him; and he called the wine, which is the blood of the grape, the blood of the New Testament. Frequent mention is made of the blood, the precious blood, as the price of our redemption. It is called the blood of the New Testament; for the covenant of grace became a testament, and of force by the death of Christ, the testator. It is said to be shed for many, to bring many sons to glory, Heb. ii. 10. It was sufficient for many, being of infinite value; we read of a great multitude which no man could number, that had all washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb (Rev. vii. 9–14); and still it is a fountain opened. How comfortable is this that the blood of Christ is shed for many! And if for many, why not for me? If for sinners, sinners of the Gentiles, the chief of sinners, then why not for me?

5. It was a sign of the conveyance of those benefits to us, which were purchased for us by his death; and therefore he broke the bread to them (v. 22), and said, Take eat of it: he gave the cup to them, and ordered them to drink of it, v. 23.

6. It was instituted with an eye to the happiness of heaven, and to be an earnest and foretaste of that, and thereby to put our mouths out of taste for all the pleasures and delights of sense (v. 25); I will drink no more of the fruit of the wine. Lord, hasten the day, when I shall drink it in the kingdom of God.

7. It was closed with a hymn, v. 26. This was Christ's swan-like song, which he sung just before he entered upon his agony; probably, that which was usually sung, Ps. cxiii to cxviii.

IV. Christ's discourse with his disciples, as they were returning to Bethany by moonlight. When they had sung the hymn, presently they went out. The Israelites were forbidden to go out of their houses the night that they ate the passover, for fear of the sword of the destroying angel. But because Christ, the great shepherd, was to be smitten, he went out purposely to expose himself to the sword, as a champion; they evaded the destroyer, but Christ conquered him.

1. Christ here foretells that in his sufferings he should be deserted by all his disciples; "You will all be offended because of me, this night." Christ knew this before, and yet welcomed them at his table. Nor should we be discouraged from coming to the Lord's supper, by the fear of relapsing into sin afterward; but, the greater our danger is, the more need we have to fortify ourselves by the diligent conscientious use of holy ordinances. Christ tells them that they would be offended in him. Hitherto, they had continued with him in his temptations; though they had sometimes offended him, yet they had not been offended in him; but now the storm would be so great, that they would all slip their anchors, and be in danger of shipwreck. The smiting of the shepherd is often the scattering of the sheep: the whole flock suffers for it, and is endangered by it.

But Christ encourages them with a promise that they shall rally again, shall return both to their duty and to their comfort (v. 28); "After I am risen I will go before you into Galilee."

2. He foretells that he should be denied particularly by Peter. When they went out to go to the mount of Olives, we may suppose that they dropped Judas (he stole away from them). But Christ tells them that they would have no reason to boast of their constancy. Though God keeps us from being as bad as the worst, yet we may well be ashamed to think that we are not better than we are.

(1) Peter is confident that he should not do so ill as the rest of the disciples (v. 29); Though all should be offended, yet will not I. He supposes himself to be able to receive the shock of a temptation, and bear up against it, all alone; to stand, though nobody stood by him. It is bred in the bone with us, to think well of ourselves, and trust to our own hearts.

(2) Christ tells him that he will do worse than any of them. They will all desert him, but he will deny him; not once, but thrice; and that presently; "This day, even this night before the cock crow twice, thou wilt deny that ever thou hadst any knowledge of me."

(3) He stands to his promise; "If I should die with thee, I will not deny thee": and, no doubt, he thought as he said. Judas said nothing like this, when Christ told him he would betray him. He sinned by contrivance, Peter by surprise; Peter was overtaken in this fault. It was ill done of Peter, to contradict his Master. If he had said, with fear and trembling, "Lord, give me grace to keep me from denying thee," it might have been prevented: but they were all thus confident; they who said, Lord, is it I? now said, It shall never be me. Being acquitted from their fear of betraying Christ, they were now secure. But he that thinks he stands, must learn to take heed lest he fall.

Christ is here entering upon his sufferings, and begins with those which were the sorest of all his sufferings, those in his soul. Here we have him in his agony.

I. He retired for prayer; Sit ye here (saith he to his disciples), while I go a little further, and pray. He had lately prayed with them (John xvii); and now he appoints them to withdraw while he goes to his Father upon an errand peculiar to himself.

II. Even into that retirement he took with him Peter, and James, and John (v. 33), three competent witnesses of this part of his humiliation. These three had boasted most of their ability and willingness to suffer with him; Peter here, in this chapter, and James and John (ch. x. 39); and therefore Christ takes them to stand by, and see what a struggle he had, to convince them that they knew not what they said. It is fit that they who are most confident, should be first tried, that they may be made sensible of their folly and weakness.

III. There he was in a tremendous agitation (v. 33); He began to be sore amazed—a word not used in Matthew, but very significant; it bespeaks something like that horror of great darkness, which fell upon Abraham (Gen. xv. 12). Never was sorrow like unto his at that time. Yet there was not the least disorder or irregularity in this commotion of his spirits; for he had no corrupt nature to mix with them, as we have. If water have a sediment at the bottom, though it may be clear while it stands still, yet, when shaken, it grows muddy; so it is with our affections: but pure water in a clean glass, though ever so much stirred, continues clear; and so it was with Christ.

IV. He made a sad complaint of this agitation. He said, My soul is exceeding sorrowful. He was made sin for us, and therefore was thus sorrowful; he fully knew the malignity of the sins he was to suffer for; and having the highest degrees of love to God, who was offended by them, and of love to man, who was damaged and endangered by them, no marvel that his soul was exceeding sorrowful. He was made a curse for us; the curses of the law were transferred to him as our surety and representative. He now tasted death (as he is said to do, Heb. ii. 9), he drank up even the dregs of the cup; he tasted all the bitterness of it.

Now the consideration of Christ's sufferings in his soul, and his sorrows for us, should be of use to us,

(1) To embitter our sins. Can we ever entertain a favourable or so much as a slight thought of sin, when we see what impression sin made upon the Lord Jesus? Shall that sit light upon our souls, which sat so heavy upon his? Was Christ in such an agony for our sins, and shall we never be in an agony about them? If Christ thus suffered for sin, let us arm ourselves with the same mind.

(2) To sweeten our sorrows; if our souls be at any time exceeding sorrowful, let us remember that our Master was so before us, and the disciple is not greater than his Lord. Why should we affect to drive away sorrow, when Christ for our sakes, submitted to it, and thereby not only took out the sting of it, but put virtue into it, and made it profitable, nay, and put sweetness into it, and made it comfortable. Blessed Paul was sorrowful, and yet always rejoicing.

V. He ordered his disciples to keep with him; he said to them, Tarry ye here and watch. He had said to the other disciples nothing but, Sit ye here (v. 32); but these three he bids to tarry and watch, as expecting more from them than from the rest.

VI. He addressed himself to God by prayer (v. 35); He fell on the ground, and prayed. It was but a little before this, that in prayer he lifted up his eyes (John xvii. 1); but here, being in an agony, he fell upon his face. As Man, he deprecated his sufferings, that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from him (v. 35). We have his very words (v. 36), Abba, Father. The Syriac word is here retained, which Christ used, and which signifies Father, to intimate what an emphasis our Lord Jesus, in his sorrows, laid upon it, and would have us to lay. Father, all things are possible to thee. Even that which we cannot expect to be done for us, we ought yet to believe that God is able to do: and when we submit to his will, it must be with a believing acknowledgment of his power, that all things are possible to him. As Mediator, he acquiesced in the will of God concerning them; "Nevertheless, not what I will, but what thou wilt."

VII. He roused his disciples, who were dropped asleep while he was at prayer, v. 37, 38. He comes to look after them, since they did not look after him; and he finds them asleep. This carelessness of theirs was a presage of their further offence in deserting him. He had so lately commended them for continuing with him in his temptations, though they had not been without their faults. They had lately promised not to be offended in him; what! and yet mind him so little? He particularly upbraided Peter with his drowsiness; Simon, sleepest thou? Couldest thou not watch one hour? He did not require him to watch all night with him, only for one hour. He doth not over-task us, nor weary us.

As those whom Christ loves he rebukes when they do amiss, so those whom he rebukes he counsels and comforts. It was a very wise and faithful word of advice which Christ here gave to his disciples; Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation, v. 38. It was bad to sleep when Christ was in his agony, but if they did not stir up themselves, and fetch in grace and strength from God by prayer, they would do worse; and so they did, when they all forsook him, and fled. It was a very kind and tender excuse that Christ made for them; "The spirit truly is willing; you would willingly keep awake, but you cannot." The flesh is weak, and if you do not watch and pray, you may be overcome, notwithstanding. The consideration of the weakness and infirmity of our flesh should engage and quicken us to prayer and watchfulness.

VIII. He repeated his address to his Father (v. 39); He went again, and prayed, saying the same word; he spoke to the same purport, and again the third time. This teaches us, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint, Luke xviii. 1. Though the answers to our prayers do not come quickly, yet we must renew our requests. Paul, when he was buffeted by a messenger of Satan, besought the Lord thrice, as Christ did here, before he obtained an answer of peace, 2 Cor. xii. 7, 8. He must come a second and a third time, for the visits of God's grace, in answer to prayer, come sooner or later, according to the pleasure of his will.

IX. He repeated his visits to his disciples. Thus he gave a specimen of his continued care for his church on earth, even when it is half asleep. He came the second time to his disciples, and found them asleep again, v. 40. See how the infirmities of Christ's disciples return upon them, and overpower them, and what clogs those bodies of ours are to our souls. This second time he spoke to them as before, but they wist not what to answer him. Like men between sleeping and waking, they knew not where they were, or what they said. But, the third time, they were bid to sleep if they would (v. 41); "Sleep on now, and take your rest." It is enough; we had not that word in Matthew, "You have had warning enough to keep awake, and would not take it. Now the hour is come, in which I knew you would all forsake me." The Son of man is now betrayed into the hands of sinners. "Come, rise up. Let us go, for lo, he that betrayeth me is at hand."

We have here the seizing of our Lord Jesus by the officers of the chief priests. He began first to suffer in his soul, but afterward suffered in his body.

I. Here is a band of rude miscreants employed to take our Lord Jesus; a great multitude with swords and staves. At the head of this rabble is Judas, one of the twelve. It is no new thing for a very fair and plausible profession to end in a shameful and fatal apostasy.

II. Men of no less figure than the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders, sent them, and set them on work, who pretended to expect the Messiah, and to be ready to welcome him; and yet, when he is come, they set themselves against him, and resolve to run him down.

III. Judas betrayed him with a kiss. He called him, Master, Master, and kissed him. It is enough to put one for ever out of conceit with being called of men Rabbi, Rabbi (Matt. xxiii. 7), since it was with this compliment that Christ was betrayed.

IV. They arrested him, and made him their prisoner (v. 46); They laid their hands on him, rude and violent hands, and took him into custody.

V. Peter laid about him in defence of his Master, and wounded one of the assailants. He was one of them that stood by, of them that were with him (so the word signifies). He drew a sword, and aimed, it is likely, to cut off the head, but missed his blow, and only cut off the ear, of a servant of the high priest, v. 47. It is easier to fight for Christ, than to die for him; but Christ's good soldiers overcome, not by taking away other people lives, but by laying down their own.

VI. Christ shows them the absurdity of their proceedings against him. 1. That they came out against him, as against a thief, whereas he was innocent of any crime; he taught daily in the temple, and if he had any wicked design, there it would some time or other have been discovered. By his fruits he was known to be a good tree; why then did they come out against him as a thief? 2. That they came to take him thus privately, whereas he was neither ashamed nor afraid to appear publicly in the temple. He was none of those evil-doers that hate the light, neither come to the light, John iii. 20. To come upon him thus at midnight, and in the place of his retirement, was base and cowardly. But this was not all. 3. They came with swords and staves, as if he had been in arms against the government. There was no occasion for those weapons; but they made this ado, (1) To secure themselves from the rage of some; they came armed, because they feared the people. (2) To expose him to the rage of others. By coming with swords and staves to take him, they represented him to the people as a dangerous turbulent man.

VII. He reconciled himself to all this injurious, ignominious treatment, by referring himself to the Old Testament predictions of the Messiah. I am hardly used, but I submit, for the scriptures must be fulfilled, v. 49. See here what a regard Christ had to the scriptures; he would bear anything rather than that the least jot or tittle of the word of God should fall to the ground. See what use we are to make of the Old Testament; we must search for Christ, the true treasure hid in that field.

VIII. All Christ's disciples, hereupon, deserted him (v. 50); They all forsook him, and fled. They were very confident that they should adhere to him; but even good men know not what they will do, till they are tried. If it was such a comfort to him as he had lately intimated, that they had hitherto continued with him in his lesser trials (Luke xxii. 28), we may well imagine what a grief it was to him, that they deserted him now in the greatest. Let not those that suffer for Christ, think it strange, if they be thus deserted, and if all the herd shun the wounded deer. When St. Paul was in peril, none stood by him, but all men forsook him, 2 Tim. iv. 16.

IX. The noise disturbed the neighbourhood, v. 51, 52. This passage of story we have not in any other of the evangelists. Here is an account of a certain young man, who, as it should seem, was no disciple of Christ, who followed him to see what would become of him. Now observe concerning him,

1. How he was frightened out of his bed, to be a spectator of Christ's sufferings. Such a multitude, so armed, could not but produce a great stir; this alarmed our young man, who had the curiosity to go, and see what the matter was, and was in such haste to inform himself, that he could not stay to dress himself, but threw a sheet about him. When all his disciples had quitted him, he continued to follow him, desirous to hear what he would say, and see what he would do.

2. See how he was frightened into his bed again, when he was in danger of being made a sharer in Christ's sufferings. His own disciples had run away from him; but this young man thought he might securely attend him, especially being so far from being armed, that he was not so much as clothed; but the young men, the Roman soldiers, who were called to assist, laid hold of him. Finding himself in danger, he left the linen cloth by which they had caught hold of him, and fled away naked. This passage is recorded to show what a narrow escape the disciples had of falling into their hands, out of which nothing could have kept them but their Master's care of them; If ye seek me, let these go their way, John xviii. 8. It also intimates that there is no hold of those who are led by curiosity only, and not by faith and conscience, to follow Christ.

We have here Christ's arraignment, trial, conviction, and condemnation, before the great sanhedrim, of which the high priest was president, the same Caiaphas that had lately adjudged it expedient he should be put to death, guilty or not guilty (John xi. 50), and who therefore might justly be excepted against as partial.

I. Christ is hurried away to his house. And there though in the dead of the night, all the chief priests, and elders, and scribes, that were in the secret, were assembled, ready to receive the prey; so sure were they of it.

II. Peter followed at a distance, v. 54. But when he came to the high priest's palace, he sat with the servants. The high priest's fire side was no proper place, nor his servants proper company for Peter, but it was his entrance into a temptation.

III. Great diligence was used to procure, for love or money, false witnesses against Christ. They had seized him as a malefactor, and now they had him they had no indictment to prefer against him, but they sought for witnesses against him, if they would accuse him, v. 55, 56. The chief priests and elders were by the law entrusted with the prosecuting and punishing of false witnesses (Deut. xix. 16, 17). It is time to cry, Help, Lord, when the physicians of a land are its troublers, and those that should be the conservators of peace and equity, are the corrupters of both.

IV. He was at length charged with words which, as they were represented, seemed to threaten the temple (v. 57, 58), but the witnesses to this matter did not agree (v. 59). Their testimony was not sufficient, nor equal to the charge of a capital crime; they did not accuse him of that upon which a sentence of death might be founded.

V. He was urged to be his own accuser (v. 60); The high priest stood up and said, Answerest thou nothing? This he said under pretence of justice and fair dealing, but really with a design to ensnare him, that they might accuse him. We may well imagine with what an air of haughtiness and disdain this proud high priest brought our Lord Jesus to this question. Pleased to think that he seemed silent, who had so often silenced those that picked quarrels with him. Still Christ answered nothing, that he might set us an example, 1. Of patience under calumnies and false accusations. 2. Of prudence, when a man shall be made an offender for a word, and our *de*fence made our *of*fence.

VI. When he was asked whether he was the Christ, he confessed, and denied not, that he was, v. 61, 62. He asked, Art thou the Son of the Blessed? that is, the Son of God? And for the proof of his being the Son of God, he binds them over to his second coming; "Ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power; that Son of man that now appears so mean you shall shortly see and tremble before." Now, one would think that such a word as this should have startled the court, and at least, in the opinion of some of them, should have amounted to a demurrer, or arrest of judgment. When Paul at the bar reasoned of the judgment to come, the judge trembled, and adjourned the trial, Acts. xxiv. 25.

VII. The high priest, upon this confession of his, convicted him as a blasphemer (v. 63); He rent his clothes. If Saul's rending Samuel's mantle was made to signify the rending of the kingdom from him (1 Sam. xv. 27, 28), much more did Caiaphas's rending his own clothes signify the rending of the priesthood from him, as the rending of the veil, at Christ's death, signified the throwing of all open.

VIII. They agreed that he was a blasphemer, and, as such, was guilty of a capital crime, v. 64. So they all condemned him to be guilty of death; what friends he had in the great sanhedrim, did not appear, it is probable that they had not notice.

IX. They set themselves to abuse him and to make sport with him, v. 65. It should seem that some of the priests themselves so far forgot the dignity, and the gravity which became them, that they helped their servants in playing the fool with a condemned prisoner. This they made their diversion, while they waited for the morning. If they did not think it below them to abuse Christ, shall we think anything below us, by which we may do him honour.

We have here the story of Peter's denying Christ.

1. It began in keeping at a distance from him. Peter had followed afar off (v. 54). Those that are shy of Christ, are in a fair way to deny him.

2. It was occasioned by his associating with the high priest's servants. They that think it dangerous to be in company with Christ's disciples, because thence they may be drawn in to suffer for him, will find it much more dangerous to be in company with his enemies, because there they may be drawn into sin against him.

3. The temptation was, his being charged as a disciple of Christ; Thou also wert with Jesus of Nazareth, v. 67. This is one of them (v. 69), for thou art a Galilean, one may know that by thy speaking broad, v. 70. It doth not appear that he was challenged upon it, but only bantered upon it, and in danger of being ridiculed as a fool for it. Sometimes the cause of Christ seems to fall so much on the losing side, that everybody has a stone to throw at it. Yet, all things considered, the temptation could not be called formidable; it was only a maid that casually cast her eye upon him, and said, Thou art one of them, to which he needed not to have made any reply.

4. The sin was very great; he denied Christ before men, at a time when he ought to have confessed and owned him. Christ had often given notice to his disciples of his own sufferings; yet, when they came, they were to Peter as great a surprise and terror as if he had never heard of them before. When Christ was admired and flocked after, he could readily own him; but now that he is deserted, and despised, and run down, he is ashamed of him, and will own no relation to him.

5. His repentance was very speedy. He repeated his denial thrice, and the third was worst of all, for then he cursed and swore, to confirm his denial. Then the cock crew the second time, which put him in mind of his Master's words, the warning he had given him, with that particular circumstance of the cock crowing twice; and when he thought thereon, he wept. Some observe that this evangelist, who wrote, as some have thought, by St. Peter's direction, speaks as fully of Peter's sin as any of them, but more briefly of his sorrow, which Peter, in modesty, would not have to be magnified, and because he thought he could never sorrow enough for so great a sin. Fixing his mind upon it, he wept. It is not a transient thought of that which is humbling, that will suffice, but we must dwell upon it.

CHAP. XV

Here we have him, I. Arraigned and accused before Pilate the Roman governor, ver. 1–5. II. Cried out against by the common people, ver. 6–14. III. Condemned to be crucified immediately, ver. 15. IV. Bantered and abused, by the Roman soldiers, ver. 16–19. V. Led out to the place of execution, ver. 20–24. VI. Nailed to the cross between two thieves, ver. 25–28. VII. Reviled and abused by all that passed by, ver. 29–32. VIII. Forsaken for a time by his father, ver. 33–36. IX. Dying, and rending the veil, ver. 37, 38. X. Attested and witnessed to by the centurion and others, ver. 39–41. XI. Buried in the sepulchre of Joseph of Arimathea, ver. 42–47.

Verses 1–14

I. A consultation held by the great Sanhedrim for the effectual prosecution of our Lord Jesus. They met early in the morning about it; they lost no time, but followed their blow in good earnest. The unwearied industry of wicked people in doing that which is evil, should shame us for our backwardness and slothfulness in that which is good.

II. The delivering of him up a prisoner to Pilate; they bound him. Christ was bound, to make bonds easy to us, and enable us, as Paul and Silas, to sing in bonds. It is good for us often to remember the bonds of the Lord Jesus, as bound with him who was bound for us. They led him through the streets of Jerusalem, to expose him to contempt, and we may well imagine how miserably he looked after such a night's usage as he had had. They voluntarily betrayed him that was Israel's crown, to them that were Israel's yoke.

III. The examining of him by Pilate upon interrogatories (v. 2); "Art thou the king of the Jews?" "Yea," saith Christ, "it is as thou sayest, I am that Messiah."

IV. The articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and his silence under the charge and accusation. The chief priests turned informers, and did in person accuse Christ of many things (v. 3), and witness against him, v. 4. Wicked priests are generally the worst of men. The better anything is, the worse it is when it is corrupted. These priests were very eager and noisy in their accusation; but Christ answered nothing, v. 3. While Pilate urged him to clear himself, and was desirous he should (v. 4), yet still he stood mute (v. 5), he answered nothing, which Pilate thought very strange. He gave Pilate a direct answer (v. 2), but would not answer the prosecutors and witnesses, because the things they alleged, were notoriously false, and he knew Pilate himself was convinced they were so. As Christ spoke to admiration, so he kept silence to admiration.

V. The proposal Pilate made to the people, to have Jesus released to them, since it was the custom of the feast to grace the solemnity with the release of one prisoner. The people expected and demanded that he should do as he had ever done to them (v. 8). Now Pilate perceived that the chief priests delivered up Jesus for envy, v. 10. It was easy to see that it was not his guilt, but his goodness, that they were provoked at. He thought that he might safely appeal from the priests to the people. Let them demand him to be released, and Pilate will readily do it. There was indeed another prisoner, one Barabbas, that had an interest, and would have some votes; but he questioned not but Jesus would out-poll him.

VI. The unanimous outrageous clamours of the people to have Christ put to death, and particularly to have him crucified. It was a great surprise to Pilate, when he found that they all agreed to desire that Barabbas might be released, v. 11. Pilate opposed it all he could; "What will ye that I shall do to him whom ye call the King of the Jews?" v. 12. They say, Crucify him. When Pilate objected, Why, what evil has he done? they did not pretend to answer it, but cried out the more exceedingly, Crucify him, crucify him. Now the priests promised themselves that it would influence Pilate two ways to condemn him. 1. It might incline him to believe Christ guilty, when there was so general an out-cry against him. "Surely," might Pilate think, "he must needs be a bad man, whom all the world is weary of." It has been the common artifice of Satan, to put Christ and his religion into an ill name, and so to run them down. But let us judge of persons and things by their merits, and not prejudge by common fame and the cry of the country. 2. It might induce him to condemn Christ, to please the people, and indeed for fear of displeasing them. Though he was not so weak as to be governed by their opinion, to believe him guilty, yet he was so wicked as to be swayed by their outrage, to condemn him, though he believed him innocent. Our Lord Jesus dying as a sacrifice for the sins of many, he fell a sacrifice to the rage of many.

Verses 15–21

I. Pilate, to gratify the Jews' malice, delivers Christ to be crucified, v. 15. Willing to content the people, he released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus to be crucified. Though he had scourged him before, hoping that would content them, and then not designing to crucify him, yet he went on to that.

He who could persuade himself to chastise one that was innocent (Luke xxiii. 16), could by degrees persuade himself to crucify him.

Christ was crucified, for that was, 1. A bloody death, and without blood no remission, Heb. ix. 22. Christ was to lay down his life for us, and therefore shed his blood. 2. It was a painful death. Christ died, so as that he might feel himself die. Christ would meet death in its greatest terror, and so conquer it. 3. It was a shameful death, the death of slaves, and the vilest malefactors. The cross and the shame are put together. Christ makes satisfaction by submitting to the greatest reproach and ignominy. Yet this was not the worst. 4. It was a cursed death; thus it was branded by the Jewish law (Deut. xxi. 23). Now that Christ has submitted to be hanged upon a tree, the reproach and curse of that kind of death are quite rolled away.

II. Pilate, to gratify the gay humour of the Roman soldiers, delivered him to them, to be abused and spitefully treated. They called together the whole regiment that was then in waiting, and they went into an inner hall, where they ignominiously abused our Lord Jesus, as a king. 1. Do kings wear robes of purple or scarlet? They clothed him with purple. 2. Do kings wear crowns? They platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head. A crown of straw, or rushes, would have been banter enough; but this was pain also. He wore the crown of thorns which we had deserved, that we might wear the crown of glory which he merited. 3. Are kings attended with the acclamations of their subjects, O king, live for ever? That also is mimicked; they saluted him with "Hail, King of the Jews." 4. Kings have sceptres put into their hand, marks of dominion; to imitate this, they put a reed in his right hand. Those who despise the authority of the Lord Jesus do, in effect, put a reed in his hand; nay, and, as these here, smite him on the head with it. 5. Subjects, when they swear allegiance, were wont to kiss their sovereign; but, instead of that, spit upon him. 6. Kings used to be addressed upon the knee; and this also they brought into the jest, they bowed the knee, and worshipped him; this they did in scorn, to make themselves and one another laugh. He was thus mocked, not in his own clothes, but in another's, to signify that he suffered not for his own sin; the crime was ours, the shame his. Those that bow the knee to Christ, but do not bow the soul, put the same affront upon him that these here did.

III. The soldiers, at the hour appointed, led him away from Pilate's judgment-hall to the place of execution (v. 20). They compelled one Simon of Cyrene to carry his cross for him. He passed by, coming out of the country, not thinking of any such matter. We must not think it strange, if crosses come upon us suddenly, and we be surprised by them. The cross was a very troublesome unwieldly load: but he that carried it a few minutes, had the honour to have his name upon record in the book of God. Wherever this gospel is preached, there shall this be told for a memorial of him.

Verses 22–32

We have here the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus.

I. The place where he was crucified; it was called Golgotha—the place of a skull: it was the common place of execution, for he was in all respects numbered with the transgressors.

II. The time when he was crucified; it was the third hour, v. 25. At the third hour, according to the Jews' way of reckoning, that is, about nine of the clock in the morning, or soon after, they nailed him to the cross.

III. The indignities that were done him, when he was nailed to the cross.

1. It being the custom to give wine to persons that were to be put to death, they mingled his with myrrh, which was bitter; he tasted it, but would not drink it; was willing to admit the bitterness of it, but not the benefit of it.

2. The garments of those that were crucified, being, as with us, the executioners' fee, the soldiers cast lots upon his garments (v. 24), so making themselves merry with his misery.

3. They set a superscription over his head, The king of the Jews, v. 26. Here was no crime alleged, but his sovereignty owned. Perhaps Pilate meant to cast disgrace upon Christ as a baffled king, or upon the Jews, as a people that deserved no better a king: however, God intended it to be the proclaiming even of Christ upon the cross, the king of Israel; though Pilate knew not what he wrote, any more than Caiaphas what he said, John xi. 51. Whenever we look unto Christ crucified, we must remember the inscription over his head, that he is a king.

4. They crucified two thieves with him, one on his right hand, the other on his left, and him in the midst as the worst of the three (v. 27). While he lived he has associated with sinners, to do them good; and now when he died, he was for the same purpose joined with them, for he came into the world, and went out of it, to save sinners. But this evangelist takes particular notice of the fulfilling of the scriptures in it, v. 28. In that famous prediction of Christ's sufferings (Isa. liii. 12), it was foretold that he should be numbered with the transgressors.

5. The spectators instead of condoling with him in his misery, added to it by insulting over him.

(1) Even they that passed by railed on him, v. 29. They taunted him, and expressed themselves with the utmost detestation of him, and indignation at him. The chief priests, no doubt, put these sarcasms into their mouths, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, now, if thou canst, save thyself, and come down from the cross.

(2) Even the chief priests, who, being taken from among men and ordained for men, should be tender of those that are suffering and dying (Heb. v. 1, 2), yet they mocked him, they said, He saved others, himself he cannot save. They challenged him to come down from the cross, if he could, v. 22. Let them but see that, and they would believe.

(3) Even they that were crucified with him, reviled him (v. 32).

Here we have an account of Christ's dying.

I. There was a thick darkness over the whole land for three hours. The Jews had often demanded of Christ a sign from heaven; and now they had one, but such a one as signified the blinding of their eyes. It was a sign of the darkness that was come, and coming, upon the nation. This intimated to them, that the things which belonged to their peace, were now hid from their eyes. It was the power of darkness that they were now under, the works of darkness that they were now doing.

II. Toward the close of this darkness, our Lord Jesus, in the agony of his soul, cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? v. 34. The darkness signified the present cloud which the human soul of Christ was under, when he was making it an offering for sin. Our Lord Jesus was denied the light of the sun, when he was in his sufferings, to signify the withdrawing of the light of God's countenance. And this he complained of more than anything; he did not complain of his disciples' forsaking him, but of his Father's, 1. Because this wounded his spirit; and that is a thing hard to bear. 2. Because in this especially he was made sin for us. These symptoms of divine wrath were like that fire from heaven which had been sent sometimes, to consume the sacrifices; and it was always a token of God's acceptance. The fire that should have fallen upon the sinner, if God had not been pacified, fell upon the sacrifice, as a token that he was so; therefore it now fell upon Christ. When Paul was to be offered as a sacrifice for the service of saints, he could joy and rejoice (Phil. ii. 17); but it is another thing to be offered as a sacrifice for the sin of sinners.

III. Christ's prayer was bantered by them that stood by (v. 35, 36): because he cried, Eli, Eli, or (as Mark has it, according to the Syriac dialect) Eloi, Eloi, they said, He calls for Elias, though they knew very well what he said, and what it signified, My God, My God. One of them filled a sponge with vinegar, and reached it up to him upon a reed, v. 36. This was intended for a further affront and abuse to him; and whoever it was that checked him who did it, did but add to the reproach; "Let him alone; let us see whether Elias will come to take him down; and if not, we may conclude that he also hath abandoned him."

IV. Christ did again cry with a loud voice, and so gave up the ghost, v. 37. He was now commanding his soul into his Father's hand. Though speech fails, that we cannot cry with a loud voice, as Christ did, yet if God be the strength of the heart, that will not fail. Christ was really and truly dead, for he gave up the ghost; his human soul departed to the world of spirits, and left his body a breathless clod of clay.

V. Just at that instant that Christ died upon mount Calvary, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, v. 38. This bespoke a great deal, 1. Of terror to the unbelieving Jews; for it was a presage of the utter destruction of their church and nation, which followed not long after 2. It bespeaks a great deal of comfort to all believing Christians, for it signifies the consecrating and laying open to us of a new and living way into the holiest by the blood of Jesus.

VI. The centurion who commanded the detachment which had the oversight of the execution was convinced, and confessed that this Jesus was the Son of God, v. 39. One thing that satisfied him, was, that he so cried out, and gave up the ghost. He said, to the honour of Christ, and the shame of those that abused him, Truly this man was the Son of God. But what reason had he to say so? 1. He had reason to say that he suffered unjustly. He suffered for saying that he was the Son of God; so that if he suffered unjustly, then what he said was true, and he was indeed the Son of God. 2. He had reason to say that he was a favourite of heaven, seeing how Heaven did him honour at his death. "Surely," thinks he, "this must be some divine person, highly beloved of God." Our Lord Jesus, even in the depth of his sufferings and humiliation, was the Son of God, and was declared to be so with power.

VII. There were some of his friends, the good women especially, that attended him (v. 40, 41); There were women looking on afar off: the men durst not be seen at all. The women durst not come near, but stood at a distance, overwhelmed with grief. Some of these women are here named. Mary Magdalene was one; she owed all her comfort to his power and goodness, which rescued her out of the possession of seven devils, in gratitude for which she thought she could never do enough for him. Mary also was there, the mother of James the little. This Mary was the wife of Cleophas or Alpheus, sister to the virgin Mary. These women had followed Christ from Galilee, though they were not required to attend the feast, as the males were. Now to see him upon a cross, whom they thought to have seen upon a throne, could not but be a great disappointment to them. Those that follow Christ, in expectation of great things in this world by him, may probably live to see themselves sadly disappointed.

We are here attending the funeral of our Lord Jesus.

I. How the body of Christ was begged. It was at the disposal of the government. We are here told,

1. When the body of Christ was begged, and why such haste was made with the funeral; The even was come, and it was the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath, v. 42. The Jews were more strict in the observation of the sabbath than of any other feast; and therefore, though this day was itself a feast-day, yet they observed it more religiously as the eve of the sabbath. The day before the sabbath should be a day of preparation for the sabbath. We should get ready for it a day before; nay, the whole week should be divided between the improvement of the foregoing sabbath and the preparation for the following sabbath.

2. Who it was that begged the body; it was Joseph of Arimathea, who is here called an honourable counsellor (v. 43), a person of character and distinction; he was one of the great Sanhedrim. But here is a more shining character put upon him; he was one that waited for the kingdom of God. Those who wait for the kingdom of God, and hope for an interest in the privileges of it, must show it by their forwardness to own Christ's cause. This man God raised up for this necessary service, when none of Christ's disciples could, or durst, undertake it. Joseph went in boldly to Pilate; though he knew how much it would affront the chief priests, yet he put on courage; perhaps at first he was a little afraid.

3. What a surprise it was to Pilate, to hear that he was dead, especially that he was already dead. Pilate doubted whether he was yet dead or no, fearing lest he should be imposed upon, and the body should be taken down alive. He therefore called the centurion, his own officer, and asked him whether he had been any while dead (v. 44). The centurion could assure him of this, for he had particularly observed how he gave up the ghost, v. 39. There was a special providence in it, that there might be no pretence to say that he was buried alive, and so to take away the truth of his resurrection. Thus the truth of Christ gains confirmation, sometimes, even from its enemies.

II. How the body of Christ was buried. Pilate gave Joseph leave to take down the body, and do what he pleased with it.

1. Joseph bought fine linen to wrap the body in, though in such a case old linen might have been thought sufficient.

2. He took down the body, mangled and macerated as it was, and wrapt it in the linen as a treasure of great worth.

3. He laid it in a sepulchre of his own, in a private place. This sepulchre belonged to Joseph. Abraham when he had no other possession in the land of Canaan, yet had a burying-place, but Christ had not so much as that. This sepulchre was hewn out of a rock, for Christ died to make the grave a refuge and shelter to the saints.

4. He rolled a stone to the door of the sepulchre, for so the manner of the Jews was to bury.

5. Some of the good women attended the funeral, and beheld where he was laid, that they might come after the sabbath to anoint the dead body, because they had not time to do it now. When our great Mediator and Lawgiver was buried, special notice was taken of his sepulchre, because he was to rise again: and the care taken of his body, bespeaks the care which he himself will take concerning his body the church. Our meditations on Christ's burial should lead us to think of our own, and should help to make the grave familiar to us, and so to render that bed easy which we must shortly make in the darkness.

He who could persuade himself to chastise one that was innocent (Luke xxiii. 16), could by degrees persuade himself to crucify him.

Christ was crucified, for that was, 1. A bloody death, and without blood no remission, Heb. ix. 22. Christ was to lay down his life for us, and therefore shed his blood. 2. It was a painful death. Christ died, so as that he might feel himself die. Christ would meet death in its greatest terror, and so conquer it. 3. It was a shameful death, the death of slaves, and the vilest malefactors. The cross and the shame are put together. Christ makes satisfaction by submitting to the greatest reproach and ignominy. Yet this was not the worst. 4. It was a cursed death; thus it was branded by the Jewish law (Deut. xxi. 23). Now that Christ has submitted to be hanged upon a tree, the reproach and curse of that kind of death are quite rolled away.

II. Pilate, to gratify the gay humour of the Roman soldiers, delivered him to them, to be abused and spitefully treated. They called together the whole regiment that was then in waiting, and they went into an inner hall, where they ignominiously abused our Lord Jesus, as a king. 1. Are kings attended with the acclamations of their subjects, O king, live for ever? That also is mimicked; they saluted him with "Hail, King of the Jews." 4. Kings have sceptres put into their hand, marks of dominion; to imitate this, they put a reed in his right hand. Those who despise the authority of the Lord Jesus do, in effect, put a reed in his hand; nay, and, as these here, smite him on the head with it. 5. It bespeaks a great deal of comfort to all believing Christians, for it signifies the consecrating and laying open to us of a new and living way into the holiest by the blood of Jesus.

VI. The centurion who commanded the detachment which had the oversight of the execution was convinced, and confessed that this Jesus was the Son of God, v. 39. One thing that satisfied him, was, that he so cried out, and gave up the ghost. He said, to the honour of Christ, and the shame of those that abused him, Truly this man was the Son of God. But what reason had he to say so? 1. He had reason to say that he suffered unjustly. He suffered for saying that he was the Son of God; so that if he suffered unjustly, then what he said was true, and he was indeed the Son of God. 2. He had reason to say that he was a favourite of heaven, seeing how Heaven did him honour at his death. "Surely," thinks he, "this must be some divine person, highly beloved of God." Our Lord Jesus, even in the depth of his sufferings and humiliation, was the Son of God, and was declared to be so with power.

VII. There were some of his friends, the good women especially, that attended him (v. 40, 41); There were women looking on afar off: the men durst not be seen at all. The women durst not come near, but stood at a distance, overwhelmed with grief. Some of these women are here named. Mary Magdalene was one; she owed all her comfort to his power and goodness, which rescued her out of the possession of seven devils, in gratitude for which she thought she could never do enough for him. Mary also was there, the mother of James the little. This Mary was the wife of Cleophas or Alpheus, sister to the virgin Mary. These women had followed Christ from Galilee, though they were not required to attend the feast, as the males were. Now to see him upon a cross, whom they thought to have seen upon a throne, could not but be a great disappointment to them. Those that follow Christ, in expectation of great things in this world by him, may probably live to see themselves sadly disappointed.

We are here attending the funeral of our Lord Jesus.

I. How the body of Christ was begged. It was at the disposal of the government. We are here told,

1. When the body of Christ was begged, and why such haste was made with the funeral; The even was come, and it was the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath, v. 42. The Jews were more strict in the observation of the sabbath than of any other feast; and therefore, though this day was itself a feast-day, yet they observed it more religiously as the eve of the sabbath. The day before the sabbath should be a day of preparation for the sabbath. We should get ready for it a day before; nay, the whole week should be divided between the improvement of the foregoing sabbath and the preparation for the following sabbath.

2. Who it was that begged the body; it was Joseph of Arimathea, who is here called an honourable counsellor (v. 43), a person of character and distinction; he was one of the great Sanhedrim. But here is a more shining character put upon him; he was one that waited for the kingdom of God. Those who wait for the kingdom of God, and hope for an interest in the privileges of it, must show it by their forwardness to own Christ's cause. This man God raised up for this necessary service, when none of Christ's disciples could, or durst, undertake it. Joseph went in boldly to Pilate: though he knew how much it would affront the chief priests, yet he put on courage; perhaps at first he was a little afraid.

3. What a surprise it was to Pilate, to hear that he was dead, especially that he was already dead. Pilate doubted whether he was yet dead or no, fearing lest he should be imposed upon, and the body should be taken down alive. He therefore called the centurion, his own officer, and asked him whether he had been any while dead (v. 44). The centurion could assure him of this, for he had particularly observed how he gave up the ghost, v. 39. There was a special providence in it, that there might be no pretence to say that he was buried alive, and so to take away the truth of his resurrection. Thus the truth of Christ gains confirmation, sometimes, even from its enemies.

II. How the body of Christ was buried. Pilate gave Joseph leave to take down the body, and do what he pleased with it.

1. Joseph bought fine linen to wrap the body in, though in such a case old linen might have been thought sufficient.

2. He took down the body, mangled and macerated as it was, and wrapt it in the linen as a treasure of great worth.

3. He laid it in a sepulchre of his own, in a private place. This sepulchre belonged to Joseph. Abraham when he had no other possession in the land of Canaan, yet had a burying-place, but Christ had not so much as that. This sepulchre was hewn out of a rock, for Christ died to make the grave a refuge and shelter to the saints.

4. He rolled a stone to the door of the sepulchre, for so the manner of the Jews was to bury.

5. Some of the good women attended the funeral, and beheld where he was laid, that they might come after the sabbath to anoint the dead body, because they had not time to do it now. When our great Mediator and Lawgiver was buried, special notice was taken of his sepulchre, because he was to rise again: and the care taken of his body, bespeaks the care which he himself will take concerning his body the church. Our meditations on Christ's burial should lead us to think of our own, and should help to make the grave familiar to us, and so to render that bed easy which we must shortly make in the darkness.

CHAP. XVI

A short account of the resurrection and ascension of the Lord Jesus. I. Christ's resurrection notified by an angel to the women that came to the sepulchre to anoint him, ver. 1–8. II. His appearance to Mary Magdalene, ver. 9–11. III. His appearance to the two disciples, going to Emmaus, ver. 12, 13. IV. His appearance to the eleven, ver. 14–18. V. His ascension into heaven, ver. 19, 20.

Verses 1–8

Never was there such a sabbath since the sabbath was first instituted as this was; during all this sabbath our Lord Jesus lay in the grave. It was to him a sabbath of rest, but a silent sabbath; it was to his disciples a melancholy sabbath, spent in tears and fears. Well, this sabbath is over, and the first day of the week is the first day of a new world.

I. The affectionate visit which the good women that had attended Christ, now made to his sepulchre. They set out from their lodgings very early in the morning, so that it was sun-rising by the time they got to the sepulchre. They had bought sweet spices too, and came not only to bedew the dead body with their tears, but to perfume it with their spices, v. 1. Nicodemus had bought a very large quantity of dry spices, myrrh and aloes, John xix. 39. But these good women did not think that enough; they bought spices, some perfumed oils, to anoint him. The respect which others have showed to Christ's name, should not hinder us from showing our respect to it.

II. The care they were in about the rolling away of the stone, and the superseding of that care (v. 3, 4); They said among themselves, as they were coming along, and now drew near the sepulchre, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? For it was very great, more than they with their united strength could move. And there was another difficulty much greater than this, to be got over, which they knew nothing of, to wit, a guard of soldiers set to keep the sepulchre; who, had they come before they were frightened away, would have frightened them away. But their gracious love to Christ carried them to the sepulchre; and see how by the time they came thither, both these difficulties were removed, both the stone which they knew of, and the guard which they knew not of. They saw that the stone was rolled away. They who seek Christ diligently, will find the difficulties that lie in their way strangely to vanish, and themselves helped over them beyond their expectation.

III. The assurance that was given them by an angel, that the Lord Jesus was risen from the dead, and had left him there to tell those so who came thither to enquire after him.

1. They entered into the sepulchre, and saw that the body of Jesus was not there. He, who by his death undertook to pay our debt, in his resurrection took out our acquittance, and the matter in dispute was determined by an incontestable evidence that he was the Son of God.

2. They saw a young man sitting on the right side of the sepulchre. The angel appeared in the likeness of a man, of a young man; for angels grow not old. This angel was sitting on the right hand as they went into the sepulchre, clothed with a long white garment, a garment down to the feet. The sight of him might justly have encouraged them, but they were affrighted. Thus many times that which should be matter of comfort to us, through our own mistakes and misapprehensions proves a terror to us.

3. He silences their fears by assuring them that here was cause enough for triumph, but none for trembling (v. 6); He saith to them, Be not affrighted. Be not affrighted, for, (1) "Ye are faithful lovers of Jesus Christ, and therefore, instead of being confounded, ought to be comforted. Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified." He speaks of Jesus as one that was crucified; "The thing is past, that scene is over, ye must not dwell so much upon the sad circumstances of his crucifixion as to be unapt to believe the joyful news of his resurrection." He was crucified, but he is glorified. After his entrance upon his glory, he never drew any veil over his sufferings, nor was shy of having his cross spoken of. (2) "It will therefore be good news to you, to hear that, instead of anointing him dead, you may rejoice in him living. He is risen, he is not here, not dead, but alive again. And you may here see the place where they laid him. You see he is gone hence, not stolen either by his enemies or by his friends, but risen."

4. He orders them to give speedy notice of this to his disciples. Thus they were made the apostles of the apostles, which was a recompence of their affection in attending him on the cross, to the grave, and in the grave. They first came, and were first served; no other of the disciples durst come near his sepulchre. None came near him but a few women, who were not able so much as to roll away the stone.

(1) They must tell the disciples, that he is risen. It is a dismal time with them, their dear Master is dead, and all their hopes and joys are buried in his grave; so that there remains no more spirit in them, they are perfectly at their wits' end. "O, go quickly to them," saith the angel, "tell them that their Master is risen; this will keep them from sinking into despair." Christ is not ashamed to own his poor disciples; his preferment doth not make him shy of them, for he took early care to have it notified to them. Christ is not extreme to mark what they do amiss, whose hearts are upright with him.

(2) They must be sure to tell Peter. This is particularly taken notice of by this evangelist, who is supposed to have written by Peter's direction. He is particularly named: Tell Peter, for, [1] It will be good news to him, more welcome to him than to any of them; for he is in sorrow for sin. [2] He will be afraid, lest the joy of this good news do not belong to him. Had the angel said only, Go, tell his disciples, poor Peter would have been ready to sigh, and say, "But I doubt I cannot look upon myself as one of them, for I disowned him, and deserve to be disowned by him"; to obviate that, "Go to Peter by name, and tell him, he shall be as welcome as any of the rest to see him in Galilee." A sight of Christ will be very welcome to a true penitent, and a true penitent shall be very welcome to a sight of Christ, for there is joy in heaven concerning him.

(3) They must appoint them all, and Peter by name, to give him the meeting in Galilee, as he said unto you, Matt. xxvi. 32. All the meetings between Christ and his disciples are of his own appointing. Christ never forgets his appointment. In all meetings between Christ and his disciples, he is the most forward. He goes before you.

IV. The account which the women did bring of this to the disciples (v. 8); They went out quickly, and ran from the sepulchre, trembling and amazed. Christ had often told them, that the third day he would rise again; had they given that its due notice and credit, they would have come to the sepulchre, expecting to have found him risen, and would have received the news of it with a joyful assurance, and not with all this terror and amazement. They showed not anything of it to any man that they met by the way, for they were afraid, afraid it was too good news to be true.

We have here a very short account of two of Christ's appearances.

I. He appeared to Mary Magdalene, to her first in the garden, which we have a particular narrative of, John xx. 14. It was she out of whom he had cast seven devils; and she loved much; and this honour Christ did her, that she was the first that saw him after his resurrection. The closer we cleave to Christ, the sooner we may expect to see him, and the more to see of him.

1. She brings notice of what she had seen, to the disciples; not only to the eleven, but to the rest that followed him, as they mourned and wept, v. 10. And it was an evidence of their great love to Christ. But when their weeping had endured a night or two, comfort returned, as Christ had promised them; I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice. Better news cannot be brought to disciples in tears, than to tell them of Christ's resurrection.

2. They could not give credit to the report she brought them. They heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her. Yet they believed not. They fear that she is imposed upon, and that it was but a fancy that she saw him. Had they believed the frequent predictions of it from his own mouth, they would not have been now so incredulous of the report of it.

II. He appeared to two of the disciples, as they went into the country, v. 12. This refers, no doubt, to that which is largely related (Luke xxiv. 13, &c.), of what passed between Christ and the two disciples going to Emmaus. He is here said to have appeared to them in another form, in another dress than what he usually wore.

1. These two witnesses gave in their testimony to this proof of Christ's resurrection; They went and told it to the residue, v. 13. Being satisfied themselves, they were desirous to give their brethren the satisfaction they had, that they might be comforted as they were.

2. This did not gain credit with all; Neither believed they them. Now there was a wise providence in it, that the proofs of Christ's resurrection were given in thus gradually, and admitted thus cautiously. We have the more reason to believe those who did themselves believe so slowly: had they swallowed it presently, they might have been thought credulous, and their testimony the less to be regarded; but their disbelieving at first, shows that they did not believe it afterward but upon a full conviction.

Verses 14–18

I. The conviction which Christ gave his apostles of the truth of his resurrection (v. 14); He appeared to them himself, when they were all together, as they sat at meat, which gave him an opportunity to eat and drink with them, for their full satisfaction; see Acts x. 41. And still, when he appeared to them, he upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart. The evidences of the truth of the gospel are so full, that those who receive it not, may justly be upbraided with their unbelief; and it is owing to the hardness of their heart, its senselessness and stupidity. Though they had not till now seen him themselves, they are justly blamed because they believed not them who had seen him after he was risen. It will not suffice for an excuse of our infidelity in the great day, to say, "We did not see him after he was risen," for we ought to have believed the testimony of those who did see him.

II. The commission which he gave them to set up his kingdom among men by the preaching of his gospel.

1. To whom they were to preach the gospel. Hitherto they had been sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and were forbidden to go into the way of the Gentiles, or into any city of the Samaritans; but now they are authorized to go into all the world, and to preach the gospel of Christ to every creature, to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews; to every human creature that is capable of receiving it. These eleven men could not themselves preach it to all the world, much less to every creature in it; but they and the other disciples, with those who should afterward be added to them, must disperse themselves several ways, and, wherever they went, carry the gospel along with them. They must make it the business of their lives to send those glad tidings up and down the world with all possible fidelity and care, not as an amusement or entertainment, but as a solemn message from God to men, and an appointed means of making men happy.

2. What is the summary of the gospel they are to preach (v. 16); "Set before the world life and death, good and evil. Now go and tell them," (1) "That if they believe the gospel, and give up themselves to be Christ's disciples; if they renounce the devil, the world, and the flesh, and be devoted to Christ, they shall be saved from the guilt and power of sin, it shall not rule them, it shall not ruin them. He that is a true Christian, shall be saved through Christ." Baptism was appointed to be the inaugurating rite, by which those that embraced Christ owned him. (2) "If they believe not they shall be damned, by the sentence of a despised gospel, added to that of a broken law." And even this is gospel, it is good news, that nothing else but unbelief shall damn men, which is a sin against the remedy.

3. What power they should be endowed with, for the confirmation of the doctrine they were to preach (v. 17); These signs shall follow them that believe. They shall do wonders in Christ's name, the same name into which they were baptized, in the virtue of power derived from him, and fetched in by prayer. Some particular signs are mentioned; (1) They shall cast out devils; this power was more common among Christians than any other. (2) They shall speak with new tongues, which they had never learned, or been acquainted with; and this was both a miracle for the confirming of the truth of the gospel, and a means of spreading the gospel among those nations that had not heard it. (3) They shall take up serpents. This was fulfilled in Paul, who was not hurt by the viper that fastened on his hand, which was acknowledged a great miracle by the barbarous people, Acts xxviii. 5, 6. (4) If they be compelled by their persecutors to drink any deadly poisonous thing, it shall not hurt them. (5) They shall not only be preserved from hurt themselves, but they shall be enabled to do good to others; They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. Many of the elders of the church had this power, as appears by James v. 14, where they are said to anoint the sick with oil in the name of the Lord. With what assurance of success might they go about the executing of their commission, when they had such credentials as these to produce!

1. Christ welcomed into the upper world (v. 19): After the Lord had spoken what he had to say to his disciples, he went up into heaven, in a cloud; which we have a particular account of (Acts i. 9); he was received up, and he sat on the right hand of God. Now he is glorified with the glory he had before the world.

2. Christ welcomed in this lower world. (1) We have here the apostles working diligently for him; they went forth, and preached everywhere far and near. Though the doctrine they preached was directly contrary to the spirit and genius of the world, though it met with abundance of opposition, yet the preachers of it were neither afraid nor ashamed. (2) We have here God working effectually with them, to make their labours successful, by confirming the word with signs following, partly by the miracles that were wrought upon the bodies of people, and partly by the influence it had upon the minds of people. These were properly signs following the word—the reformation of the world, the destruction of idolatry, the conversion of sinners, the comfort of saints; and these signs still follow it, and that they may do so more and more, for the honour of Christ and the good of mankind, the evangelist prays, and teaches us to say Amen. Father in heaven, thus let thy name be hallowed, and let thy kingdom come.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE GOSPEL

ACCORDING TO

ST. LUKE

We are now entering into the labours of another evangelist; his name Luke. Some think that he was the only one of all the penmen of the scripture that was not of the seed of Israel. He was a Jewish proselyte, and, as some conjecture, converted to Christianity by the ministry of St. Paul; and after his coming into Macedonia (Acts xvi. 10) he was his constant companion. He had employed himself in the study and practice of physic; hence, Paul calls him Luke the beloved Physician, Col. iv. 14. Some of the pretended ancients tell you that he was a painter, and drew a picture of the virgin Mary. He is supposed to have written this gospel when he was associated with St. Paul. Some think that this is the brother whom Paul speaks of (2 Cor. viii. 18), whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches of Christ. His way and manner of writing are accurate and exact, his style polite and elegant, yet perspicuous. He expresses himself in a vein of purer Greek than is to be found in the other writers of the holy story. Thus he relates divers things more copiously than the other evangelists; and thus he especially treats of those things which relate to the priestly office of Christ. It is uncertain when, or about what time, this gospel was written. Some think that it was written at Rome, a little before he wrote his history of the Acts of the Apostles (which is a continuation of this), when he was there with Paul, while he was a prisoner, and preaching in his own hired house, with which the history of the Acts concludes; and then Paul saith that only Luke was with him, 2 Tim. iv. 11. When he was under that voluntary confinement with Paul, he had leisure to compile these two histories (and many excellent writings the church has been indebted to a prison for). Jerome says, He died when he was eighty-four years of age, and was never married.

CHAP. I

The narrative which this evangelist gives us of the life of Christ begins earlier than either Matthew or Mark. I. Luke's preface to his gospel, ver. 1–4. II. The prophecy and history of the conception of John Baptist, ver. 5–25. The annunciation of the virgin Mary, ver. 26–38. IV. The interview between Mary the mother of Jesus and Elisabeth the mother of John, ver. 39–56. V. The birth and circumcision of John Baptist, ver. 57–66. VI. Zacharias's song of praise, ver. 67–79. VII. A short account of John Baptist's infancy, ver. 80.

Verses 1–4

Complimental prefaces and dedications, the language of flattery and the food and fuel of pride, are justly condemned by the wise and good; but it doth not therefore follow, that such as are useful and instructive are to be run down; such is this. It is not certain who this Theophilus was; the name signifies a friend of God; some think that it does not mean any particular person, but everyone that is a lover of God. But it is rather to be understood of some particular person, probably a magistrate; because Luke gives him here the same title of respect which St. Paul gave to Festus the governor, Acts xxvi. 25. Religion does not destroy civility and good manners, but teaches us, according to the usages of our country, to give honour to them to whom honour is due.

I. Why St. Luke wrote this gospel. It is certain that he was moved by the Holy Ghost, not only to the writing, but in the writing of it; but in both he was moved as a reasonable creature, and not as a mere machine; and he was made to consider,

1. That the things he wrote of were things that were most surely believed among all Christians, and therefore things which they ought to be instructed in. He will not write about things of doubtful disputation, but the things which are, and ought to be, most surely believed. Though it is not the foundation of our faith, yet it is a support to it, that the articles of our creed are things that have been long most surely believed. The doctrine of Christ is what thousands of the wisest and best of men have ventured their souls upon.

2. That it was requisite there should be a declaration made in order of those things; that the history of the life of Christ should be methodized. When things are put in order, we know the better where to find them for our own use, and how to keep them for the benefit of others.

3. That there were many who had undertaken to publish narratives of the life of Christ. Others' services to Christ must not be reckoned to supersede ours, but rather to quicken them.

4. That the truth of the things he had to write was confirmed by the concurring testimony of those who were competent and unexceptionable witnesses of them. What he was now about to publish, agreed with that which had been delivered by word of mouth, over and over, by those who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, v. 2. (1) The apostles were ministers of the word of Christ, or of the doctrine of Christ; they, having received it themselves, ministered it to others, 1 John i. 1. They had not a gospel to make as masters, but a gospel to preach as ministers. (2) The ministers of the word were eye-witnesses. They did themselves hear the doctrine of Christ, and see his miracles, and had them not by report, at second hand. (3) They were so from the beginning of Christ's ministry, v. 2. He had his disciples with him when he wrought his first miracle, John ii. 11. They companied with him all the time that he went in and out among them, Acts i. 21. (4) The written gospel, which we have to this day, exactly agrees with the gospel which was preached in the first days of the church. (5) That he himself had a perfect understanding of the things he wrote of, from the first, v. 3. He asserts his own ability for this undertaking: "It seemed good to me, having attained to the exact knowledge of all things." He had diligently searched into these things. He had made it his business to inform himself concerning particulars. He had received his intelligence, not only by tradition, but by revelation. He wrote his history of things reported by tradition, but ratified by inspiration. He could therefore say that he had a perfect understanding of these things. He knew them, accuratelv, exactly.

II. Observe why he sent it to Theophilus: "I wrote unto thee these things in order, that thou mightest know the certainty of those things wherein thou hast been instructed." It is implied that he had been instructed in these things either before his baptism, or since, or both, according to the rule, Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. Concerning which thou hast been catechized; so the word is; the most knowing Christians began with being catechized. It was intended that he should know the certainty of those things. There is a certainty in the gospel of Christ, there is that therein which we may build upon; and those who have been well instructed in the things of God should give diligence to know the certainty of those things, to know not only what we believe, but why we believe it, that we may be able to give a reason of the hope that is in us.

The two preceding evangelists begin the gospel with the baptism of John and his ministry. This evangelist, designing to give a more particular account than had been given of our Saviour's conception and birth, determines to do so of John Baptist.

I. The account given of his parents (v. 5): They lived in the days of Herod the king, who was a forcigner, and a deputy for the Romans, who had lately made Judæa a province of the empire. This is taken notice of to show that the sceptre was quite departed from Judah. Israel is enslaved, yet then comes the glory of Israel.

Now the father of John Baptist was a priest, a son of Aaron; his name Zacharias. No families in the world were ever so honoured of God as those of Aaron and David; with one was made the covenant of priesthood, with the other that of royalty. Christ was of David's house, his forerunner of Aaron's. This Zacharias was of the course of Abia. When in David's time the family of Aaron was multiplied, he divided them into twenty-four courses, for the more regular performance of their office. The eighth of those was that of Abia (1 Chron. xxiv. 10), who was descended from Eleazar, Aaron's eldest son. The wife of this Zacharias was of the daughters of Aaron too, and her name was Elisabeth, the very same name with Elisheba, the wife of Aaron, Exod. vi. 23. The priests were very careful to marry within their own family.

Now that which is observed concerning Zacharias and Elisabeth is,

1. That they were a very religious couple (v. 6): They were both righteous before God; they were sincerely and really so. They approved themselves to him. It is a happy thing when those who are joined to each other in marriage are both joined to the Lord. They walked in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, blameless. They showed it, not by their talk, but by their works; by the way they walked in and the rule they walked by. They walked not only in the ordinances of the Lord, which related to divine worship, but in the commandments of the Lord, which have reference to all the instances of a good conversation. Not that they never did in anything come short of their duty, but it was their constant care and endeavour to come up to it. Though they were not sinless, yet they were blameless; nobody could charge them with any open scandalous sin; they lived honestly and inoffensively.

2. That they had been long childless, v. 7. Children are a heritage of the Lord. They are valuable desirable blessings; yet many there are, who are righteous before God, who yet are not thus blessed. Elisabeth was barren, and they began to despair of ever having children, for they were both now well stricken in years. Many eminent persons were born of mothers that had been long childless, as Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Samson, Samuel, and so here John Baptist, to make their birth the more remarkable and the blessing of it the more valuable to their parents.

II. The appearing of an angel to his father Zacharias, as he was ministering in the temple, v. 8–11. Observe,

1. How Zacharias was employed in the service of God (v. 8): He executed the priest's office, before God, in the order of his course; it was his week of waiting, and he was upon duty. Now it fell to Zacharias's lot to burn incense morning and evening for that week of his waiting, as other services fell to other priests by lot likewise. It was the burning of the daily incense at the altar of incense (v. 11), which was in the temple (v. 9), not in the most holy place, into which the high priest entered. The Jews say that one and the same priest burned not incense twice in all his days (there were such a multitude of them), at least never more than one week.

While Zacharias was burning incense in the temple, the whole multitude of the people were praying without, v. 10. These all addressed themselves to their devotions (in mental prayer, for their voice was not heard), when by the tinkling of a bell they had notice that the priest was gone in to burn incense. Now observe here, (1) That the true Israel of God always were a praying people. (2) That then, when ritual and ceremonial appointments were in full force, as this of burning incense, yet moral and spiritual duties were required to go along with them. David knew that when he was at a distance from the altar his prayer might be heard without incense. But, when he was compassing the altar, the incense could not be accepted without prayer, any more than the shell without the kernel. (3) That it is not enough for us to be where God is worshipped, if our hearts do not join in the worship. (4) All the prayers we offer up to God here in his courts are acceptable and successful only in virtue of the incense of Christ's intercession in the temple of God above. We cannot expect an interest in Christ's intercession if we do not pray, and pray with our spirits, and continue instant in prayer.

2. How, when he was thus employed, he was honoured with a messenger sent from heaven to him (v. 11): There appeared unto him an angel of the Lord. This angel stood on the right side of the altar of incense, on Zacharias's right hand. Zacharias had a good angel standing at his right hand, to encourage him.

3. What impression this made upon Zacharias (v. 12): When Zacharias saw him he was troubled, and fear fell upon him, v. 12. Though he was righteous before God, and blameless in his conversation, yet he could not be without some apprehensions. Ever since man sinned, his mind has been unable to bear the glory of such revelations and his conscience afraid of evil tidings brought by them. And for this reason God chooses to speak to us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid.

III. The message which the angel had to deliver to him, v. 13. He began his message, as angels generally did, with, Fear not. Perhaps when he saw the angel he was afraid lest he came to rebuke him for some mistake or miscarriage; "No," saith the angel, "Fear not, but compose thyself, that thou mayest with a sedate and even spirit receive the message I have to deliver to thee." Let us see what that is.

1. The prayers he has often made shall now receive an answer of peace: Fear not, Zacharias, for thy prayer is heard. If he means his particular prayer for a son, it must be the prayers he had formerly made for that mercy, when he was likely to have children. God will now, in giving this mercy, look a great way back to the prayers that he had made long since for and with his wife. Prayers of faith are filed in heaven, and are not forgotten, though the thing prayed for is not presently given in. If he means the prayers he was now making, we may suppose that those were according to the duty of his place, for the Israel of God and their welfare, and the performance of the promises made to them concerning the Messiah and the coming of his kingdom: "This prayer of thine is now heard; for thy wife shall shortly conceive him that is to be the Messiah's forerunner." Some of the Jewish writers themselves say that the priest, when he burnt incense, prayed for the salvation of the whole world; and now that prayer shall be heard. In general, "The prayers thou now makest, and all thy prayers, are accepted of God, and this shall be the sign that thou art accepted of God, Elisabeth shall bear thee a son."

2. He shall have a son in his old age, by Elisabeth his wife, who had been long barren. He is directed what name to give his son: Call him John, in Hebrew Johanan, a name we often meet with in the Old Testament: it signifies gracious.

3. This son shall be the joy of his family and of all his relations, v. 14. He shall be a welcome child. Thou for thy part shalt have joy and gladness. Mercies that have been long waited for, when they come at last, are the more acceptable. "He shall be such a son as thou shalt have reason to rejoice in; many parents, if they could foresee what their children will prove, instead of rejoicing at their birth, would wish they had never been; but I will tell thee what thy son will be, and then thou wilt not need to rejoice with trembling at his birth, as the best must do, but mayest rejoice with triumph at it. Nay, and many shall rejoice at his birth; all the relations of the family will rejoice in it, and all its well-wishers, because it is for the honour and comfort of the family," v. 58.

4. This son shall be a distinguished favourite of Heaven, and a distinguished blessing to the earth. The honour of having a son is nothing to the honour of having such a son.

(1) He shall be great in the sight of the Lord. God will set him before his face continually. He shall be a prophet, yea more than a prophet. He shall be much, he shall be great, in the sight of the Lord.

(2) He shall be a Nazarite, set apart to God from everything that is polluting; in token of this, according to the law of Nazariteship, he shall drink neither wine nor strong drink. He shall be a Nazar te for life. Which intimates that those that would be eminent servants of God, and employed in eminent services, must learn to live a life of self-denial and mortification, must be dead to the pleasures of sense, and keep their minds from everything that is darkening and disturbing to them.

(3) He shall be abundantly fitted and qualified for those great and eminent services. He shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb. [1.] Those that would be filled with the Holy Ghost must be sober and temperate, and very moderate in the use of wine and strong drink. Be not drunk with wine, but be filled with the Spirit, Eph. v. 18. [2.] It is possible that infants may be wrought upon by the Holy Ghost, even from their mother's womb; for John Baptist even then was filled with the Holy Ghost. God has promised to pour out his Spirit upon the seed of believers, Isa. xliv. 3.

(4) He shall be instrumental for the conversion of many souls to God, and the preparing of them to receive and entertain the gospel of Christ, v. 16, 17. He shall be sent to the children of Israel, and not to the Gentiles; to the whole nation, and not to the family of the priests only. He shall go before the Lord their God, that is, before the Messiah. John shall go before him, a little before him, to give notice of his approach, and to prepare people to receive him. He shall go in the spirit and power of Elias. That is, First, He shall be such a man as Elias was, and do such works as Elias did—shall, like him, preach the necessity of repentance and reformation to a very corrupt and degenerate age—shall like him, be bold and zealous in reproving sin and witnessing against it even in the greatest, and be hated and persecuted for it. He shall be carried on in his work, as Elijah was, by a divine spirit and power, which shall crown his ministry with wonderful success. John Baptist went before Christ and his apostles, and introduced the gospel dispensation by preaching the substance of the gospel doctrine and duty, Repent, with an eye to the kingdom of heaven. Secondly, He shall be that very person who was prophesied of by Malachi under the name of Elijah (Mal. iv. 5), who should be sent before the coming of the day of the Lord. He shall turn many of the children of Israel to the Lord their God. Whatever has a tendency to turn us from iniquity, will turn us to Christ as our Lord and our God; for those who through grace are wrought upon to shake off the yoke of sin, will soon be persuaded to take upon them the yoke of the Lord Jesus. Hereby he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, that is, of the Jews to the Gentiles; shall help to conquer the rooted prejudices which the Jews have against the Gentiles, which was begun to be done by John Baptist, who baptized and taught Roman soldiers as well as Jewish Pharisees, and who cured the pride and confidence of those Jews who gloried in their having Abraham to their father, and told them that God would out of stones raise up children unto Israel, Matt. iii. 9. When the Jews that embraced the faith of Christ were brought to join in communion with the Gentiles that did so too, then the heart of the fathers was turned to the children. And the effect of this will be, that enmities will be slain and discord made to cease; and they that are at variance, being united in his baptism, will be better reconciled one to another. This agrees with the account Josephus gives of John Baptist, Antiq. lib. 18. cap, 7. "That he was a good man, and taught the Jews the exercise of virtue, in piety towards God, and righteousness towards one another." And he saith, "The people flocked after him, and were exceedingly delighted in his doctrine." Thus he turned the hearts of fathers and children to God and one another, by turning the disobedient to the wisdom of the just. First, True religion is the wisdom of just men. It is both our wisdom and our duty to be religious; there is both equity and prudence in it. Secondly, It is not impossible but that those who have been unbelieving and disobedient may be turned to the wisdom of the just; divine grace can conquer the greatest ignorance and prejudice. Thirdly, The great design of the gospel is to bring people home to God, and to bring them nearer to one another. Hereby he shall make ready a people prepared for the Lord. All that are to be devoted to the Lord, and made happy in him, must first be prepared and made ready for him. Nothing has a more direct tendency to prepare people for Christ than the doctrine of repentance. When sin is thereby made grievous, Christ will become very precious.

IV. Zacharias's unbelief of the angel's prediction, and the rebuke he was laid under. We are here told,

1. What his unbelief spoke, v. 18. Whereby shall I know this? There are many instances in the Old Testament of those that had children when they were old, yet he cannot believe that he shall have this child of promise: "For I am an old man, and my wife is now well stricken in years. Therefore he must have a sign given him, or he will not believe." Though he had this notice given him in the temple, though it was given him when he was praying, and burning incense, and though a firm belief that God has an almighty power, and with him nothing is impossible, was enough to silence all objections, yet considering his own body and his wife's too much, unlike a son of Abraham, he staggered at the promise.

2. How his unbelief was silenced, and he silenced for it.

(1) The angel stops his mouth. Doth he ask, Whereby shall I know this? Let him know it by this, I am Gabriel, v. 19. He puts his name to his prophecy. This angel readily saith, I am Gabriel, which signifies the power of God, or, the mighty one of God. He is Gabriel, who stands in the presence of God. "Though I am now talking with thee here, yet I stand in the presence of God. I am sent to speak to thee, sent on purpose to show thee these glad tidings, which, being so well worthy of all acceptation, thou oughtest to have received cheerfully."

(2) The angel stops his mouth indeed. "That thou mayest object no more, behold thou shalt be dumb, v. 20. If thou wilt have a sign for the support of thy faith, it shall be such a one as shall be also the punishment of thine unbelief; thou shalt not be able to speak till the day that these things shall be performed," v. 20. Thou shalt be both dumb and deaf; the same word signifies both, and it is plain that he lost his hearing as well as his speech, for his friends made signs to him (v. 62) as well as he to them, v. 22. God dealt justly with him, because he had objected against God's word. God dealt kindly with him, and very tenderly and graciously. For, First, Thus he prevented his speaking any more such distrustful unbelieving words. It is better not to speak at all than to speak wickedly. Secondly, Thus he confirmed his faith; and, by his being disabled to speak, he is enabled to think the better. Thirdly, Thus he was kept from divulging the vision, and boasting of it. Fourthly, It was a great mercy that God's words should be fulfilled in their season, notwithstanding his sinful distrust. He shall not be for ever dumb, but only till the day that these things shall be performed, and then thy lips shall be opened, that thy mouth may show forth God's praise.

V. The return of Zacharias to the people, and at length to his family, and the conception of this child of promise.

1. The people staid, expecting Zacharias to come out of the temple, because he was to pronounce the blessing upon them in the name of the Lord. Though he staid beyond the usual time, yet they did not hurry away without the blessing, but waited for him, marvelling that he tarried so long in the temple, and afraid lest something was amiss, v. 21.

2. When he came out, he was speechless, v. 22. He was now to have dismissed the congregation with a blessing, but was dumb and not able to do it.

3. He made a shift to give them to understand that he had seen a vision, for he beckoned to them, and remained speechless, v. 22. The Old Testament speaks by signs; it beckons to us, but remains speechless. It is the gospel that speaks to us articulately, and gives us a clear view of that which in the Old Testament was seen through a glass darkly.

4. He staid out the days of his ministration; for, his lot being to burn incense, he could do that, though he was dumb and deaf. When we cannot perform the service of God so well as we would, yet, if we perform it as well as we can, God will accept of us in it.

5. He then returned to his family, and his wife conceived, v. 23, 24. She hid herself five months, and kept in private. (1) Lest she should do herself any prejudice. (2) Lest she should contract any ceremonial pollution which might intrench upon the Nazariteship of her child. (3) Some think it was in an excess of modesty that she hid herself. Or, it was in token of her humility, that she might not seem to boast of the honour God had put upon her. (4) She hid herself for devotion. She gives this reason for her retirement, "For thus hath the Lord dealt with me; he hath taken away my reproach among men." Fruitfulness was looked upon to be so great a blessing among the Jews that it was a great reproach to be barren; and those who were so were concluded to be guilty of some great sin unknown. Now Elisabeth triumphs, that not only this reproach is taken away, but great glory is put upon her instead of it: Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days wherein he looked on me.

Verses 26–38

We have here notice given us of all that it was fit we should know concerning the incarnation and conception of our blessed Saviour. The same angel, Gabriel, that was employed in making known to Zacharias God's purpose concerning his son, is employed in this also; for in this, the same glorious work of redemption, which was begun in that, is carried on.

I. We have here an account given of the mother of our Lord.

1. Her name was Mary, the same name with Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron; the name signifies exalted.

2. She was a daughter of the royal family, lineally descended from David, and she herself and all her friends knew it, for she went under the title and character of the house of David. She was enabled by God's providence, and the care of the Jews, to preserve their genealogies, to make it out, and as long as the promise of the Messiah was to be fulfilled it was worth keeping; but for those now, who are brought low in the world, to have descended from persons of honour, is not worth mentioning.

3. She was a virgin, but espoused to one of the same royal stock, like her, however, of low estate. His name was Joseph; he also was of the house of David. Matt. i. 20. Christ's mother was a virgin. But he was born of a virgin espoused, made up to be married, and contracted, to put honour upon the married state.

4. She lived in Nazareth, a city of Galilee, a remote corner of the country, and in no reputation for religion or learning, but which bordered upon the heathen, and therefore was called Galilee of the Gentiles. The angel was sent to her from Nazareth. No distance or disadvantage of place shall be a prejudice to those for whom God has favours in store.

II. The address of the angel to her, v. 28. He surprised her with this salutation, Hail, thou that art highly favoured. This was intended to raise in her, 1. A value for herself. In some, who like Mary pore only on their low estate, there is occasion for it. 2. An expectation of great news, not from abroad, but from above. Hail, thou, χαῖρε—rejoice thou; it was the usual form of salutation.

(1) She is dignified: "Thou art highly favoured. God, in his choice of thee to be the mother of the Messiah, has put an honour upon thee peculiar to thyself."

(2) She has the presence of God with her: "The Lord is with thee." Nothing is to be despaired of, not the performance of any service, not the obtaining of any favour, though ever so great, if we have God with us.

(3) She has the blessing of God upon her: "Blessed art thou among women; not only thou shalt be accounted so by men, but thou shalt be so. Thou that art so highly favoured in this instance mayest expect in other things to be blessed." She explains this herself (v. 48), All generations shall call me blessed.

III. The consternation she was in, upon this address, v. 29. When she saw him she is confounded at it, as not conscious to herself of anything that either merited or promised such great things; and she cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be. Was it from heaven or of men? Her thoughtfulness upon this occasion gives a very useful intimation to young people of her sex, when addresses are made to them, to consider and cast in their minds what manner of salutations they are.

IV. The message itself which the angel had to deliver to her. He went on with his errand, v. 30. To what he had said she made no reply; he therefore confirms it: "Fear not, Mary, thou hast found favour with God more than thou thinkest of, as there are many who think they are more favoured of God than really they are." Doth God favour thee? Is he for thee? No matter who is against thee.

1. Though she is a virgin, she shall have the honour of being a mother: "Thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, thou shalt call his name Jesus," v. 31.

2. Though she lives in poverty and obscurity, yet she shall have the honour to be the mother of the Messiah; her son shall be named Jesus—a Saviour. He will be very nearly allied to the upper world. He shall be great, truly great, for he shall be called the Son of the Highest. He shall be called, and not miscalled, the Son of the Highest. Those who are the children of God, are truly great, and therefore are concerned to be very good, 1 John iii. 1, 2. He will be very highly preferred in the lower world; for, though appearing in the form of a servant, yet the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, v. 32. His people will not give him that throne, but the Lord God shall give him a right to rule them, and set him as his king upon the holy hill of Zion. He assures her, (1) That his kingdom shall be spiritual: he shall reign over the house of Jacob. It must therefore be a spiritual kingdom, the house of Israel according to promise, that he must rule over. (2) That it shall be eternal: he shall reign for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. Other crowns endure not to every generation, but Christ's doth.

V. The further information given her, upon her enquiry.

1. It is a just enquiry which she makes: "How shall this be?" v. 34. She knew that the Messiah must be born of a virgin; and, if she must be his mother, she desires to know how. This was not the language of her distrust, but of a desire to be further instructed.

2. It is a satisfactory answer that is given to it, v. 25. (1) She shall conceive by the power of the Holy Ghost. A divine power will undertake it, the power of the Holy Ghost himself.

(2) She must ask no questions concerning the way and manner how it shall be wrought; for the Holy Ghost, as the power of the Highest, shall overshadow her. The formation of every babe in the womb, and the entrance of the spirit of life into it, is a mystery in nature. We were made in secret. Much more was the formation of the child Jesus a mystery.

(3) The child she shall conceive is a holy thing, and therefore must not be conceived by ordinary generation. He is spoken of emphatically, That Holy Thing, such as never was; and he shall be called the Son of God. His human nature must be so produced, as it was fit that should be which was to be taken into union with the divine nature.

3. It was a further encouragement to her faith to be told that her cousin Elisabeth, though stricken in years, was with child, v. 36. Here is an age of wonders beginning. This is the sixth month with her that was called barren. The angel assures Mary of this, to encourage her faith, and concludes with that great truth, of undoubted certainty and universal use, For with God nothing shall be impossible (v. 37), and, if nothing, then not this. No word of God must be incredible to us, as long as no work of God is impossible to him.

VI. Her acquiescence in the will of God concerning her, v. 38. She owns herself, 1. A believing subject to the divine authority: "Behold, the handmaid of the Lord. Lord, I am at thy service." She leaves the issue with God, and submits entirely to his will. 2. A believing expectant of the divine favour. She is not only content that it should be so, but humbly desires that it may be so: Be it unto me according to thy word. We must, as Mary here, guide our desires by the word of God, and ground our hopes upon it. Be it unto me according to thy word; just so, and no otherwise.

Hereupon, the angel departed from her; having completed the errand he was sent upon, he returned.

Verses 39–56

We have here an interview between the two happy mothers, Elisabeth and Mary. Sometimes it may prove a better piece of service than we think to bring good people together, to compare notes.

I. The visit which Mary made to Elisabeth, v. 39. She arose, and left her affairs, to attend this greater matter: in those days, at that time. She went with care, diligence, and expedition. She went to a city of Judah in the hill-country; thither Mary hastened, though it was a long journey, some scores of miles.

It is generally supposed that she went thither for the confirming of her faith, and to rejoice with her sister-favourite. And, besides, she went thither, perhaps, that she might be more retired from company, or else might have more agreeable company than she could have in Nazareth. We may suppose that she did not acquaint any of her neighbours at Nazareth with the message she had received from heaven, yet longed to talk over a thing she had a thousand times thought over, and knew no person in the world with whom she could freely converse concerning it but her cousin Elisabeth. It is very beneficial and comfortable for those that have a good work of grace begun in their souls, to consult those who are in the same case. They will find that, as in water face answers to face, so doth the heart of man to man, of Christian to Christian.

II. The meeting between Mary and Elisabeth. Mary entered into the house of Zacharias. She saluted Elisabeth (v. 40), told her that she was come to make her visit, and rejoice with her in her joy.

1. The babe leaped in her womb, v. 41. It is very probable that she had often felt the child stir; but this was a more than ordinary motion of the child, which alarmed her to expect something very extraordinary. The babe leaped as it were to give a signal to his mother that he was now at hand whose forerunner he was to be.

2. Elisabeth was herself filled with the Holy Ghost, or a Spirit of prophecy, by which she was given to understand that the Messiah was at hand. The uncommon motion of the babe in her womb was a token of the extraordinary emotion of her spirit under a divine impulse.

III. The welcome which Elisabeth, by the Spirit of prophecy, gave to Mary, the mother of our Lord.

1. She congratulates her on her honour. She spoke with a loud voice. She said, Blessed art thou among women, the same word that the angel had said, v. 28. But Elisabeth adds a reason, Therefore blessed art thou because blessed is the fruit of thy womb. Elisabeth was the wife of a priest, and in years, yet she grudges not that her kinswoman, who was many years younger than she, should have the honour of conceiving in her virginity, and being the mother of the Messiah, whereas the honour put upon her was much less; she rejoices in it. While we cannot but own that we are more favoured of God than we deserve, let us by no means envy that others are more highly favoured than we are.

2. She acknowledges her condescension, in making her this visit (v. 43): Whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? She calls the virgin Mary the mother of her Lord. She not only bids her welcome to her house, but reckons this visit a great favour, which she thought herself unworthy of. Whence is this to me? Those that are filled with the Holy Ghost have low thoughts of their own merits, and high thoughts of God's favours.

3. She acquaints her with the concurrence of the babe in her womb, in this welcome to her (v. 44): "As soon as the voice of thy salutation sounded in my ears, not only my heart leaped for joy, but the babe in my womb did so too." He leaped as it were for joy that the Messiah, whose harbinger he was to be, would himself come so soon after him. This would serve very much to strengthen the faith of the virgin, that there were such assurances as these given to others.

4. She commends her faith, and encourages it (v. 45): Blessed is she that believed. Believing souls are blessed souls. They are blessed who believe the word of God, for that word will not fail them; there shall, without doubt, be a performance of those things which are told her from the Lord. The faithfulness of God is the blessedness of the faith of the saints. Those that have experienced the performance of God's promises themselves should encourage others to hope that he will be as good as his word to them also.

IV. Mary's song of praise, upon this occasion. Elisabeth's prophecy was an echo to the virgin Mary's salutation, and this song is yet a stronger echo to that prophecy. We may suppose the blessed virgin to come in, very much fatigued with her journey; yet she forgets that, and is inspired with new life, and vigour, and joy, upon the confirmation she here meets with of her faith.

1. Here are the expressions of joy and praise, and God alone the object of the praise and centre of the joy. Observe how Mary here speaks of God.

(1) With great reverence of him, as the Lord: "My soul doth magnify the Lord." Those, and those only, are advanced in mercy, who are thereby brought to think the more highly and honourably of God. The more honour God has any way put upon us, the more honour we must study to give to him; and then only are we accepted in magnifying the Lord, when our souls magnify him, and all that is within us. Praising work must be soul work.

(2) With great complacency in him as her Saviour: My spirit rejoiceth in God my Saviour. This seems to have reference to the Messiah, whom she was to be the mother of. She calls him God her Saviour; for the angel had told her that he should be the Son of the Highest, and that his name should be Jesus, a Saviour; this she fastened upon, with application to herself: He is God my Saviour. Even the mother of our Lord had need of an interest in him as her Saviour, and would have been undone without it.

2. Here are just causes assigned for this joy and praise.

(1) Upon her own account, v. 48, 49. Her spirit rejoiced in the Lord, because of the kind things he had done for her. He has regarded the low estate of his handmaiden. "He has chosen me to this honour, notwithstanding my great meanness, poverty, and obscurity." And, if God regards her low estate, he not only thereby gives a specimen of his favour to the whole race of mankind, whom he remembers in their low estate, but secures a lasting honour to her (for such the honour is that God bestows, honour that fades not away): "From henceforth all generations shall call me blessed." Elisabeth had once and again called her blessed: "But that is not all," saith she, "all generations of Gentiles as well as Jews shall call me so." Her soul magnifies the Lord (v. 49): He that is mighty has done to me great things. A great thing indeed, that a virgin should conceive. A great thing indeed, that Messiah should now at length be born. It is the power of the Highest that appears in this. She adds, and holy is his name. He that is mighty, even he whose name is holy, has done to me great things. Glorious things may be expected from him that is both mighty and holy; who can do everything, and will do everything well and for the best.

(2) Upon the account of others. The virgin Mary, as the mother of the Messiah, is become a kind of public person, and therefore looks abroad, looks about her, looks before her, and takes notice of God's various dealings with the children of men, v. 50, &c. It is a certain truth that God has mercy in store, mercy in reserve. But never did this appear so as in sending his Son into the world to save us (v. 50): His mercy is on them that fear him; it has always been so. But he hath manifested this mercy, so as never before, in sending his Son to bring in an everlasting righteousness, and work out an everlasting salvation, for them that fear him, and this from generation to generation; for there are gospel privileges transmitted by entail, and intended for perpetuity. In him mercy is settled upon all that fear God, pardoning mercy, healing mercy, accepting mercy, crowning mercy, from generation to generation, while the world stands. It has been a common observation that God in his providence puts contempt upon the haughty and honour upon the humble. As God had, with his mercy to her, shown himself mighty also (v. 48, 49), so he had, with his mercy on them that fear him, shown strength likewise with his arm. In the course of his providence, it is his usual method to cross the expectations of men. Proud men expect to carry all before them, but he scatters them in the imagination of their hearts, and brings them low. The mighty think to secure themselves by might in their seats, but he puts them down, while, on the other hand, those of low degree are wonderfully exalted. This observation concerning honour holds likewise concerning riches; many who were so poor that they had not bread for themselves and their families, by some surprising turn of Providence in favour of them, come to be filled with good things; while, on the other hand, those who were rich, are strangely impoverished, and sent away empty. God takes a pleasure in disappointing their expectations who promise themselves great things in the world, and in out-doing the expectations of those who promise themselves but a little. As a good God, it is his glory to exalt those who humble themselves, and to speak comfort to those who fear before him. The gospel grace is shown

1. In the spiritual honours it dispenses. When the proud Pharisees were rejected, and Publicans and sinners went into the kingdom of heaven before them,—when the Jews, who followed after the law of righteousness, did not attain it, and the Gentiles, who never thought of it, attained to righteousness (Rom. ix. 30, 31),—when God chose not the wise men after the flesh, not the mighty, or the noble, to preach the gospel, and plant Christianity in the world, but the foolish and weak things of the world, and things that were despised (1 Cor. i. 26, 27)—then he scattered the proud, and put down the mighty, but exalted them of low degree.

2. In the spiritual riches it dispenses, v. 53. (1) Those who see their need of Christ, he fills with good things, with the best things; he gives liberally to them, and they are abundantly satisfied. Those who are weary and heavy-laden shall find rest with Christ, and those who thirst are called to come to him and drink. (2) Those who are rich, who, like Laodicea, think they have need of nothing, are full of themselves, and think they have a sufficiency in themselves, those he sends away from his door; he sends them empty away; they come full of self, and are sent away empty of Christ.

It was always expected that the Messiah should be the strength and glory of his people Israel, and so he is in a peculiar manner (v. 54): He hath helped his servant Israel. He hath taken them by the hand, and helped them up that were fallen and could not help themselves. The sending of the Messiah, on whom help was laid for poor sinners, was the greatest kindness that could be done and that which magnifies it is,

First, That it is in remembrance of his mercy. While this blessing was deferred, his people were often ready to ask, Has God forgotten to be gracious? But now he made it appear that he had not forgotten, but remembered, his mercy. He remembered the days of old.

Secondly, That it is in performance of his promise. It is a mercy not only designed, but declared (v. 55); it was what he spoke to our fathers, and particularly to Abraham, that in his seed all the families of the earth shall be blessed with the blessings that are for ever. What God hath spoken he will perform; what he hath spoken to the fathers will be performed to their seed.

Lastly, Mary's return to Nazareth (v. 56), after she had continued with Elisabeth about three months. Those in whose hearts Christ is formed take more delight than they used to do in sitting alone and keeping silence.

Verses 57–66

I. The birth of John Baptist, v. 57. Elisabeth's full time came, that she should be delivered, and then she brought forth a son. Promised mercies are to be expected when the full time for them is come, and not before.

II. The great joy that was among all the relations of the family, upon this extraordinary occasion (v. 58): Her neighbours and her cousins heard of it. Now these here discovered, 1. A pious regard to God. They acknowledged that the Lord had magnified his mercy to her, so the word is. Many things concurred to make the mercy great—that she had been long barren, was now old, but especially that the child should be great in the sight of the Lord. 2. A friendly regard to Elisabeth. When she rejoiced, they rejoiced with her. We ought to take pleasure in the prosperity of our neighbours and friends, and to be thankful to God for their comforts as for our own.

III. The dispute that was among them concerning the naming him (v. 59): On the eighth day they came together, to circumcise the child. They that rejoiced in the birth of the child came together to the circumcising of him. The greatest comfort we can take in our children is in giving them up to God. The baptism of our children should be more our joy than their birth.

Now it was the custom, when they circumcised their children, to name them, and it is not unfit that they should be left nameless till they are by name given up to God.

1. Some proposed that he should be called by his father's name, Zacharias. They intended hereby to do honour to the father, who was not likely to have another child.

2. The mother opposed it, and would have him called John; having learned that God appointed this to be his name (v. 60): He shall be called Johanan—Gracious, because he shall introduce the gospel of Christ, wherein God's grace shines more brightly than ever.

3. The relations objected against that (v. 61): "There is none of thy kindred that is called by that name; and therefore let him have the name of some of his kindred."

4. They appealed to the father, for it was his office to name the child, v. 62. They made signs to him, by which it appears that he was deaf as well as dumb. However, they gave him to understand what the dispute was which he only could determine; whereupon he made signs to them to give him a table-book. He wrote these words, His name is John, v. 63. Not, "It shall be so," or, "I would have it so," but, "It is so." The matter is determined already. When Zacharias could not speak, he wrote. When ministers have their mouths stopped, that they cannot preach, yet they may be doing good as long as they have not their hands tied, that they cannot write. Zacharias's pitching upon the same name that Elisabeth had chosen was a great surprise to the company: They marvelled all.

5. He thereupon recovered the use of his speech (v. 64): His mouth was opened immediately. The time prefixed for his being silenced was till the day that these things shall be fulfilled, v. 20. That time was now expired, whereupon the restraint was taken off, and God gave him the opening of the mouth again. Infidelity closed his mouth, and now believing opens it again. His mouth was opened, and he spake, and praised God. When God opens our lips, our mouths must show forth his praise. As good be without our speech as not use it in praising God.

6. These things were told all the country over, to the great amazement of all that heard them, v. 65, 66. We are here told, (1) That these sayings were discoursed of, and were the common talk all about the hill-country of Judæa. (2) That most people who heard of these things were put into consternation by them: Fear came on all them that dwelt round about there. (3) It raised the expectations of people concerning this child. They laid up these presages in their hearts. What we hear, that may be of use to us, we should treasure up, that we may be able to bring forth, for the benefit of others, things new and old, and may be able to look back and to say, "It was what we might expect." They said within themselves, and said among themselves, "What manner of child shall this be? What will be the fruit when these are the buds?"

Lastly, It is said, The hand of the Lord was with him; that is, he was taken under the special protection of the Almighty, from his birth, as one designed for something great. God has ways of operating upon children in their infancy, which we cannot account for. God never made a soul but he knew how to sanctify it.

We have here the song wherewith Zacharias praised God when his mouth was opened; in it he is said to prophesy, v. 67.

I. How he was qualified for this: He was filled with the Holy Ghost; he was divinely inspired. God not only forgave him his unbelief and distrust, he filled him with the Holy Ghost.

II. What the matter of his song was. Here is nothing said of the private concerns of his own family, the rolling away of the reproach from it, but in this song he is wholly taken up with the kingdom of the Messiah. The Old Testament prophecies are often expressed in praises and new songs, so is this beginning of New Testament prophecy: Blessed be the Lord

God of Israel. Zacharias, speaking of the work of redemption, called him the Lord God of Israel, because to Israel the prophecies, promises, and types, of the redemption had hitherto been given, and to them the first proffers and proposals of it were now to be made.

Now Zacharias here blesses God,

1. For the work of salvation that was to be wrought out by the Messiah himself, v. 68–75.

(1) In sending the Messiah, God has made a gracious visit to his people; he hath visited them as a friend, to take cognizance of their case.

(2) He has wrought out redemption for them: He has redeemed his people. This was the errand on which Christ came into the world, to redeem those that were sold for sin, and sold under sin. Christ redeems them by price out of the hands of God's justice, and redeems them by power out of the hands of Satan's tyranny.

(3) He has fulfilled the covenant of royalty made with the most famous Old Testament prince, that is, David. Glorious things had been said of his family, that on him, as a mighty one, help should be laid. But that family had been long in a manner cast off. Now here it is gloried in, that, according to the promise, the horn of David should again be made to bud; he hath raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David (v. 69), there, where it was promised and expected to arise. There is in Christ, and in him only, salvation for us. and it is a horn of salvation. It is an honourable salvation. It is raised up above all other salvations, none of which are to be compared with it. It is a plentiful salvation. It is a cornucopia—a horn of plenty. It is a powerful salvation. He has raised up such a salvation as shall pull down our spiritual enemies, and protect us from them.

(4) He has fulfilled all the precious promises made to the church by the most famous Old Testament prophets (v. 70): As he spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets. His doctrine of salvation by the Messiah is confirmed by an appeal to the prophets. God is now doing that which he has long ago spoken of. See, [1] How sacred the prophecies of this salvation were. The prophets who delivered them were holy prophets, and it was the holy God himself that spoke by them. [2] How ancient they were: ever since the world began. God having promised, when the world began, that the Seed of the woman should break the serpent's head. [3] What a wonderful harmony and concert we perceive among them. God spoke the same thing by them all.

Now what is this salvation which was prophesied of?

First, It is a rescue from the malice of our enemies; a salvation out of our enemies, from among them, and out of the power of them that hate us (v. 71); it is a salvation from sin. He shall save his people from their sins, that they may not have dominion over them, Matt. i. 21.

Secondly, It is a restoration to the favour of God; it is to perform the mercy promised to our forefathers, v. 72. The Redeemer shall reinstate us in the mercy of God and re-establish us in his covenant; which was signified by the promises made to the patriarchs, and the holy covenant made with them, the oath which he sware to our Father Abraham, v. 73. That which was promised to the fathers, and is performed to us, is mercy, pure mercy; nothing in it is owing to our merit. He loved us because he would love us. God herein had an eye to his holy covenant, that covenant with Abraham: I will be a God to thee and thy seed. This his seed had really forfeited by their transgressions; this he seemed to have forgotten in the calamities brought upon them; but he will now remember it.

Thirdly, It is a qualification for, and an encouragement to, the service of God. Thus was the oath he sware to our Father Abraham, That he would give us power and grace to serve him, in an acceptable manner to him and a comfortable manner to ourselves, v. 74, 75. The great design of gospel grace is not to discharge us from, but to engage us to, and encourage us in, the service of God. We are therefore delivered from the iron yoke of sin, that our necks may be put under the sweet and easy yoke of the Lord Jesus. The very bonds which he has loosed do bind us faster unto him. We are hereby enabled, 1. To serve God without fear—ἀφόβως. We are therefore put into a state of holy safety that we might serve God with a holy security and serenity of mind, as those that are quiet from the fears of evil. God must be served with a filial fear, a reverent obedient fear, an awakening quickening fear, but not with a slavish fear, like that of the slothful servant, who represented him to himself as a hard master, and unreasonable. 2. To serve him in holiness and righteousness, which includes the whole duty of man towards God and our neighbour. 3. To serve him, before him, in the duties of his immediate worship, to serve him as those that have an eye always upon him, and see his eye always upon us, upon our inward man. 4. To serve him all the days of our life. Christ loved us to the end, and thereby engaged us to love him to the end.

2. He blessed God for the work of preparation for this salvation, which was to be done by John Baptist (v. 76): Thou child shalt be called the prophet of the Highest. Jesus Christ is the Highest. John Baptist was his prophet. Prophecy had now long ceased, but in John it revived. John's business was,

(1) To prepare people for the salvation: Thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways. Let everything that may obstruct his progress, or embarrass it, or hinder people from coming to him, be taken away: see Isa. xl. 3, 4.

(2) To give people a general idea of the salvation, for the doctrine he preached was that the kingdom of heaven is at hand. There are two things in which you must know that this salvation consists:—

[1] The forgiveness of what we have done amiss. It is salvation by the remission of sins, v. 77. John Baptist gave people to understand that, though their case was sad, it was not desperate, for pardon might be obtained through the tender mercy of our God: there was nothing in us but a piteous case to recommend us to the divine compassion.

[2] Direction to do better for the time to come. The gospel salvation sets up a clear and true light, by which we may order our steps aright. In it the day-spring hath visited us from on high (v. 78); and this also is owing to the tender mercy of our God. Christ is the morning Light, the rising Sun. The gospel brings light with it, leaves us not to wander in the darkness of Pagan ignorance, or in the moonlight of the Old Testament types or figures, but in it the day dawns; in John Baptist it began to break, but increased apace, and shone more and more to the perfect day. We have as much reason to welcome the gospel day as those have to welcome the morning who had long waited for it. First, The gospel is discovering; it is to give light to them that sit in darkness, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Secondly, It is reviving; it brings light to them that sit in the shadow of death, as condemned prisoners in the dungeon, to bring them the tidings of a pardon, at least of a reprieve and opportunity of producing a pardon. How pleasant is that light! Thirdly, It is directing; it is to guide our feet in the way of peace. It guides us into the way of making our peace with God; that way of peace which as sinners we have wandered from and have not known, nor could ever have known of ourselves.

In the last verse, we have a short account of the younger years of John Baptist. We are here told,

1. Of his eminence as to the inward man: The child grew in the capacities of his mind, so that he waxed strong in spirit, had a strong judgment and strong resolution. Those that are strong in the Lord are strong in spirit.

2. Of his obscurity as to the outward man: He was in the deserts. There he spent most of his time, in contemplation and devotion, and had not his education in the schools, or at the feet of the rabbin. Many a one is qualified for great usefulness, who yet is buried alive; and many are long so buried who are designed, and are thereby in the fitting, for so much greater usefulness at last; as John Baptist, who was in the desert only till the day of his showing to Israel. There is a time fixed for the showing of those favours to Israel which are reserved.

CHAP. II

In this chapter, we have an account of the birth and infancy of our Lord Jesus. I. The place and other circumstances of his birth, ver. 1–7. II. The notifying of his birth to the shepherds in that neighbourhood by an angel, and the spreading of the report of it by the shepherds, ver. 8–20. III. The circumcision of Christ, and the naming of him, ver. 21. IV. The presenting of him in the temple, ver. 22–24. V. The testimonies of Simeon, and Anna the prophetess, concerning him, ver. 25–39. VI. Christ's growth and capacity, ver. 40–52. VII. His observing the passover at twelve years old, and his disputing with the doctors in the temple, ver. 41–51.

Verses 1–7

The fulness of time was now come, when God would send forth his Son, and it was foretold that he should be born at Bethlehem. Now here we have an account of the time, place, and manner of it.

I. The time when our Lord Jesus was born.

1. He was born at the time when the fourth monarchy was in its height. He was born in the days of Augustus Cæsar, when the Roman empire extended itself further than ever before or since, including Parthia one way, and Britain another way; so that it was then called Terrarum orbis imperium—The empire of the whole earth; and here that empire is called all the world (v. 1), for there was scarcely any part of the civilized world, but what was dependent on it.

2. He was born when Judæa was become a province of the empire, and tributary to it; as appears evidently by this, that when all the Roman empire was taxed, the Jews were taxed among the rest. Jerusalem was taken by Pompey the Roman general, about sixty years before this. Judæa was ruled by Cyrenius the Roman governor of Syria (v. 2). This was the first taxing that was made in Judæa, the first badge of their servitude.

3. There is another circumstance, as to the time, which is, that there was now universal peace in the empire. The temple of Janus was now shut, which it never used to be if any wars were on foot; and now it was fit for the Prince of peace to be born.

II. The place where our Lord Jesus was born is very observable. He was born at Bethlehem; so it was foretold (Mic. v. 2), the scribes so understood it (Matt. ii. 5, 6), so did the common people, John vii. 42. The name of the place was significant. Bethlehem signifies the house of bread; a proper place for him to be born in who is the Bread of life, the Bread that came down from heaven. Bethlehem was the city of David, where he was born, and therefore there he must be born who was the Son of David. Zion was also called the city of David, yet Christ was not born there; for Bethlehem was that city of David where he was born in meanness, to be a shepherd; and this our Saviour chose for the place of his birth; not Zion, where he ruled in power and prosperity. Now when the virgin Mary was with child, and near her time, Providence so ordered it that, by order from the emperor, all the subjects of the Roman empire were to be taxed; that is, they were to be registered and enrolled, according to their families, which is the proper signification of the word here used.

That which Augustus designed was either to gratify his pride in knowing the numbers of his people, and proclaiming it to the world, or he did it in policy, to make his government appear the more formidable; but Providence had another reach in it. All the world shall be at the trouble of being enrolled, only that Joseph and Mary may. This brought them up from Nazareth in Galilee to Bethlehem in Judæa, because they were of the stock and lineage of David, v. 4, 5. Divers ends of Providence were served by this.

1. Hereby the virgin Mary was brought, great with child, to Bethlehem, to be delivered there, according to the prediction. See how man purposes and God disposes.

2. Hereby it appeared that Jesus Christ was of the seed of David; for what brings his mother to Bethlehem, now, but because she was of the stock and lineage of David?

3. Hereby it appeared that he was made under the law; for he became a subject of the Roman empire as soon as he was born. Instead of having kings tributaries to him, when he came into the world he was himself a tributary.

III. The circumstances of his birth, which were very mean. He was indeed a first-born son; but it was poor honour to be the first-born of such a poor woman as Mary was, who had no inheritance but what was in nativity.

1. He was under some abasements in common with other children; he was wrapped in swaddling clothes, as other children are when they are new-born, as if he could be bound, or needed to be kept straight. The Ancient of days became an infant of a span long.

2. He was under some abasements peculiar to himself.

(1) He was born at an inn. Christ was born in an inn, to intimate that he came into the world but to sojourn here for awhile, as in an inn. An inn receives all comers, and so does Christ. He hangs out the banner of love for his sign, and whoever comes to him, he will in no wise cast out; only, unlike other inns, he welcomes those that come without money and without price.

(2) He was born in a stable; so some think the word signifies which we translate a manger. Because there was no room in the inn, and for want of conveniences, nay for want of necessaries, he was laid in the manger, instead of a cradle. His being born in a stable and laid in a manger was an instance, [1] Of the poverty of his parents. Had they been rich, room would have been made for them. [2] Of the corruption and degeneracy of manners in that age. If there had been any common humanity among them, they would not have turned a woman in travail into a stable. [3] It was an instance of the humiliation of our Lord Jesus. We were become by sin like an outcast infant, helpless and forlorn; and such a one Christ was.

The meanest circumstances of Christ's humiliation were all along attended with some discoveries of his glory, to balance them. When we saw him wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid in a manger, we were tempted to say, "Surely this cannot be the Son of God." But see his birth attended with a choir of angels, and we shall say, "Surely it can be no other than the Son of God."

We had in Matthew an account of the notice given to the wise men, who were Gentiles, by a star; here we are told of the notice given of it to the shepherds who were Jews, by an angel: to each God chose to speak in the language they were most conversant with.

I. How the shepherds were employed; they were abiding in the fields and keeping watch over their flocks by night, v. 8. The angel was not sent to the chief priests or the elders, but to a company of poor shepherds. The patriarchs were shepherds and by this instance God would show that he had still a favour for those of that innocent employment. They were not sleeping in their beds, when this news was brought them, but abiding in the fields, and watching. They were broad awake, and therefore could not be deceived in what they saw and heard, so as those may be who are half asleep. They were employed now, not in acts of devotion, but in the business of their calling; they were keeping watch over their flock. We are not out of the way of divine visits when we are sensibly employed in an honest calling, and abide with God in it.

II. How they were surprised with the appearance of an angel (v. 9): Behold, an angel of the Lord came upon them, of a sudden. The angel's coming upon them intimates that they little thought of such a thing, or expected it. Gracious visits are made us from heaven, or ever we are aware. They saw and heard the glory of the Lord round about them; such as made the night as bright as day. This made them sore afraid, as fearing some evil tidings. While we are conscious to ourselves of so much guilt, we have reason to fear lest every express from heaven should be a messenger of wrath.

III. What the message was which the angel had to deliver to the shepherds, v. 10–12. "Fear not, you need not fear your enemies, and should not fear your friends." He furnishes them with abundant matter for joy: "Behold, I evangelize to you great joy. It shall bring joy to all people; that unto you is born this day a Saviour which is Christ the Lord, in the city of David," v. 11. "The Saviour is born this day; and, since it is matter of great joy to all people, you may proclaim it. He is born in the place where it was foretold he should be born, in the city of David; and he is born to you; to you Jews he is sent in the first place, to bless you, to you shepherds, though poor and mean in the world." This refers to Isa. ix. 6. Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given. This is matter of joy indeed to all people, great joy. Long-looked for is come at last. He gives them a sign for the confirming of their faith in this matter. "You will find him by this token: he is lying in a manger, where surely never any new-born infant was laid before. You will find him wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger.

IV. The angels' doxology to God, and congratulations of men, upon this solemn occasion, v. 13, 14. The message was no sooner delivered by one angel than suddenly there was with that angel a multitude of the heavenly hosts praising God. Let God have the honour of this work: Glory to God in the highest; Glory to God, whose kindness and love designed this favour, and whose wisdom contrived it. Other works of God are for his glory, but the redemption of the world is for his glory in the highest. Let men have the joy of it: On earth peace, goodwill toward men. If God be at peace with us, all peace results from it. Peace is here put for all good. All the good we have, or hope, is owing to God's goodwill; and, if we have the comfort of it, he must have the glory of it. Here was the peace proclaimed with great solemnity; whoever will, let them come and take the benefit of it. It is on earth peace, to men of goodwill (so some copies read it), ἀνθρώποις εὐδοκίας; to men who have a goodwill to God; or to men whom God has a goodwill to. This is a faithful saying, and well worthy of all acceptation, That the goodwill of God toward men is glory to God in the highest, and peace on the earth.

V. The visit which the shepherds made to the new-born Saviour. 1. They consulted about it, v. 15. While the angels were singing their hymn, they could attend to that only; but, when they were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us go to Bethlehem. And it is no reflection upon the testimony of angels, no nor upon a divine testimony itself, to get it corroborated by observation and experience. These shepherds do not speak doubtfully, "Let us go see whether it be so or no"; but with assurance, Let us go see this thing which is come to pass; for what room was left to doubt of it, when the Lord had thus made it known to them? 2. They immediately made the visit, v. 16. They lost no time, but came with haste to the place, and there they found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in the manger. The poverty and meanness in which they found Christ the Lord were no shock to their faith, who themselves knew what it was to live a life of comfortable communion with God in very poor and mean circumstances. We have reason to think that the shepherds told Joseph and Mary of the vision of the angels they had seen, and the song of the angels they had heard, which was a great encouragement to them, more than if a visit had been made them by the best ladies in the town.

VI. The care which the shepherds took to spread the report of this (v. 17): When they had seen it they made known abroad the whole story of what was told them, both by the angels, and by Joseph and Mary, concerning this child, that he was the Saviour, even Christ the Lord, that in him there is peace on earth. This they told everybody, and agreed in their testimony concerning it. What impression did it make upon people? Why truly, All they that heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds, v. 18. They wondered, but never enquired any further about the Saviour, but let the thing drop as a nine days' wonder.

VII. The use which those made of these things, who did believe them. 1. The virgin Mary made them the matter of her private meditation. She said little, but kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart, v. 19. As she had silently left it to God to clear up her virtue, when that was suspected, so she silently leaves it to him to publish her honour, now when it was veiled; and it is satisfaction enough to find that, if no one else takes notice of the birth of her child, angels do. The truths of Christ are worth keeping; and the way to keep them safe is to ponder them. Meditation is the best help to memory. 2. The shepherds made them the matter of their more public praises. If others were not affected with those things, yet they themselves were (v. 20): They returned, glorifying and praising God. God would accept the thanksgivings they offered to him. They praised God for what they had heard from the angel, and for what they had seen, the babe in the manger, as it had been spoken to them. They thanked God that they had seen Christ. As afterwards the cross of Christ, so now his manger, was to some foolishness and a stumbling-block, but others saw in it, and admired, and praised, the wisdom of God and the power of God.

Verses 21–24

Our Lord Jesus, being made of a woman, was made under the law, Gal. iv. 4. As the son of a daughter of Abraham he was made under the law of Moses.

Now here we have two instances of his being made under that law, and submitting to it.

I. He was circumcised on the very day that the law appointed (v. 21): When eight days were accomplished they circumcised him. Though it was a painful operation, yet Christ would undergo it for us. Though it supposed him a stranger, that was by that ceremony to be admitted into covenant with God, though it supposed him a sinner, yet he submitted to it; nay, therefore he submitted to it, because he would be made in the likeness, not only of flesh, but of sinful flesh, Rom. viii. 3. Though thereby he made himself a debtor to the whole law (Gal. v. 3), yet he submitted to it. Christ was circumcised, that he might own himself of the seed of Abraham; that he might own himself a surety for our sins, and an undertaker for our safety; that he might justify the dedication of the infant seed of the church to God, by that ordinance which is the instituted seal of the covenant, as circumcision was (Rom. iv. 11), and baptism is.

At his circumcision he had his name given him; he was called Jesus or Joshua, for he was so named of the angel to his mother Mary before he was conceived in the womb (Luke i. 31) and to his supposed father Joseph after, Matt. i. 21. It was a common name among the Jews, and in this he would be made like unto his brethren. It was the name of two eminent types of him in the Old Testament, Joshua, the successor of Moses; and Joshua, the high priest, Zech. vi. 11, 13. It was very significant of his undertaking. Jesus signifies a Saviour. He brings salvation.

II. He was presented in the temple. This was done at the time appointed by the law, when he was forty days old, when the days of her purification were accomplished, v. 22. Now, according to the law,

1. The child Jesus, being a first-born son, was presented to the Lord. The law is here recited (v. 23): Every male that opens the womb shall be called holy to the Lord. Christ was the first-born among many brethren, and was called holy to the Lord, so as never any other was; yet he was presented to the Lord as other first-born were, and no otherwise. But, according to the law, he was redeemed, Num. xviii. 15. The first-born of man shalt thou redeem, and five shekels was the value, Lev. xxvii. 6; Num. xviii. 16. But probably in case of poverty the priest was allowed to take less, or perhaps nothing; for no mention is made of it here.

2. The mother brought her offerings, v. 24. So it is said in the law of the Lord, that law which was yet in force, she must offer a pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons; had she been of ability, she must have brought a lamb for a burnt-offering, and a dove for a sin-offering; but, being poor, and not able to reach the price of a lamb, she brings two doves, one for a burnt-offering and the other for a sin-offering (see Lev. xii. 6, 8). Christ was not conceived and born in sin, as others are, yet, because he was made under the law, he complied with it. Thus it became him to fulfil all righteousness.

Verses 25–40

Even when he humbles himself, still Christ has honour done him. Simeon and Anna now do him honour, by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

I. A very honourable testimony is born to him by Simeon. Now observe here,

1. The account that is given us concerning this Simeon, or Simon. He dwelt now in Jerusalem, and was eminent for his piety and communion with God. Some learned men, who have been conversant with the Jewish writers, find that there was at this time one Simeon, a man of great note in Jerusalem. The Jews say that he was endued with a prophetical spirit. One thing objected against this conjecture is that at this time his father Hillel was living, and that he himself lived many years after this; but, as to that, he is not here said to be old; and his saying Now let thy servant depart intimates that he was willing to die now, but does not conclude that therefore he did die quickly. Another thing objected is that the son of Simeon was Gamaliel, a Pharisee, and an enemy to Christianity; but, as to that, it is no new thing for a faithful lover of Christ to have a son a bigoted Pharisee.

The account given of him here is, (1) That he was just and devout, just towards men and devout towards God; these two must always go together, and each will befriend the other, but neither will atone for the defect of the other. (2) That he waited for the consolation of Israel, that is, for the coming of the Messiah. Christ is not only the author of his people's comfort, but the matter and ground of it. He was long coming, and they who believed he would come continued waiting, desiring his coming, and hoping for it with patience; I had almost said, with some degree of impatience waiting till it came. The consolation of Israel is to be waited for, and it is worth waiting for, and it will be very welcome to those who have waited for it, and continue waiting. (3) That the Holy Ghost was upon him, not only as a Spirit of holiness, but as a Spirit of prophecy; he was filled with the Holy Ghost. (4) That he had a gracious promise made him, that before he died he should have a sight of the Messiah, v. 26. He received this oracle (for so the word signifies), that he should not see death before he had seen the Messiah, the Lord's Anointed. Those, and those only, can with courage see death, and look it in the face without terror, that have had by faith a sight of Christ.

2. The seasonable coming of Simeon into the temple, at the time when Christ was presented there, v. 27. Just then, when Joseph and Mary brought in the child, Simeon came, by direction of the Spirit, into the temple. The same Spirit that had provided for the support of his hope now provided for the transport of his joy. Those that would see Christ must go to his temple; for there the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to meet you, and there you must be ready to meet him.

3. The abundant satisfaction wherewith he welcomed this sight: He took him up in his arms (v. 28), he embraced him, laid him in his bosom, as near his heart as he could, which was as full of joy as it could hold. He took him up in his arms, to present him to the Lord. When we receive the record which the gospel gives us of Christ with a lively faith, and the offer it makes us of Christ with love and resignation, then we take Christ in our arms. It was promised him that he should have a sight of Christ; but more is performed than was promised: he has him in his arms.

4. The solemn declaration he made hereupon: He blessed God, and said, Lord, now let thou thy servant depart in peace, v. 29–32.

(1) He has a pleasant prospect concerning himself, he is arrived at a holy contempt of life, and desire of death: "Lord, now let thou thy servant depart, for mine eyes have seen the salvation I was promised a sight of before I died." Here is, [1] An acknowledgment that God had been as good as his word. Never any that hoped in God's word were made ashamed of their hope. [2] A thanksgiving for it. He blessed God that he saw that salvation in his arms. [3] A confession of his faith, that this child in his arms was the Saviour, the Salvation itself; thy salvation, the salvation of thine appointing, the salvation which thou hast prepared. [4] It is a farewell to this world: "Now let thy servant depart." The eye is not satisfied with seeing till it hath seen Christ, and then it is. What a poor thing doth this world look to one that hath Christ in his arms and salvation in his eye! [5] It is a welcome to death: Now let thy servant depart. Simeon is promised that he should not see death till he had seen Christ; and he is willing to construe what was expressed, as an intimation that, when he had seen Christ, he should die: Lord, be it so, saith he, now let me depart. See here, First, How comfortable the death of a good man is; he departs as God's servant from the place of his toil to that of his rest. He departs in peace, peace with God, peace with his own conscience; in peace with death. Secondly, What is the ground of this comfort? For mine eyes have seen thy salvation. It bespeaks a believing expectation of a happy state on the other side death, through this salvation he now had a sight of, which not only takes off the terror of death, but makes in gain, Phil. i. 21. Those that have welcomed Christ may welcome death.

(2) He has a pleasant prospect concerning the world, and concerning the church. This salvation shall be a blessing to the world. It is prepared before the face of all people, to be a light to lighten the Gentiles that now sit in darkness. This has reference to Isa. xlix. 6, I will give thee for a light to the Gentiles; for Christ came to be the light of the world, not a candle in the Jewish candlestick, but the Sun of righteousness; a blessing to the church: the glory of thy people Israel. Of those who were Israelites indeed, of the spiritual Israel, he was indeed the glory, and will be so to eternity. They shall glory in him. When Christ ordered his apostles to preach the gospel to all nations, therein he made himself a light to lighten the Gentiles; and when he added, beginning at Jerusalem, he made himself the glory of his people Israel.

5. The prediction concerning this child, which he delivered to Joseph and Mary. They marvelled at those things which were still more and more fully and plainly spoken concerning this child, v. 33. And because they were affected with, and had their faith strengthened by, that which was said to them, here is more said to them.

(1) Simeon shows them what reason they had to rejoice; for he blessed them (v. 34). He prayed for them that God would bless them, and would have others do so too. He is set for the rising again of many in Israel, that is, for the conversion of many to God that are dead and buried in sin, and for the consolation of many in God that are sunk and lost in sorrow and despair. Those whom he is set for the fall of may be the same with those whom he is set for the rising again of; For their fall, in order to their rising again. He wounds and then heals, Paul falls, and rises again.

(2) He shows them likewise what reason they had to rejoice with trembling. Lest Joseph and Mary especially, should be lifted up with the abundance of the revelations, here is a thorn in the flesh for them, and it is what we sometimes need. It is true, Christ shall be a blessing to Israel; but there are those in Israel whom he is set for the fall of, who will be prejudiced and enraged against him, and offended. As it is pleasant to think how many there are to whom Christ and his gospel are a savour of life unto life, so it is sad to think how many there are to whom he is a savour of death unto death. He is set for a sign, to be admired by some, but by others, by many, spoken against. He had many eyes upon him, he was a sign, but he had many tongues against him. The effects of this will be that the thoughts of many hearts will be revealed (v. 35). The secret good affections and dispositions in the minds of some will be revealed by their embracing Christ, and closing with him; the secret corruptions and vicious dispositions of others will be revealed by their enmity to Christ and their rage against him. Men will be judged of by the thoughts of their hearts, their thoughts concerning Christ. The word of God is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. It is true, Christ shall be a comfort to his mother; but be not thou too proud of it, for a sword shall pass through thine own soul also. He shall be a suffering Jesus. "Thou shalt suffer with him, by sympathy, because of the nearness of thy relation, and strength of affection, to him." When he was abused, it was a sword in her bones. When she stood by his cross, and saw him dying, we may well think her inward grief was such that it might truly be said, A sword pierced through her soul, it cut her to the heart. Thou shalt suffer for him. Many understand it as a prediction of her martyrdom.

II. He is taken notice of by one Anna, a prophetess.

1. The account here given of this Anna, who she was. She was A propheteſs. Perhaps no more is meant than that she was one who had understanding in the scriptures above other women, and made it her business to instruct the younger women in the things of God. God left not himself without witness. She was the daughter of Phanuel and her name signifies gracious. She was of the tribe of Asher, which was in Galilee. She was of a great age, a widow of about eighty-four years. She never married again, but continued a widow to her dying day, which is mentioned to her praise. She was a constant resident in or at least attendant on the temple. Some think she had lodgings in the courts of the temple; others think her not departing from the temple means no more, than that she was constantly there at the time of divine service; when any good work was to be done, she was ready to join in it. She served God with fastings and prayers night and day; she gave up herself wholly to her devotions, and spent that time in religious exercises which others spent in eating and drinking and sleeping. And in these she served God; that was it that put a value upon them and an excellency into them. She served God, and aimed at his honour, in fasting and praying. Other duties are in season now and then, but we must pray always. It is a pleasant sight to see aged Christians abounding in acts of devotion, as those that are not weary of well-doing, but that take more and more pleasure in them. Anna is now at length abundantly recompensed for her attendance so many years in the temple.

2. The testimony she bore to our Lord Jesus (v. 38): She came in at that instant, she, who was so constant to the temple, could not miss the opportunity. She gave thanks likewise to the Lord, just as Simeon, perhaps like him, wishing now to depart in peace. We should be excited to our duty by the praises and thanksgiving of others; why should not we give thanks likewise, as well as they? She, as a prophetess, instructed others concerning him: She spoke of him to all them that believed the Messiah would come, and with him looked for redemption in Jerusalem. Some there were in Jerusalem that looked for redemption; yet but a few, for Anna, it should seem, had acquaintance with all. She knew where to find them, or they where to find her, and she told them all the good news, that she had seen the Lord. Those that have an acquaintance with Christ themselves should do all they can to bring others acquainted with him.

Lastly, Here is a short account of the infancy and childhood of our Lord Jesus. Where he spent it, v. 39. They returned into Galilee. Luke relates no more concerning them, till they were returned into Galilee; but it appears by St. Matthew's gospel (ch. ii) that from Jerusalem they returned to Bethlehem, and there they continued till they were directed to flee into Egypt, and, returning thence when Herod was dead, they were directed to go to their old quarters in Nazareth. It is here called their own city. How he spent it, v. 40. In all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, and therefore he passed through infancy and childhood as other children did. As other children, he grew in stature of body, and the improvement of understanding in his human soul. Whereas other children are weak in understanding and resolution, he was strong in spirit. By the Spirit of God his human soul was endued with extraordinary vigour. Whereas other children have foolishness bound in their hearts, he was filled with wisdom. Everything he said and did was wisely said, and wisely done, above his years. Whereas other children show that the corruption of nature is in them, and the tares of sin grow up with the wheat of reason, he made it appear that nothing but the grace of God was upon him. He was greatly beloved, and high in the favour of God.

We have here the only story recorded concerning our blessed Saviour, from his infancy to the day of his showing to Israel, and therefore we are concerned to make much of this, for it is in vain to wish we had more.

I. Christ's going up with his parents to Jerusalem, at the feast of the passover, v. 41, 42. It was their constant practice to attend there, according to the law, though it was a long journey, and they were poor. Public ordinances must be frequented, and we must not forsake the assembling of ourselves together. They went up thither, after the custom of the feast. The child Jesus, at twelve years old, went up with them. The Jewish doctors say that at twelve years old children must begin to fast from time to time, and that at thirteen years old a child begins to be a son of the commandment, having been from his infancy, by virtue of his circumcision, a son of the covenant. Those children that are forward in other things should be put forward in religion. Those children that were in their infancy dedicated to God should be called upon, when they are grown up, to come to the gospel passover, to the Lord's supper, that they may make it their own act and deed to join themselves to the Lord.

II. Christ's tarrying behind his parents at Jerusalem, unknown to them.

1. His parents did not return till they had fulfilled the days; they had stayed there all the seven days at the feast, though it was not absolutely necessary that they should stay longer than the two first days. It is good to stay to the conclusion of an ordinance, as becomes those who say, It is good to be here, and not to hasten away.

2. The child tarried behind in Jerusalem, not because he was loth to go home, or shy of his parents' company, but because he had business to do there, and would let his parents know that he had a Father in heaven, whom he was to be observant of more than of them; and respect to him must not be construed disrespect to them. It is good to see young people willing to dwell in the house of the Lord; they are then like Christ.

3. His parents went the first day's journey without any suspicion that he was left behind, for they supposed him to have been in the company, v. 44. On these occasions, the crowd was very great, and they concluded that he came along with some of their neighbours, and they sought him among their kindred and acquaintance. Pray did you see our Son? or, Did you see him? They found him not, v. 45. There are many, too, many who are our kinsfolk and acquaintance, that we cannot avoid conversing with, among whom we find little or nothing of Christ: When they could not hear of him, yet they hoped they should meet with him at the place where they lodged that night; but there they could learn no tidings of him.

4. When they found him not at their quarters at night, they turned back again, next morning, to Jerusalem, seeking him. Those that would find Christ must seek till they find; for he will at length be found of those that seek him. Those that have lost their comforts in Christ, must bethink themselves where, and when, and how, they lost them, and must turn back again to the place where they last had them.

5. The third day they found him in the temple. There they found him sitting in the midst of them (v. 46), not standing as a catechumen to be examined or instructed by them. This is an instance, not only that he was filled with wisdom (v. 40), but that he had both a desire to increase it and a readiness to communicate it; and herein he is an example to children and young people, who should learn of Christ to delight in the company of those they may get good by, and choose to sit in the midst of the doctors rather than in the midst of the players. Many a youth at Christ's age now would have been playing with the children in the temple, but he was sitting with the doctors in the temple. He heard them. Those that would learn must be swift to hear. He asked them questions; whether, as a teacher (he had authority so to ask) or as a learner (he had humility so to ask) I know not. He returned answers to them, which were very surprising and satisfactory, v. 47. And his wisdom and understanding appeared as much in the questions he asked as in the answers he gave, so that all who heard him were astonished: they never heard one so young, nor indeed any of their greatest doctors, talk sense at the rate that he did. He gave them a taste (says Calvin) of his divine wisdom and knowledge. They understood not; they were only astonished.

6. His mother talked with him privately about it. v. 48. Joseph and Mary were both amazed to find him there, and to find that he had so much respect showed him as to be admitted to sit among the doctors. His mother told him how ill they took it: "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? Why didst thou put us into such a fright?" Thy father and I have sought thee, sorrowing. Those may have leave to complain of their losses that think they have lost Christ. They did not sorrow and sit down in despair, but sorrowed and sought. They that thus seek him in sorrow shall find him, at length, with so much the greater joy. He gently reproved their inordinate solicitude about him (v. 49): "How is it that you sought me? Wist ye not that I ought to be, ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρός μου;—in my Father's house?" so some read it. "Under my Father's care and protection." "At my Father's work" (so we take it): I must be about my Father's business, and therefore could not go home as soon as you might. Wist ye not? It was his errand into the world, and his meat and drink in the world, to do his Father's will, and finish his work: and yet at that time his parents understood not this saying, v. 50.

Lastly, Here is their return to Nazareth. He did not urge his parents either to come and settle at Jerusalem, but very willingly retired into his obscurity at Nazareth, where for many years he was, as it were, buried alive. But here we are told,

1. That he was subject to his parents; as it should seem, worked with his father at the trade of a carpenter. Herein he hath given an example to children to be dutiful and obedient to their parents in the Lord. Though his parents were poor and mean, though he was strong in spirit, and filled with wisdom, yet he was subject to his parents; how then will they answer it who, though foolish and weak, yet are disobedient to their parents?

2. That his mother, though she did not perfectly understand her son's sayings, yet kept them in her heart. However we may neglect men's sayings because they are obscure, yet we must not think so of God's sayings. That which at first is dark, so that we know not what to make of it, may afterwards become plain and easy. We may find use for that another time which now we see not how to make useful to us.

3. That he improved, and came on, to admiration (v. 52): He increased in wisdom and stature. This is meant of his human nature, his body increased in stature and bulk, he grew in the growing age; and his soul increased in wisdom, and in all the endowments of a human soul. As the faculties of his human soul grew more and more capable, the gifts it received from the divine nature were more and more communicated. And he increased in favour with God and man. The image of God shone brighter in him, when he grew up to be a youth, than it did, or could, while he was an infant and a child.

CHAP. III

Nothing is related concerning our Lord Jesus from his twelfth year to his entrance on his thirtieth year. In this chapter we have, I. The beginning of John's baptism, ver. 1–6. His exhortation to the multitude (ver. 7–9), and the particular instructions he gave to those who desired to be told their duty, ver. 10–14. II. The notice he gave them of the approach of the Messiah (ver. 15–18), to which is added the mention of his imprisonment, ver. 19–20. III. Christ coming to be baptized of John, ver. 21, 22. IV. His pedigree and genealogy recorded up to Adam, ver. 23–38.

Verses 1–14

John's baptism introducing a new dispensation, it was requisite that we should have a particular account of it. Glorious things were said of John (ch. i. 15, 17); but we lost him in the deserts, and there he remains until the day of his showing unto Israel, ch. i. 80.

I. The date of the beginning of John's baptism; this is here taken notice of, which was not by the other evangelists, that the truth of the thing might be confirmed by the exact fixing of the time. And it is dated,

1. By the government of the heathen, which the Jews were under.

(1) It is dated by the reign of the Roman emperor; it was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar, the third of the twelve Cæsars, a very bad man. The people of the Jews, after a long struggle, were of late made a province of the empire, and were under the dominion of this Tiberius; an inconsiderable despicable part of the Roman empire.

(2) It is dated by the governments of the viceroys that ruled in the several parts of the Holy Land under the Roman emperor, which was another badge of their servitude, for they were all foreigners. Pilate is here said to be the governor, president, or procurator, of Judæa. This character is given of him by some other writers, that he was a wicked man, and one that made no conscience of a lie. He reigned ill, and at last was displaced and sent to Rome, to answer for his maladministrations. The other three are called tetrarchs, some think from the countries which they had the command of, each of them being over a fourth part of that which had been entirely under the government of Herod the Great.

2. By the government of the Jews among themselves, v. 2. Annas and Caiaphas were the high priests. God had appointed that there should be but one high priest at a time, but here were two, to serve some ill turn or other.

II. The origin and tendency of John's baptism.

1. The origin of it was from heaven: The word of God came unto John, v. 2. It is the same expression that is used concerning the Old Testament prophets (Jer. i. 2); for John was a prophet, yea, more than a prophet. John is here called the son of Zacharias, to refer us to what the angel said to his father. The word of the Lord came to him in the wilderness; for those whom God fits he will find out, wherever they are. As the word of the Lord is not bound in a prison, so it is not lost in a wilderness. John was the son of a priest, now entering upon the thirtieth year of his age; and therefore, according to the custom of the temple, he was now to be admitted into the temple-service. But God had called him to a more honourable ministry.

2. The scope and design of it were to bring all the people of his country off from their sins and home to their God, v. 3. He came first into all the country about Jordan, that part of the country which Israel took possession of first; there was the banner of the gospel first displayed. John resided in the most solitary part of the country; but, when the word of the Lord came to him, he quitted his deserts, and came into the inhabited country. Those that are best pleased in their retirements must cheerfully exchange them, when God calls them into places of concourse. He came into all the country, preaching a new baptism. The sign or ceremony, was such as was ordinarily used among the Jews, washing with water, by which proselytes were sometimes admitted, but the meaning of it was, repentance for the remission of sins.

(1) They were thereby obliged to repent of their sins, to be sorry for what they had done amiss, and to do so no more. The former they professed, and were concerned to be sincere in their professions; the latter they promised, and were concerned to make good what they promised. He bound them to change their mind, and change their way, and to make them new hearts and to live new lives.

(2) They were thereby assured of the pardon of their sins, upon their repentance. As the baptism he administered bound them not to submit to the power of sin, so it sealed to them a gracious and pleadable discharge from the guilt of sin.

III. The fulfilling of the scriptures in the ministry of John. The other evangelists had referred us to the same text that is here referred to, that of Esaias, ch. xl. 3. It is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet. Among them it is found that there should be the voice of one crying in the wilderness; and John is that voice; he cries, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, and make his paths straight. Luke goes further on with the quotation than Matthew and Mark had done, and applies the following words likewise to John's ministry (v. 5, 6), Every valley shall be filled. 1. The humble shall by it be enriched with grace. 2. The proud shall by it be humbled; Every mountain and hill shall be brought low. 3. Sinners shall be converted to God; The crooked ways and the crooked spirits shall be made straight. God by his grace can make that straight which sin hath made crooked. 4. Difficulties that were hindering and discouraging in the way to heaven shall be removed: The rough ways shall be made smooth. The gospel has made the way to heaven plain and easy to be found, smooth and easy to be walked in. 5. The great salvation shall be more fully discovered than ever, and the discovery of it shall spread further (v. 6): All flesh shall see the salvation of God; not the Jews only, but the Gentiles. All shall see it, and some of all sorts shall see it, enjoy it, and have the benefit of it.

IV. The general warnings and exhortations which he gave to those who submitted to his baptism, v. 7–9. In Matthew he is said to have preached these same things to many of the Pharisees and Sadducees, that came to his baptism (Matt. iii. 7–10); but here he is said to have spoken them to the multitude, that came forth to be baptized of him, v. 7. This was the purport of his preaching to all that came to him. As he did not flatter the great, so neither did he compliment the many, but gave the same reproofs of sin and warnings of wrath to the multitude that he did to the Sadducees and Pharisees; for, if they had not the same faults, they had others as bad. Now observe here,

1. That the guilty corrupted race of mankind is become a generation of vipers; not only poisoned, but poisonous; hateful to God, hating one another.

2. This generation of vipers is fairly warned to flee from the wrath to come, which is certainly before them if they continue such. We are not only warned of this wrath, but are put into a way to escape it, if we look about us in time.

3. There is no way of fleeing from the wrath to come, but by repentance.

4. Those that profess repentance are highly concerned to live like penitents (v. 8): Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance, else you cannot escape the wrath to come. By the change of our way must be evidenced the change of our mind.

5. If we be not really holy, both in heart and life, our profession of religion will stand us in no stead at all: Begin not now to frame excuses from this great duty of repentance, by saying within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father.

6. We have therefore no reason to depend upon our external privileges and professions of religion, because God can effectually secure his own honour and interest without us. If we were cut off and ruined, he could raise up to himself a church out of the most unlikely,—children to Abraham even out of stones.

7. The greater professions we make of repentance, and the greater assistances and encouragements are given us to repentance, the nearer and the sorer will our destruction be if we do not bring forth fruits meet for repentance. Now that the kingdom of heaven is at hand, now that the axe is laid to the root of the tree, threatenings to the wicked and impenitent are now more terrible than before, as encouragements to the penitent are now more comfortable.

8. Barren trees will be cast into the fire at length; it is the fittest place for them: Every tree that doth not bring forth fruit, good fruit, is hewn down, and cast into the fire.

V. The particular instructions he gave to several sorts of persons, that enquired of him concerning their duty: the people, the publicans, and the soldiers. Some of the Pharisees and Sadducees came to his baptism; but we do not find them asking, What shall we do? They thought they knew. But the people, the publicans, and the soldiers, who knew that they had done amiss, and were conscious to themselves of great ignorance and unacquaintedness with the divine law, were particularly inquisitive: What shall we do? Those that are baptized must be taught. Those that profess and promise repentance in general must evidence it by particular instances of reformation. They that would do their duty must desire to know their duty. These here enquire, not, What shall this man do? but, What shall we do? What fruits meet for repentance shall we bring forth? Now John gives answer to each, according to their place and station.

(1) He tells the people their duty, and that is to be charitable (v 11): He that has two coats, let him give, or lend at least, to him that has none, to keep him warm. The gospel requires mercy, and not sacrifice; and the design of it is to engage us to do all the good we can. Food and raiment are the two supports of life; he that hath meat to spare, let him give to him that is destitute of daily food. What we have we are but stewards of, and must use it, accordingly, as our Master directs.

(2) He tells the publicans their duty, the collectors of the emperor's revenue (v. 13): Exact no more than that which is appointed you. They must do justice between the government and the merchant, and not oppress the people in levying the taxes. They must not think that because it was their office to take care that the people did not defraud the prince they might therefore, by the power they had, bear hard upon the people, as those that have ever so little a branch of power are apt to abuse it: "Collect for Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and do not enrich yourselves by taking more." The public revenues must be applied to the public service, and not to gratify the avarice of private persons. He does not direct the publicans to quit their places, the employment is in itself lawful and necessary, but let them be just and honest in it.

(3) He tells the soldiers their duty, v. 14. Some think that these soldiers were Romans; and then it is an early instance of Gentiles embracing the gospel and submitting to it. Military men seldom seem inclined to religion; yet these submitted even to the Baptist's strict profession, and desired to receive the word of command from him: What must we do? In answer to this enquiry, John does not bid them lay down their arms, but cautions them against the sins that soldiers were commonly guilty of. They must not be injurious to the people among whom they were quartered: "Do violence to no man. Your business is to keep the peace, do not you do violence to any. Shake no man" (so the word signifies); "do not put people into fear; the sword of war, as well as that of justice, is to be a terror only to evil doers, but a protection to those that do well." Nor must they accuse any falsely to the government, thereby to make themselves formidable, and get bribes. They must not be injurious to their fellow-soldiers; for some think that caution, not to accuse falsely, has special reference to them: "Be not forward to complain one of another to your superior officers, that you may be revenged on those whom you have a pique against." They must not be given to mutiny, or contend with their generals about their pay: "Be content with your wages. While you have what you agreed for, do not murmur that it is not more." It is discontent with what they have that makes men oppressive and injurious. It is wisdom to make the best of that which is.

I. How the people took occasion, from the ministry and baptism of John, to think of the Messiah, and to think of him as at the door. Thus the way of the Lord was prepared. When men's expectations are raised, that which they are in expectation of becomes doubly acceptable. Now when they observed what an excellent doctrine John Baptist preached, 1. They began presently to consider that now was the time for the Messiah to appear. Never did the corrupt state of the Jews more need a reformation, nor their distressed state more need a deliverance, than now. 2. Their next thought was, "Is not this he that should come?" All thinking men mused, or reasoned, in their hearts, concerning John, whether he were the Christ or not. His life was holy and strict, his preaching powerful and with authority, and therefore "why may we not think that he is the Messiah?" That which puts people upon considering, reasoning with themselves, prepares the way for Christ.

II. How John disowned all pretensions to the honour of being himself the Messiah, but confirmed them in their expectations of him that really was the Messiah, v. 16, 17. John's office, as a crier or herald, was to give notice that the kingdom of God was at hand; and therefore, when he had told all manner of people severally what they must do, he tells them one thing more which they must all do: they must expect the Messiah now shortly to appear. And this serves as an answer to their musings and debates concerning himself.

1. He declares that the utmost he could do was to baptize them with water. He could only exhort them to repent, and assure them of forgiveness, upon repentance.

2. He consigns them, and turns them over, as it were, to Jesus Christ, for whom he was sent to prepare the way, and would have them no longer to debate whether John was the Messiah or no, but to look for him that was really so.

(1) John owns the Messiah to have a greater excellency than he had; he is one the latchet of whose shoe he does not think himself worthy to loose. John was a prophet, yea more than a prophet, more so than any of the Old Testament prophets; but Christ was a prophet more than John. This was a great truth which John came to preach; but the manner of his expressing it bespeaks his humility, and in it he not only does justice to the Lord Jesus, but does him honour too. Thus highly does it become us to speak of Christ, and thus humbly of ourselves.

(2) He owns him to have a greater energy than he had: "He is mightier than I." They thought that a wonderful power went along with John; but what was that compared with the power which Jesus would come clothed with? John can do no more than baptize with water, in token of this, that they ought to purify and cleanse themselves; but Christ can, and will, baptize with the Holy Ghost; he can give the Spirit to cleanse and purify the heart. John can only preach a distinguishing doctrine, and by word and sign separate between the precious and the vile; but Christ hath his fan in his hand, with which he can, and will, perfectly separate between the wheat and the chaff. He will thoroughly purge his floor. John can only speak comfort to those that receive the gospel, but Jesus Christ will give them comfort. John can only promise them that they shall be safe; but Christ will make them so. John can only threaten hypocrites, and tell the barren trees that they shall be hewn down and cast into the fire; but Christ can execute that threatening: those that are as chaff, light, and vain, and worthless, he will burn with fire unquenchable.

The evangelist concludes his account of John's preaching with an et cetera (v. 18): Many other things in his exhortation preached he unto the people. First, John was an affectionate preacher. He was exhorting, beseeching; he pressed things home upon his hearers, as one in earnest. Secondly, He was a practical preacher. Much of his preaching was exhortation, quickening them to their duty, directing them in it, and not amusing them with matters of nice speculation. Thirdly, He was a popular preacher. He addressed himself to the people, to the laity, and accommodated himself to their capacity, as promising himself best success among them. Fourthly, He was an evangelical preacher, he preached the gospel to the people; in all his exhortations, he directed people to Christ, and excited and encouraged their expectations of him. Fifthly, He was a copious preacher: Many other things he preached, many things, and different. He varied in his preaching, that those who were not reached, and touched, and wrought upon by one truth, might be by another.

III. How full a stop was put to John's preaching. When he was in the midst of his usefulness he was imprisoned by the malice of Herod (v. 19, 20): Herod the tetrarch being reproved by him, not only for living in incest with his brother Philip's wife, but for the many other evils which Herod had done (for those that are wicked in one instance are commonly so in many others), he could not bear it, and added this wickedness to all the rest, that he shut up John in prison. Because he could not bear his reproofs, others should be deprived of the benefit of his instructions and counsels. Must he be silenced who is the voice of one crying in the wilderness? But thus the faith of his disciples must be tried; thus the unbelief of those who rejected him must be punished; thus he must be Christ's forerunner in suffering as well as preaching. He must now give way to him, and, the Sun being risen, the morning-star must of course disappear.

Verses 21–38

The evangelist mentioned John's imprisonment before Christ's being baptized, though it was nearly a year after it, because he would finish the story of John's ministry, and then introduce that of Christ.

I. A short account of Christ's baptism. Jesus came, to be baptized of John, and he was so, v. 21, 22.

1. It is here said that, when all the people were baptized, then Jesus was baptized. Christ would be baptized last, among the common people, and in the rear of them. He saw what multitudes were hereby prepared to receive him, and then he appeared.

2. Notice is here taken of Christ's praying when he was baptized, which was not in Matthew: being baptized, and praying. He prayed, as others did, for he would thus keep up communion with his Father. He prayed for the discovery of his Father's favour to him, and the descent of the Spirit. What was promised to Christ, he must obtain by prayer: Ask of me and I will give thee, &c.

3. When he prayed, the heaven was opened. Sin had shut up heaven, but Christ's prayer opened it again. Prayer is an ordinance that opens heaven: Knock, and it shall be opened unto you.

4. The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him. When he begins to preach, the Spirit of the Lord is upon him. Now this is here expressed by a sensible evidence for his encouragement in his work, and for the satisfaction of John the Baptist; for he was told before that by this sign it should be notified to him which was the Christ.

5. There came a voice from heaven from the excellent glory (so it is expressed, 2 Pet. i. 17), Thou art my beloved Son. Here, and in Mark, it is expressed as spoken to Christ; in Matthew as spoken of him: This is my beloved Son. It comes all to one. It was foretold concerning the Messiah, I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son, 2 Sam. vii. 14. It was also foretold that he should be God's elect, in whom his soul delighted (Isa. xlii. 1); and, accordingly, it is here declared, Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

II. A long account of Christ's pedigree, which had been more briefly related by St. Matthew.

1. His age: He now began to be about thirty years of age. At this age the priests were to enter upon the full execution of their office, Num. iv. 3.

2. His pedigree, v. 23, &c. Matthew had given us somewhat of this. He goes no higher than Abraham, but Luke brings it as high as Adam. Matthew designed to show that Christ was the son of Abraham, in whom all the families of the earth are blessed, and that he was heir to the throne of David; and therefore he begins with Abraham, and brings the genealogy down to Jacob, who was the father of Joseph, an heir-male of the house of David: but Luke, designing to show that Christ was the seed of the woman, that should break the serpent's head, traces his pedigree upward as high as Adam, and begins it with Eli, or Heli, who was the father, not of Joseph, but of the virgin Mary. Matthew draws the pedigree from Solomon, whose natural line ending in Jechonias, the legal right was transferred to Salathiel, who was of the house of Nathan, another son of David, which line Luke here pursues, and so leaves out all the kings of Judah. It is well for us that our salvation doth not depend upon our being able to solve all these difficulties. It is further worthy of observation, that, when those records of the Jewish genealogies had continued thirty or forty years after these extracts out of them, they were all lost and destroyed with the Jewish state and nation; for now there was no more occasion for them.

The genealogy concludes with this, who was the son of Adam, the son of God. He was both the Son of Adam and the Son of God, that he might be a proper Mediator between God and the sons of Adam, and might bring the sons of Adam to be, through him, the sons of God.

CHAP. IV

In this chapter, we have, I. A further preparation of him for his public ministry by his being tempted in the wilderness (ver. 1–13). II. His entrance upon his public work in Galilee (ver. 14, 15), particularly, 1. At Nazareth (ver. 16–30), which we had no account of before in Matthew. 2. At Capernaum, where, having preached to admiration (ver. 31–32), he cast the devil out of a man that was possessed (ver. 33–37), cured Peter's mother-in-law of a fever (ver. 38, 39), and many others that were sick and possessed, (ver. 40, 41) and then went and did the same in other cities of Galilee, ver. 42–44.

Verses 1–13

In this story of Christ's temptation, observe,

I. How he was prepared and fitted for it.

1. He was full of the Holy Ghost, who had descended on him like a dove. Those are well armed against the strongest temptations that are full of the Holy Ghost.

2. He was newly returned from Jordan, where he was baptized, and owned by a voice from heaven to be the beloved Son of God. When we have had the most comfortable communion with God, and the clearest discoveries of his favour to us, we may expect that Satan will set upon us (the richest ship is the pirate's prize), and that God will suffer him to do so, that the power of his grace may be manifested and magnified.

3. He was led by the Spirit into the wilderness. His being led into the wilderness gave some advantage to the tempter; for there he had him alone. Woe to him that is alone! He might give Satan advantage, who knew his own strength; we may not, who know our own weakness. He gained some advantage to himself, during his forty days, fasting in the wilderness. We may suppose that he was wholly taken up in proper meditation, that he spent all his time in immediate, intimate converse with his Father, as Moses in the mount. And this prepared him for Satan's assaults, and hereby he was fortified against them.

4. He continued fasting (v. 2): In those days he did eat nothing. As by retiring into the wilderness he showed himself perfectly indifferent to the world, so by his fasting he showed himself perfectly indifferent to the body; and Satan cannot easily take hold of those who are thus loosened from, and dead to, the world and the flesh.

II. How he was assaulted by one temptation after another, and how he defeated the design of the tempter in every assault. During the forty days, he was tempted of the devil (v. 2). But at the end of the forty days he did as it were close with him, when he perceived that he was hungry, v. 2.

1. He tempted him to distrust his Father's care of him, and to set up for himself (v. 3): If thou be the Son of God, command this stone to be made bread. (1) "I counsel thee to do it; for God, if he be thy Father, has forgotten thee." If we begin to think of living by our own forecast, without depending upon divine Providence, we must look upon it as a temptation of Satan's, and reject it accordingly; it is Satan's counsel to think of an independence upon God. (2) "I challenge thee to do it, if thou canst; if thou dost not do it, I will say thou art not the Son of God." Christ yielded not to the temptation. First, Because he would not do what Satan bade him do. We must not do anything that looks like giving place to the devil. Miracles were wrought for the confirming of faith, and the devil had no faith to be confirmed. Secondly, He wrought miracles for the ratification of his doctrine, and therefore till he began to preach he would not begin to work miracles. Thirdly, He would not work miracles for himself and his own supply. He would rather turn water into wine, for the credit and convenience of his friends, than stones into bread, for his own necessary supply. Fourthly, He would reserve the proof of his being the Son of God for hereafter. Fifthly, He would not do anything that looked like distrust of his Father. He would, like the other children of God, live in a dependence upon the divine Providence and promise. He returned a scripture-answer to it (v. 4): It is written. This is the first word recorded as spoken by Christ after his instalment in his prophetical office; and it is a quotation out of the Old Testament. The word of God is our sword, and faith in that word is our shield; we should therefore be mighty in the scriptures. The text of scripture he makes use of is quoted from Deut. viii. 3: "Man shall not live by bread alone. I need not turn the stone into bread; man can live by every word of God, by whatever God will appoint that he shall live by." God has many ways of providing for his people, without the ordinary means of subsistence; and therefore he is not at any time to be distrusted, but at all times to be depended upon, in the way of duty. She was an active believer who said that she had made many a meal's meat of the promises when she wanted bread.

2. He tempted him to accept from him the kingdom and to do him homage, v. 5–7. This evangelist puts this temptation second, which Matthew had put last, and which, it should seem, was really the last. Now observe,

(1) How Satan managed this temptation.

[1] He gave him a prospect of all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time. He took him up for this purpose into a high mountain. It was done in a moment of time; whereas, if a man take a prospect of but one country, he must do it successively. Thus the devil thought to impose upon our Saviour with a fallacy; and, by making him believe that he could show him all the kingdoms of the world, would draw him into an opinion that he could give him all those kingdoms.

[2] He boldly alleged that these kingdoms were all delivered to him, that he had power to dispose of them and all their glory, and to give them to whomsoever he would (v. 6), but clogged with this condition, that he should fall down and worship him.

[3] He demanded of him homage and adoration: If thou wilt worship me, all shall be thine, v. 7. He would have him worship him himself. He would indent with him, that, when he had got possession of the kingdoms of this world, he should make no alteration of religions in them. Then let him take all the power and glory of the kingdoms if he pleased. Let who will take the wealth and grandeur of this earth, Satan has all he would have if he can but have men's hearts and adorations.

(2) How our Lord Jesus triumphed over this temptation. He gave it a peremptory repulse, rejected it with abhorrence (v. 8): "Get thee behind me, Satan." Such a temptation as this was not to be reasoned with, but immediately refused; it was presently knocked on the head with one word, It is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God; and not only so, but him only, him and no other. Men must be turned from the power of Satan unto God, from the worship of devils to the worship of the only living and true God. This is the great divine law that Christ will re-establish among men, and reduce men to the obedience of, That God only is to be served and worshipped.

3. He tempted him to a presumptuous confidence of his Father's protection.

(1) What he designed in this temptation: If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down, v. 9. He would have him seek for a new proof of his being the Son of God, as if that which his Father had given him by the voice from heaven, and the descent of the Spirit upon him, were not sufficient. He would have him seek a new method of proclaiming and publishing this to the world. If he would now declare from the pinnacle of the temple, among all the great people who attend the temple service, that he was the Son of God, and then, for proof of it, throw himself down unhurt, he would presently be received by everybody as a messenger sent from heaven. Or the fall might be his death, and then he should have got him finely out of the way.

(2) How he backed and enforced this temptation. He suggested, It is written, v. 10. Christ had quoted scripture against him; and he thought he would be quits with him, and would show that he could quote scripture as well as he. He shall give his angels charge over thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up. It is true, God has promised the protection of angels, to encourage us to trust him, not to tempt him; as far as the promise of God's presence with us, so far the promise of the angels' ministration goes, but no further.

(3) How he was baffled and defeated in the temptation, v. 12. Christ quoted Deut. vi. 16, where it is said, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God, by desiring a sign for the proof of divine revelation, when he has already given that which is sufficient.

III. What was the result and issue of this combat, v. 13. Our victorious Redeemer kept his ground, and came off a conqueror, not for himself only, but for us also.

1. The devil emptied his quiver: He ended all the temptation. Did Christ suffer, being tempted, till all the temptation was ended? And must not we expect also to pass all our trials, to go through the hour of temptation assigned us?

2. He then quitted the field: He departed from him. He saw it was to no purpose to attack him, he had no blind side, no weak or unguarded part in his wall. If we resist the devil, he will flee from us.

3. Yet he continued his malice against him; he departed but for a season, till the season when he was again to be let loose upon him, but as a persecutor, to bring him to suffer. He departed now till that season came which Christ calls the power of darkness (ch. xxii. 53), and when the prince of this world would again come, John xiv. 30.

Verses 14–30

Having defended himself against the devil's assaults, he now begins to act offensively, and to make those attacks upon him, by his preaching and miracles, which he could not resist or repel.

I. What is here said in general of his preaching, and the entertainment it met with in Galilee. Thither he came in the power of the Spirit. He was not to wait for a call from men, for he had light and life in himself. There he taught in their synagogues, their places of public worship, where they met, not, as in the temple, for ceremonial services, but for devotion. These came to be more frequent since the captivity, when the ceremonial worship was near expiring. This he did so as that he gained a great reputation. A fame of him went through all that region (v. 14), and it was a good fame; for (v. 15) he was glorified of all. Now, at first, he met with no contempt or contradiction; all glorified him, and there were none as yet that vilified him.

II. Of his preaching at Nazareth, the city where he was brought up. And here we are told how he preached there, and how he was persecuted.

1. How he preached there.

(1) The opportunity he had for it: He came to Nazareth when he had gained a reputation in other places. There he took occasion to preach, [1] In the synagogue, where it had been his custom to attend when he was a private person, v. 16. But, now that he was entered upon his public ministry, there he preached. [2] On the sabbath day, the proper time which the pious Jews spent, not in a mere ceremonial rest from worldly labour, but in the duties of God's worship.

(2) The call he had to it. He stood up to read. They had in their synagogues seven readers every sabbath, the first a priest, the second a Levite, and the other five Israelites of that synagogue. We often find Christ preaching in other synagogues, but never reading, except in this synagogue at Nazareth, of which he had been many years a member. The book of the prophet Esaias was delivered to him. The second lesson for that day being in the prophecy of Esaias, they gave him that volume to read in.

(3) The text he preached upon. He stood up to read. Now the book being delivered to him, [1] He opened it. The books of the Old Testament were in a manner shut up till Christ opened them, Isa. xxix. 11. [2] He found the place which was appointed to be read that day. Now his text was taken out of Isa. lxi. 1, 2, which is here quoted at large, v. 18, 19. There was a providence in it that that portion of scripture should be read that day, which speaks so very plainly of the Messiah. This text gives a full account of Christ's undertaking, and the work he came into the world to do.

First, How he was qualified for the work: The Spirit of the Lord is upon me. All the gifts and graces of the Spirit were conferred upon him, not by measure, as upon other prophets, but without measure, John iii. 34.

Secondly, How he was commissioned: Because he has anointed me, and sent me. His being anointed signifies both his being fitted for the undertaking and called to it.

Thirdly, What his work was. He was qualified and commissioned.

(a). To be a great prophet. He was anointed to preach; that is three times mentioned here. To whom he was to preach: to the poor; to those that were poor in the world; to those that were poor in spirit, to the meek and humble, and to those that were truly sorrowful for sin. What he was to preach. In general, he must preach the gospel. He is sent to evangelize them; not only to preach to them, but to make that preaching effectual; to bring it, not only to their ears, but to their hearts. Three things he is to preach:

(i) Deliverance to the captives. The gospel is a proclamation of liberty, like that to Israel in Egypt and in Babylon. It is a deliverance from the worst of thraldoms, which all those shall have the benefit of that are willing to make Christ their Head.

(ii) Recovering of sight to the blind. He came not only by the word of his gospel to bring light to them that sat in the dark, but by the power of his grace to give sight to them that were blind. Christ came to tell us that he has eye-salve for us, which we may have for the asking: that, if our prayer be, Lord, that our eyes may be opened, his answer shall be, Receive your sight.

(iii) The acceptable year of the Lord, v. 19. He came to let the world know that the God whom they had offended was willing to be reconciled to them, and to accept of them upon new terms. It alludes to the year of release, or that of jubilee, which was an acceptable year. It was an acceptable time, for it was a day of salvation.

(b) Christ came to be a great Physician; for he was sent to heal the broken-hearted, to give peace to those that were troubled and humbled for sins, and to bring them to rest who were weary and heavy-laden, under the burden of guilt and corruption.

(c) To be a great Redeemer. He not only proclaims liberty to the captives, but he sets at liberty them that are bruised. The prophets could but proclaim liberty, but Christ, as one having authority, as one that had power on earth to forgive sins, came to set at liberty; and therefore this clause is added here.

(4) Here is Christ's application of this text to himself (v. 21): When he had read it, he rolled up the book, and gave it again to the minister, or clerk, that attended, and sat down, according to the custom of the Jewish teachers. Now he began his discourse thus, "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." It now began to be fulfilled in Christ's entrance upon his public ministry; now, in the report they heard of his preaching and miracles in other places; now, in his preaching to them in their own synagogue. Many other gracious words proceeded out of his mouth, which these were but the beginning of; for Christ often preached long sermons, which we have but a short account of. This was enough to introduce a great deal: This day is this scripture fulfilled. The works of God are the accomplishment not only of his secret word, but of his word revealed; and it will help us to understand both the scriptures and the providences of God to compare them one with another.

(5) Here is the attention and admiration of the auditors.

[1] Their attention (v. 20): The eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. It is good, in hearing the word, to keep the eye fixed upon the minister by whom God is speaking to us; for, as the eye affects the heart, so, usually, the heart follows the eye, and is wandering, or fixed, as that is.

[2] Their admiration (v. 22): They all bore him witness and wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth; and yet, as appears by what follows, they did not believe in him. They admired the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. Christ's words are words of grace. And these words of grace are to be wondered at; Christ's name was Wonderful, and in nothing was he more so than in his grace, in the words of his grace, and the power that went along with those words. Their wonder increased as they said, Is not this Joseph's son? Some from this suggestion took occasion perhaps so much the more to admire his gracious words, concluding he must needs be taught of God, while others perhaps with this consideration corrected their wonder at his gracious words, and concluded there could be nothing really admirable in them, whatever appeared, because he was the Son of Joseph.

(6) Christ's anticipating an objection which he knew to be in the minds of many of his hearers. Observe,

[1] What the objection was (v. 23): "You will surely say to me, Physician, heal thyself. You will expect that I should work miracles among you, as I have done in other places." Most of Christ's miracles were cures;—"Now why should not the sick in thine own city be healed as well as those in other cities?" They were designed to cure people of their unbelief;—"Now why should not the disease of unbelief be cured in those of thine own city as well as in those of others? Whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do here also in thine own country." They were pleased with Christ's gracious words, only because they hoped they were but the introduction to some wondrous works of his. They thought their own town as worthy to be the stage of miracles as any other. And why should not his neighbours and acquaintance have the benefit of his preaching and miracles, rather than any other?

[2] How he answers this objection against the course he took.

First, By a plain and positive reason why he would not make Nazareth his headquarters (v. 24), because it generally holds true that no prophet is accepted in his own country. Experience seals this. Familiarity breeds contempt; and we are apt to think meanly of those whose conversation we have been accustomed to. That is most esteemed that is far-fetched and dear-bought, above what is home-bred, though really more excellent. Christ declined working miracles, or doing anything extraordinary, at Nazareth, because of the rooted prejudices they had against him there.

Secondly, By pertinent examples of two of the most famous prophets of the Old Testament. Elijah maintained a widow of Sarepta, a city of Sidon, one that was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, when there was a famine in the land, v. 25, 26. As God would hereby show himself a Father of the fatherless, and a Judge of the widows, so he would show that he was rich in mercy to all, even to the Gentiles. Elisha cleansed Naaman the Syrian of his leprosy, though he was a Syrian, and not only a foreigner, but an enemy to Israel (v. 27): Many lepers were in Israel in the days of Eliseus. And yet we do not find that Elisha cleansed them, but only this Syrian; for none besides had faith to apply himself to the prophet for a cure. Christ himself often met with greater faith among Gentiles than in Israel. Christ wrought his miracles, though not among his townsmen, yet among Israelites, whereas these great prophets wrought theirs among Gentiles.

2. How he was persecuted at Nazareth.

(1) That which provoked them was his taking notice of the favour which God by Elijah and Elisha showed to the Gentiles: When they heard these things, they were filled with wrath (v. 28), a great change since v. 22, when they wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth; thus uncertain are the opinions and affections of the multitude, and so very fickle. If they had mixed faith with those gracious words of Christ which they wondered at, they would have been awakened by these latter words of his. Those only pleased the ear, and went no further, and therefore these grated on the ear. But that which especially exasperated them was that he intimated some kindness God had in reserve for the Gentiles. Their pious ancestors pleased themselves with the hopes of adding the Gentiles to the church; but this degenerate race hated to think that any others should be taken in.

(2) They were provoked to that degree that they made an attempt upon his life. They rose up in a tumultuous manner against him. They thrust him out of the city. They thrust from them the Saviour and the salvation. They led him to the brow of the hill, with a purpose to throw him down headlong. Though they had heard such a fame of him and had but just now themselves admired his gracious words, yet they hurried him away in a popular fury, or frenzy rather, to put him to death in a most barbarous manner.

(3) Yet he escaped, because his hour was not yet come: He passed through the midst of them, unhurt. They drove him from them, and he went his way. He would have gathered Nazareth, but they would not, and therefore their house is left to them desolate. But now, though they received him not, there were those that did.

When Christ was expelled from Nazareth, he came to Capernaum, another city of Galilee.

I. His preaching: He taught them on the sabbath days, v. 31. Christ's preaching much affected the people (v. 32); they were astonished at his doctrine, there was weight in every word he said, and admirable discoveries were made to them by it. His word was with power; there was a commanding force in it, and a working power went along with it to the consciences of men.

II. His miracles.

1. Two particularly specified, showing Christ to be,

(1) A controller and conqueror of Satan by his power to cast him out of the bodies of those he had taken possession of. [1] The devil is an unclean spirit, his nature directly contrary to that of the pure and holy God. [2] This unclean spirit works in the children of men. [3] It is possible that those who are very much under the power and working of Satan may yet be found in the synagogue. [4] Even the devils know and believe that Jesus Christ is the Holy One of God. [5] They believe and tremble. This unclean spirit cried out with a loud voice, apprehensive that Christ was now come to destroy him. [6] The devils have nothing to do with Jesus Christ, nor desire to have anything to do with him. [7] Christ has the devil under check: He rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace; and this word he spoke with power; Be muzzled. Christ did not only enjoin him silence, but stopped his mouth. [8] In the breaking of Satan's power, both the enemy that is conquered shows his malice, and Christ, the conqueror, shows his overruling grace. The devil showed what he would have done, when he threw the man in the midst, as if he would have dashed him to pieces. Christ showed what a power he had over him, in that he not only forced him to leave him, but to leave him without so much as hurting him. Whom Satan cannot destroy, he will do all the hurt he can to; but this is a comfort, he can harm them no further than Christ permits; nay, he shall not do them any real harm. He came out, and hurt him not. [9] Christ's power over devils was universally acknowledged and adored, v. 36. They were all amazed, saying, What a word is this! They that pretended to cast out devils did it with abundance of charms and spells, but Christ commanded them with authority and power. [10] This, as much as anything, gained Christ a reputation, and spread his fame. This instance of his power, magnified, and was looked upon as greatly magnifying him (v. 37); upon the account of this, the fame of him went out, more than ever, into every place of the country round about. Our Lord Jesus, when he set out at first in his public ministry, was greatly talked of, more than afterwards, when people's admiration wore off with the novelty of the thing.

(2) Christ showed himself to be a healer of diseases. In the former, he struck at the root of man's misery, which was Satan's enmity: in this, he strikes at one of the most spreading branches of it, one of the most common calamities of human life, and that is bodily diseases. These our Lord Jesus came to take away the sting of. Of all bodily diseases none are more common or fatal to grown people than fevers. Now here we have Christ's curing a fever with a word's speaking; the place was in Simon's house, his patient was Simon's wife's mother, v. 38, 39. [1] Christ is a guest that will pay well for his entertainment; those that bid him welcome into their hearts and houses shall be no losers by him; he comes with healing. [2] Even families that Christ visits may be visited with sickness. Houses that are blessed with his distinguishing favours are liable to the common calamities of this life. Simon's wife's mother was ill of a fever. [3] Even good people may sometimes be exercised with the sharpest afflictions. She was taken with a great fever, very acute, and high, and threatening. [4] No age can exempt from diseases. [5] When our relations are sick, we ought to apply ourselves to Christ, by faith and prayer, on their account: They besought him for her. [6] Christ has a tender concern for his people when they are in sickness and distress: He stood over her, as one concerned for her. [7] Christ had, and still has, a sovereign power over bodily diseases: He rebuked the fever, and it left her. [8] This proves Christ's cures to be miraculous, that they were done in an instant: Immediately she arose. [9] Where Christ gives a new life he designs and expects that it should be a new life indeed, spent more than ever in his service. If distempers be rebuked, and we arise from a bed of sickness, we must set ourselves to minister to Jesus Christ. [10] Those that minister to Christ must be ready to minister to all that are his for his sake: She ministered to them, not only to him that had cured her, but to them that had besought him for her.

2. A general account of many other miracles which Christ did. He cured many that were diseased, and it was when the sun was setting (v. 40); in the evening of that sabbath day which he had spent in the synagogue. It is good to abound in the work of the day, in some good work or other, even till sunset; as those that call the sabbath, and the business of it, a delight. He cured all that were sick of divers diseases. He had a remedy for every malady. The sign he used in healing was laying his hands on the sick. He healed by his own power. He cast the devil out of many that were possessed, v. 41. They said, Thou art Christ the Son of God. Christ rebuked them, and did not suffer them to say that they knew him to be the Christ.

3. Here is his removal from Capernaum, v. 42, 43.

(1) He retired for awhile into a place of solitude. It was but a little while that he allowed himself for sleep. When it was day, he went into a desert place to be sometimes alone with God, as even those should be, and contrive to be, that are most engaged in public work. They will find themselves never less alone than when thus alone.

(2) He returned again to the places of concourse and to the work he had to do there. Though a desert place may be a convenient retreat, yet it is not a convenient residence, because we were not sent into this world to live to ourselves. He was earnestly solicited to stay at Capernaum. The people were exceedingly fond of him. They sought him, and, though it was in a desert place, they came unto him. A desert is no desert if we be with Christ there. They detained him that he should not depart from them. It ought not to discourage the ministers of Christ that some reject them, for they will meet with others that will welcome them and their message. He chose rather to diffuse the light of his gospel to many places than to fix it to one. Though he was welcome at Capernaum, yet he is sent to preach the gospel to other cities also. They that enjoy the benefit of the gospel must be willing that others also should share in that benefit, and not covet the monopoly of it. Christ, though he preached not in vain in the synagogue at Capernaum, yet would not be tied to that, but preached in the synagogues of Galilee, v. 44. It is well for us that our Lord Jesus has not tied himself to any one place or people, but, wherever two or three are gathered in his name, he will be in the midst of them.

CHAP. V

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ preaching to the people out of Peter's ship, ver. 1–3. II. The recompence he made to Peter for the loan of his boat, in a miraculous draught of fishes, ver. 4–11. III. His cleansing the leper, ver. 12–15. IV. A short account of his private devotion and public ministry, ver. 16, 17. V. His cure of the man sick of the palsy, ver. 18–26. VI. His calling Levi the publican, and conversing with publicans on that occasion, ver. 27–32. VII. His justifying his disciples in not fasting so frequently as the disciples of John and his Pharisees did, ver. 33–39.

Verses 1–11

This passage of story is the same with that which was more briefly related by Matthew and Mark, of Christ's calling Peter and Andrew to be fishers of men, Matt. iv. 18, and Mark i. 16. They had not related this miraculous draught of fishes at that time, having only in view the calling of his disciples; but Luke gives us that story as one of the many signs which Jesus did, which had not been written in the foregoing books.

I. What vast crowds attended Christ's preaching: The people pressed upon him to hear the word of God (v. 1). The people flocked about him (so the word signifies); they showed respect to his preaching, though not without some rudeness to his person, which was very excusable, for they pressed upon him. Some would reckon this a discredit to him when none of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed in him. Their souls were as precious as the souls of the grandees, and it is his aim to bring not so much the mighty as the many sons to God. See how the people relished good preaching: they pressed to hear the word of God; they could perceive it to be the word of God, and therefore they coveted to hear it.

II. What poor conveniences Christ had for preaching: He stood by the lake of Gennesaret (v. 1), upon a level with the crowd, so that they could neither see him nor hear him; he was lost among them, he was crowded, and in danger of being crowded into the water: what must he do? There were two ships, or fishing boats brought to shore, one belonging to Simon and Andrew, the other to Zebedee and his sons, v. 2. At first, Christ saw Peter and Andrew fishing at some distance (so Matthew tells us, ch. iv. 18); but he waited till they came to land, and till the fishermen, that is, the servants, were gone out of them. Christ entered into that ship that belonged to Simon, and begged of him that he would lend it him for a pulpit; and prayed him that he would thrust out a little from the land, which would be the worse for his being heard, but Christ would have it so, that he might the better be seen; and it is his being lifted up that draws men to him. It intimates that Christ had a strong voice (strong indeed, for he made the dead to hear it). There he sat down, and taught the people the good knowledge of the Lord.

III. What a particular acquaintance Christ, hereupon, fell into with these fishermen, They had had some conversation with him before, which began at John's baptism (John i. 40, 41); they were with him at Cana of Galilee (John ii. 2), and in Judæa (John iv. 3); but as yet they were not called to attend him constantly. Now it was that they were called into a more intimate fellowship with Christ.

1. When Christ had done preaching, he ordered Peter to apply himself to the business of his calling again: Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets, v. 4. It was not the sabbath day, and therefore, as soon as the lecture was over, he set them to work. With what cheerfulness may we go about the duties of our calling when we have been in the mount with God. It is our wisdom and duty so to manage our religious exercises as that they may befriend our worldly business, and so to manage our worldly business as that it may be no enemy to our religious exercises.

2. Peter having attended upon Christ in his preaching, Christ will accompany him in his fishing. He stayed with Christ at the shore, and now Christ will launch out with him into the deep.

3. Christ ordered Peter and his ship's crew to cast their nets into the sea, which they did, in obedience to him, though they had been hard at it all night, and had caught nothing, v. 4, 5. We may observe here,

(1) How melancholy their business had now been: "Master, we have toiled all the night and have taken nothing." One would have thought that this should have excused them from hearing the sermon; but it was more refreshing and reviving to them than the softest slumbers. But they mention it to Christ, when he bids them go a fishing again. Some callings are much more toilsome than others are, and more perilous; yet Providence has so ordered it for the common good that there is no useful calling so discouraging but some or other have a genius for it. Those who follow their business, and get abundance by it with a great deal of ease, should think with compassion of those who cannot follow theirs but with a great fatigue, and hardly get a bare livelihood by it. Be the calling ever so laborious, it is good to see people diligent in it. These fishermen, that were thus industrious, Christ singled out for his favourites. Even those who are most diligent in their business often meet with disappointments; they who toiled all night yet caught nothing. We must do our duty, and then leave the event to God. When we are tired with our worldly business, and crossed in our worldly affairs, we are welcome to come to Christ, and spread our case before him.

(2) How ready their obedience was to the command of Christ: Nevertheless, at thy word, I will let down the net. Though they had toiled all night, yet, if Christ bid them, they will renew their toil. For every fresh service they shall have a fresh supply of grace sufficient. Though they have taken nothing, yet, if Christ bid them let down for a draught, they will hope to take something. We must not abruptly quit the callings wherein we are called because we have not the success in them we promised ourselves. The ministers of the gospel must continue to let down that net, though they have perhaps toiled long and caught nothing; and this is thankworthy, to continue unwearied in our labours, though we see not the success of them. In this they have an eye to the word of Christ: "At thy word, I will let down the net." We are then likely to speed well when we follow the guidance of Christ's word.

4. The draught of fish they caught was so much beyond what was ever known that it amounted to a miracle (v. 6): They enclosed a great multitude of fishes, so that their net broke. It was so great a draught that they had not hands sufficient to draw it up; but they were obliged to beckon to their partners to come and help them, v. 7. But the greatest evidence of the vastness of the draught was that they filled both the ships with fish, to such a degree that they overloaded them, and they began to sink.

Now by this vast draught of fishes, Christ intended to show his dominion in the seas as well as on the dry land, over its wealth as over its waves. He intended hereby to confirm the doctrine he had just now preached out of Peter's ship. We may suppose that the people on shore stayed halting about there, to see what he would do next; and this miracle immediately following would be a confirmation to their faith, of his being at least a teacher come from God. He intended hereby to repay Peter for the loan of his boat. Christ's recompences for services done to his name are abundant, they are superabundant. He intended hereby to give a specimen, to those who were to be his ambassadors to the world, of the success of their embassy, that though they might for a time, and in one particular place, toil and catch nothing, yet they should be instrumental to bring in many to Christ, and enclose many in the gospel net.

5. The impression made upon Peter was very remarkable.

(1) All concerned were astonished, and the more astonished for their being concerned. All the boat's crew were astonished at the draught of fishes which they had taken (v. 9); they were all surprised. So were also James and John, who were partners with Simon (v. 10). Now they were the more affected with it, because they understood it better than others did. They that were well acquainted with this sea had never seen such a draught of fishes fetched out of it, and therefore they could not be tempted to diminish it, by suggesting that it was what might as well have happened at any time. It greatly corroborates the evidence of Christ's miracles that those who were best acquainted with them most admired them. Because they were most interested in it, and benefited by it. Peter and his part-owners were gainers by this great draught of fishes; their joy was a helper to their faith. When Christ's works of wonder are to us, in particular, works of grace, then especially they command our faith in his doctrine.

(2) Peter was astonished to such a degree that he fell down at Jesus's knees, as he sat in the stern of his boat, and said, Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord, v. 8. He thought himself unworthy of the favour of Christ's presence in his boat. It was the language of Peter's humility and self-denial, and had not the least tincture of the devils' dialect, What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? His acknowledgment was very just, and what it becomes us all to make: I am a sinful man, O Lord. Even the best men are sinful men, and should be ready upon all occasions to own it, and especially to own it to Jesus Christ. His inference from it was what might have been just, though really it was not so. If I be a sinful man, as indeed I am, I ought to say, "Come to me, O Lord, or let me come to thee, or I am undone, for ever undone." Peter may well be excused, if, in a sense of his own sinfulness and vileness, he cried out on a sudden, Depart from me. Those whom Christ designs to admit to the most intimate acquaintance with him he first makes sensible that they deserve to be set at the greatest distance from him. We must all own ourselves sinful men, and that therefore Jesus Christ might justly depart from us; but we must therefore fall down at his knees, to pray him that he would not depart.

6. The occasion which Christ took from this to intimate to Peter (v. 10), and soon after to James and John (Matt. iv. 21), his purpose to make them his apostles. He said unto Simon, "Thou shalt both see and do greater things than these; fear not, henceforth thou shalt catch men. That shall be a more astonishing miracle, and infinitely more advantageous than this."

Lastly, The fishermen's farewell to their calling, in order to their constant attendance on Christ (v. 11): When they had brought their ships to land they forsook all and followed him. It is observable that they left all to follow Christ, when their calling prospered in their hands more than ever it had done. When riches increase, and we are therefore most in temptation to set our hearts upon them, then to quit them for the service of Christ, this is thankworthy.

Verses 12–16

I. The cleansing of a leper, v. 12–14. This narrative we had both in Matthew and Mark. It is here said to have been in a certain city (v. 12); it was in Capernaum. This man is said to be full of leprosy; he had that distemper in a high degree. Let us learn here,

1. What we must do in the sense of our spiritual leprosy. We must seek Jesus. We must humble ourselves before him, as this leper, seeing Jesus, fell on his face. We must be ashamed of our pollution, and blush to lift up our faces before the holy Jesus. We must earnestly desire to be cleansed. We must firmly believe Christ's ability and sufficiency to cleanse us: Lord, thou canst make me clean, though I be full of leprosy. No doubt is to be made of the merit and grace of Christ. We must be importunate in prayer: He fell on his face and besought him; they that would be cleansed must reckon it a favour worth wrestling for. We must refer ourselves to the goodwill of Christ: Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst. This is not so much the language of his diffidence, or distrust of the goodwill of Christ, as of his submission to the goodwill of Jesus Christ.

2. What we may expect from Christ, if we thus apply ourselves to him. We shall find him very forward to take cognizance of our case (v. 13): He put forth his hand and touched him. His touching the leper was wonderful condescension; but it is much greater to us when he is himself touched with the feeling of our infirmities. We shall find him very compassionate, and ready to relieve us; he said, "I will, whosoever comes to me to be healed, I will in no wise cast him out." We shall find him all-sufficient, and able to heal and cleanse us, though we be ever so full of this loathsome leprosy. One word, one touch, from Christ, did the business: Immediately the leprosy departed from him.

3. What he requires from those that are cleansed, v. 14. We must be very humble (v. 14): He charged him to tell no man. He must not tell it to his own honour. Those whom Christ hath healed and cleansed must know that he hath done it in such a way as for ever excludes boasting. We must be very thankful: Go, and offer for thy cleansing. Christ did not require him to give him a fee, but to bring the sacrifice of praise to God. We must keep close to our duty; go to the priest. The man whom Christ had made whole he found in the temple, John v. 14. Those who by any affliction have been detained from public ordinances should, when the affliction is removed, attend on them the more diligently.

4. Christ's public serviceableness to men and his private communion with God.

(1) Though never any had so much pleasure in his retirements as Christ had, yet he was much in a crowd, to do good, v. 15. Though the leper should altogether hold his peace, yet the thing could not be hid, so much the more went there a fame abroad of him. For honour is like a shadow, which flees from those that pursue it, but follows those that decline it. The less good men say of themselves, the more will others say of them. But Christ reckoned it a small honour to him that his fame went abroad; it was much more so that hereby multitudes were brought to receive benefit by him. By his preaching. They came together to hear him. By his miracles. They came to be healed by him of their infirmities.

(2) Though never any did so much good in public, yet he found time for pious and devout retirements (v. 16): He withdrew himself into the wilderness, and prayed. It is likewise our wisdom so to order our affairs as that our public work and our secret work may not interfere with one another. Secret prayer must be performed secretly; and those that have ever so much to do of the best business in this world must keep up constant stated times for it.

I. A general account of Christ's preaching and miracles, v. 17. He was teaching on a certain day, not on the sabbath day, but on a week-day. Preaching and hearing the word of God are good works, if they be done well, any day in the week. It was in a private house; for even there where we ordinarily converse with our friends it is not improper to give and receive good instruction. And the power of the Lord was to heal them. It was mighty to heal them; to heal their souls, to give them a new life, a new nature. It may be meant (and so it is generally taken) of the healing of those who were diseased in body, who came to him for cures. Whenever there was occasion, Christ had not to seek for his power, it was present to heal. There were Pharisees, and doctors of the law, sitting by; not sitting at his feet, to learn of him. But, by what follows (v. 21), it appears that they were not healed, but cavilled at Christ. They sat by as spectators, censors, and spies, to pick up something on which to ground a reproach or accusation. How many are there in the midst of our assemblies that do not sit under the word, but sit by! It is to them as a tale that is told them, not as a message that is sent them; they are willing that we should preach before them, not that we should preach to them. These Pharisees and scribes came out of every town of Galilee, and Judæa, and Jerusalem; they came from all parts of the nation. Christ went on with his work of preaching and healing, though he saw these Pharisees sitting by, who, he knew, despised him, and watched to ensnare him.

II. A particular account of the cure of the man sick of the palsy.

1. The doctrines that are taught us and confirmed to us by the story of this cure. (1) That sin is the fountain of all sickness, and the forgiveness of sin is the only foundation upon which a recovery from sickness can comfortably be built. They presented the sick man to Christ, and he said, "Man, thy sins are forgiven thee (v. 20), that is the blessing thou art most to prize and seek." The cords of our iniquity are the bands of our affliction. (2) That Jesus Christ has power on earth to forgive sins. This was the thing intended to be proved (v. 24): That ye may know and believe that the Son of man hath power to forgive sins, he saith to the sick of the palsy, Arise, and walk; and he is cured immediately. Christ claims one of the prerogatives of the King of kings when he undertakes to forgive sin, and it is justly expected that he should produce a good proof of it. "Well," saith he, "I will put it upon this issue: here is a man struck with a palsy, and for his sin; if I do not with a word's speaking cure his disease, then say that I am not entitled to the prerogative of forgiving sin: but, if I do, you must own that I have power to forgive sins." Thus it was put upon a fair trial, and one word of Christ determined it. He did but say, Arise, take up thy couch, and that chronical disease had an instantaneous cure; immediately he arose before them. They must all own that there could be no cheat or fallacy in it. (3) That Jesus Christ is God. He appears to be so, [1] By knowing the thoughts of the scribes and Pharisees (v. 22). [2] By doing that which their thoughts owned none could do but God only (v. 21): Who can forgive sins, say they, but only God? "I will prove," saith Christ, "that I can forgive sins"; and what follows then but that he is God?

2. The duties that are taught us, and recommended to us, by this story. (1) In our applications to Christ, we must be very pressing and urgent. They that were the friends of this sick man sought means to bring him in before Christ (v. 18); and, when they were baffled in their endeavour, they did not give up their cause; but when they could not get in by the door, it was so crowded, they untiled the house, and let the poor patient down through the roof, into the midst before Jesus, v. 19. In this Jesus Christ saw their faith, v. 20. When the centurion and the woman of Canaan were in no care at all to bring the patients they interceded for into Christ's presence, but believed that he could cure them at a distance, he commended their faith. In these there seemed to be an apprehension that it was requisite the patient should be brought into his presence, yet he did not censure and condemn their weakness, did not ask them, "Are you under such a degree of infidelity as to think I could not have cured him, though he had been out of doors?" But he made the best of it, and even in this he saw their faith. It is a comfort to us that we serve a Master that is willing to make the best of us. (2) When we are sick, we should be more in care to get our sins pardoned than to get our sickness removed. (3) The mercies which we have the comfort of, God must have the praise of. The man departed to his own house, glorifying God, v. 25. (4) The miracles which Christ wrought were amazing to those that saw them, and we ought to glorify God in them, v. 26. They said, "We have seen strange things today." They glorified God, who had sent into their country such a benefactor to it; and were filled with fear, with a reverence of God.

Verses 27–35

All this, except the last verse, we had before in Matthew and Mark; it is not the story of any miracle in nature wrought by our Lord Jesus, but it is an account of some of the wonders of his grace.

I. It was a wonder of his grace that he would call a publican, from the receipt of custom, to be his disciple and follower, v. 27. By this he exposed himself, and got the invidious character of a friend of publicans and sinners.

II. It was a wonder of his grace that the call was made effectual, v. 28. This publican, though those of that employment commonly had little inclination to religion, rose up, and followed Christ. There is no heart too hard for the Spirit and grace of Christ to work upon, nor any difficulties in the way of a sinner's conversion insuperable to his power.

III. It was a wonder of his grace that he would not only admit a converted publican into his family, but would keep company with unconverted publicans. Here is a wonder of grace indeed, that Christ undertakes to be the Physician of souls distempered by sin, and ready to die of the distemper (he is a Healer by office, v. 31)—that he came to call sinners, the worst of sinners, to repentance, and to assure them of pardon, upon repentance, v. 32. These are glad tidings of great joy indeed.

IV. It was a wonder of his grace that he did so patiently bear the contradiction of sinners against himself and his disciples, v. 30. He did not express his resentment of the cavils of the scribes and Pharisees, but answered them with reason and meekness.

V. It was a wonder of his grace that, in the discipline under which he trained up his disciples, he considered their frame, and proportioned their services to their strength. It was objected that he did not make his disciples to fast so often as those of the Pharisees and John Baptist did, v. 33. He insisted most upon that which is the soul of fasting, the living of a life of self-denial, which is as much better than fasting and corporal penances as mercy is better than sacrifice.

VI. It was a wonder of his grace that Christ reserved the trials of his disciples for their latter times, when by his grace they were in some good measure better prepared and fitted for them. Now they were as the children of the bride-chamber, when the bridegroom is with them, when they have plenty and joy, and every day is a festival. But this will not last always. The days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, v. 35. When Christ shall leave them with their hearts full of sorrow, their hands full of work, and the world full of enmity and rage against them, then shall they fast.

VII. It was a wonder of his grace that he proportioned their exercises to their strength. He would not put new cloth upon an old garment (v. 36), nor new wine into old bottles (v. 37, 38); he would not, as soon as ever he had called them out of the world, put them upon the strictnesses and austerities of discipleship, lest they should be tempted to fly off. Christ would train up his followers gradually to the discipline of his family; for no man, having drank old wine, will of a sudden, straightway, desire new, or relish it, but will say, The old is better, because he has been used to it, v. 39. The disciples will be tempted to think their old way of living better, till they are by degrees trained up to this way whereunto they are called. Christ's disciples, though they had not so much of the form of godliness, had more of the power of it.

CHAP. VI

I. Here is a proof of the lawfulness of works of necessity and mercy on the sabbath day, the former in vindication of his disciples' plucking the ears of corn, the latter in vindication of himself healing the withered hand on that day, ver. 1–11. II. His retirement for secret prayer, ver. 12. III. His calling his twelve apostles, ver. 13–16. IV. His curing the multitudes of those under various diseases, ver. 17–19. V. The sermon that he preached to his disciples and the multitude, instructing them in their duty both to God and man, ver. 20–49.

Verses 1–11

I. Christ justifies his disciples in a work of necessity for themselves on that day, and that was plucking the ears of corn, when they were hungry on that day. This story here has a date, which we had not in the other evangelists; it was on the second sabbath after the first (v. 1), that is, the first sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread, from which day they reckoned the seven weeks to the feast of pentecost. We may observe, 1. Christ's disciples ought not to be nice and curious in their diet, but take up with what is easiest got, and be thankful. These disciples plucked the ears of corn, and did eat (v. 1); a little served them, and that which had no delicacy in it. 2. Many are forward to censure others for the most innocent and inoffensive actions, v. 2. The Pharisees quarrelled with them as doing that which it was not lawful to do on the sabbath days, when it was their own practice to feed deliciously on sabbath days. 3. Jesus Christ will justify his disciples, and will own and accept of them in many a thing which men tell them it is not lawful for them to do. 4. Ceremonial appointments may be dispensed with, in cases of necessity, v. 3, 4. And, if God's own appointments might be thus set aside for a greater good, much more may the traditions of men. 5. Works of necessity are particularly allowable on the sabbath day. 6. Jesus Christ, though he allowed works of necessity on the sabbath day, will notwithstanding have us to know and remember that it is his day (v. 5): The Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath. In the kingdom of the Redeemer, the sabbath day is to be turned into a Lord's day. In token of this, it shall not only have a new name, the Lord's day, but shall be transferred to a new day, the first day of the week.

II. He justifies himself in doing works of mercy for others on the sabbath day. 1. Christ on the sabbath day entered into the synagogue. It is our duty, as we have opportunity, to sanctify sabbaths in religious assemblies. Our place must not be empty without very good reason. 2. In the synagogue, on the sabbath day, he taught. Christ took all opportunities to teach, not only his disciples, but the multitude. 3. Christ's patient was one of his hearers. A man whose right hand was withered came. Those that would be cured by the grace of Christ must be willing to learn the doctrine of Christ. 4. Among those who were the hearers and the eye-witnesses, there were some who came with no other design than to pick quarrels with him, v. 7. The scribes and Pharisees watched him, as the lion does his prey, whether he would heal on the sabbath day, that they might find an accusation against him. 5. Jesus Christ was neither ashamed nor afraid to own the purposes of his grace, v. 8. He bade the man rise, and stand forth, hereby to try the patient's faith and boldness. 6. He appealed to his adversaries themselves, whether it was the design of the fourth commandment to restrain men from doing good on the sabbath day, that good which their hand finds to do, and which cannot so well be put off to another time (v. 9): Is it lawful to do good, or evil, on the sabbath days? 7. He healed the poor man, though he knew that his enemies would not only take offence at it, but take advantage against him for it, v. 10. 8. His adversaries were hereby enraged so much the more against him, v. 11. Instead of being brought to be in love with him as a benefactor to mankind,—they were filled with madness, vexed that they could not frighten him from doing good. They were mad at Christ, mad at the people, mad at themselves. When they could not prevent his working this miracle, they communed one with another what they might do to Jesus, what other way they might take to run him down.

In these verses, we have our Lord Jesus in secret, in his family, and in public; and in all three acting like himself.

I. In secret we have him praying to God, v. 12. This evangelist takes frequent notice of Christ's retirements, to give us an example of secret prayer, without which it is impossible that the soul should prosper. In those days, when his enemies were filled with madness against him, he went out to pray. He was alone with God; he went out into a mountain, to pray, where he might have no disturbance or interruption given him. He was long alone with God: He continued all night in prayer. We think one half hour a great deal, but Christ continued a whole night in meditation and secret prayer. We have a great deal of business at the throne of grace, and we should take a great delight in communion with God, and by both these we may be kept sometimes long at prayer.

II. We have him nominating his immediate attendants, that should be the constant auditors of his doctrine and eye-witnesses of his miracles, that hereafter they might be sent forth as apostles, his messengers to the world, v. 13. After he had continued all night in prayer, one would have thought that, when it was day, he should have reposed himself. No, as soon as anybody was stirring, he called unto him his disciples. In serving God, our great care should be, not to lose time, but to make the end of one good duty the beginning of another. Ministers are to be ordained with prayer more than ordinarily solemn. The number of the apostles was twelve. Their names are here recorded; it is the third time that we have met with them, and in each of the three places the order of them differs. Never were men so privileged, and yet one of them had a devil, and proved a traitor (v. 16); yet Christ, when he chose him, was not deceived in him.

III. In public we have him preaching and healing, the two great works between which he divided his time, v. 17. He came down with the twelve from the mountain, and stood in the plain, and there were presently gathered about him, not only the company of his disciples, but also a great multitude of people, a mixed multitude out of all Judæa and Jerusalem. They came also from the sea-coast of Tyre and Sidon. Though they bordered upon Canaanites, yet there were some well affected to Christ; such there were dispersed in all parts, here and there one. They came to hear him, and he preached to them. It is worthwhile to go a great way to hear the word of Christ, and to go out of the way of other business for it. They came to be cured by him, and he healed them. Some were troubled in body, and some in mind; some had diseases, some had devils; but both the one and the other, were healed, for he has power over diseases and devils (v. 17, 18). Nay, it should seem, those who had no particular diseases to complain of yet found it a great confirmation and renovation to their bodily health and vigour to partake of the virtue that went out of him; for (v. 19) the whole multitude sought to touch him, and they were all, one way or other, the better for him: he healed them all; and who is there that doth not need, upon some account or other, to be healed? There is a fulness of grace in Christ, that is enough for all, enough for each.

Here begins a practical discourse of Christ, most of which is found in the sermon upon the mount, Matt. v. and vii.

I. Blessings pronounced upon suffering saints (v. 20): He lifted up his eyes upon his disciples, not only the twelve, but the whole company of them (v. 17), and directed his discourse to them. There he sat, as one having authority; thither they come to him (Matt. v. 1).

1. "You are poor, you have left all to follow me. But you are blessed in your poverty, nay, you are blessed for it, for yours is the kingdom of God, all the comforts and graces of his kingdom here and all the glories and joys of his kingdom hereafter; yours it shall be, nay, yours it is."

2. "You hunger now (v. 21), you are not fed to the full as others are, you are glad of a few ears of corn for a meal's meat; thus you hunger now in this world, but in the other world you shall be filled."

3. "You weep now. But blessed are you; your present sorrows are no prejudices to your future joy, but preparatories for it: You shall laugh. You are but sowing in tears, and shall shortly reap in joy," Ps. cxxvi. 5, 6. God is treasuring up comforts for them; and the day is coming when their mouth shall be filled with laughing and their lips with rejoicing, Job. viii. 21.

4. "You now undergo the world's ill will. You must expect all the base treatment that a spiteful world can give you for Christ's sake, because you serve him and his interests. Wicked men will hate you, because your doctrine and life convict and condemn them. They will reproach you, will charge you with the blackest crimes, which you are perfectly innocent of, will fasten upon you the blackest characters, which you do not deserve; they will cast out your name as evil. Blessed are you when you are so used. It is an honour to you, as it is to a brave hero to be employed in the wars, in the service of his prince; and therefore rejoice you in that day, and leap for joy, v. 23. Do not only bear it, but triumph in it. You are treated as the prophets were before you, and therefore not only need not be ashamed of it, but may justly rejoice in it. You will for this be abundantly recompensed. Your reward is great in heaven. Though you may be losers for Christ, you shall not be losers by him in the end."

II. Woes denounced against prospering sinners as miserable people, though the world envies them. These we had not in Matthew. It should seem, the best exposition of these woes, compared with the foregoing blessings, is the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. Here is a woe to them that are rich, that is, that trust in riches; woe to them, for they have received their consolation, that which they placed their happiness in, v. 24. They in their lifetime received their good things, which, in their account, were the best things. "You that are rich are in temptation to set your hearts upon a smiling world, and to say, Soul, take thine ease in the embraces of it." It is the folly of carnal worldlings that they make the things of this world their consolation, which were intended only for their convenience. They please themselves with them; and to them the consolations of God are small, and of no account. It is their misery that they are put off with them as their consolation. Here is a woe to them that are full (v. 25), and have more than heart could wish. They are full of themselves, without God and Christ. Woe to such, for they shall hunger, they shall shortly be stripped and emptied of all the things they are so proud of. Here is a woe to them that laugh now, that have always a disposition to be merry, and always something to make merry with, and are always entertaining themselves with the laughter of the fool. Woe unto such, for it is but now, for a little time, that they laugh; they shall mourn and weep shortly. Here is a woe to them whom all men speak well of, that is, who make it their great and only care to gain the praise and applause of men (v. 26): "Woe unto you; it would be a bad sign that you were not faithful to your trust, and to the souls of men, if you preached so as that nobody would be disgusted; for your business is to tell people of their faults. The false prophets indeed, that flattered your fathers in their wicked ways, were caressed and spoken well of. We should desire to have the approbation of those that are wise and good; but, as we should despise the reproaches, so we should also despise the praises, of the fools in Israel.

These verses agree with Matt. v. 38, to the end of that chapter: I say unto you that hear (v. 27), to all you that hear, for these are lessons of universal concern. He that has an ear, let him hear. Now the lessons Christ here teaches us are,

I. That we must render to all their due, and be honest and just in all our dealings (v. 31): As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise; for this is loving your neighbour as yourselves. We must put our souls into their souls' stead, and then pity and succour them, as we should desire and justly expect to be ourselves pitied and succoured.

II. That we must be free in giving to them that need (v. 30): "Give to every man that asketh of thee, that wants necessaries, which thou hast wherewithal to supply out of thy superfluities. Give to those that are not able to help themselves." Christ would have his disciples ready to distribute, and willing to communicate, to their power in ordinary cases, and beyond their power in extraordinary.

III. That we must be generous in forgiving those that have been any way injurious to us.

1. We must not be extreme in demanding our right, when it is denied us: "Him that taketh away thy cloak, forbid him not to take thy coat also (v. 29). Let him have that too, rather than fight for it. And (v. 30) of him that taketh thy goods, of such do not exact them; if Providence have made such insolvent, do not take the advantage of the law against them, but rather lose it than take them by the throat," Matt. xviii. 28.

2. We must not be rigorous in revenging a wrong when it is done us: "Unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other. If anyone smite thee on the cheek, rather than give another blow to him, be ready to receive another from him"; that is, "leave it to God to plead thy cause, and do thou sit down silent under the affront."

3. Nay, we must do good to them that do evil to us. This is that which our Saviour chiefly designs to teach us, as a law peculiar to his religion, and a branch of the perfection of it. We must be kind to those from whom we have received injuries. We must not only love our enemies, and bear a good will to them, but we must do good to them. We must study to make it appear, by positive acts, that we bear them no malice, nor seek revenge. Do they curse us, speak ill of us, and wish ill to us? Do they despitefully use us, in word or deed? Do they endeavour to make us contemptible or odious? Let us bless them, and pray for them, speak well of them, the best we can, wish well to them, and be intercessors with God for them. This is repeated, v. 35: Love your enemies, and do them good. To recommend this difficult duty to us, it is represented as a generous thing, and an attainment few arrive at. To love those that love us has nothing uncommon in it, nothing peculiar to Christ's disciples, for sinners will love those that love them. It is but following nature and puts no force at all upon it

(v. 32). "And (v. 33) if you do good to them that do good to you, what thanks have you? What credit are you to the name of Christ, or what reputation do you bring to it? for sinners also do even the same. But it becomes you to do something more excellent and eminent, to do that which sinners will not do: you must render good for evil"; then we are to our God for a name and a praise, and he will have the thanks. We must be kind to those from whom we expect no manner of advantage (v. 35): Lend, hoping for nothing again. We must lend though we have reason to suspect that what we lend we lose, lend to those who are so poor that it is not probable they will be able to pay us again. Here are two motives to this generous charity. It will redound to our profit; for our reward shall be great, v. 35. What is lent and lost on earth, from a true principle of charity, will be made up to us. "You shall not only be repaid, but rewarded, greatly rewarded; it will be said to you, Come, ye blessed, inherit the kingdom." It will redound to our honour; for herein we shall resemble God in his goodness, which is the greatest glory: "Ye shall be the children of the Highest." It is the glory of God that he is kind to the unthankful and to the evil. Hence he infers (v. 36), Be merciful, as your Father is merciful; this explains Matt. v. 48, "Be perfect, as your Father is perfect. Imitate your Father in those things that are his brightest perfections." Those that are merciful as God is merciful, even to the evil and the unthankful, are perfect as God is perfect. This should strongly engage us to be merciful to our brethren, not only that God is so to others, but that he is so to us, though we have been, and are, evil and unthankful; it is of his mercies that we are not consumed.

All these sayings of Christ we had before in Matthew. They were sayings that Christ often used. We need not be critical here in seeking for the coherence: they are golden sentences, like Solomon's proverbs or parables.

I. We ought to be very candid in our censures of others, because we need grains of allowance ourselves: "Therefore judge not others, because then you yourselves shall not be judged; therefore condemn not others, because then you yourselves shall not be condemned, v. 37. God will not judge and condemn you, men will not." They that are merciful to other people's names shall find others merciful to theirs.

II. If we are of a giving and a forgiving spirit, we shall ourselves reap the benefit of it: Forgive and you shall be forgiven. If we forgive the injuries done to us by others, others will forgive our inadvertencies. If we forgive others' trespasses against us, God will forgive our trespasses against him. And he will be no less mindful of the liberal that devise liberal things (v. 38): Give, and it shall be given to you. Men shall return it into your bosom; for God often makes use of men as instruments, not only of his avenging, but of his rewarding justice. God will incline the hearts of others to give to us when we need, and to give liberally, good measure pressed down and shaken together. Whom God recompenses he recompenses abundantly.

III. We must expect to be dealt with ourselves as we deal with others: With the same measure that ye mete it shall be measured to you again. Those that deal hardly with others may expect to be paid in their own coin; but they that deal kindly with others have reason to hope that God will raise them up friends who will deal kindly with them.

IV. Those who put themselves under the guidance of the ignorant and erroneous are likely to perish with them (v. 39): Can the blind lead the blind? Shall not both fall together into the ditch? How can they expect any other? Those that are led by the common opinion, course, and custom, of this world, are themselves blind, and are led by the blind.

V. Christ's followers cannot expect better treatment in the world than their Master had, v. 40. Let them not promise themselves more honour or pleasure in the world than Christ had. Let each live a life of labour and self-denial as his Master doth, and make himself a servant of all; let him stoop, and let him toil, and do all the good he can, and then he will be a complete disciple.

VI. Those who take upon them to rebuke and reform others are concerned to look to it that they be themselves without rebuke, v. 41, 42. It is very absurd for any to pretend to be so quick-sighted as to spy small faults in others, like a mote in the eye, when they are themselves so perfectly past feeling as not to perceive a beam in their own eye. How canst thou offer thy service to thy brother, to pull out the mote from his eye, which requires a good eye as well as a good hand, when thou thyself hast a beam in thine own eye. To help to pull the mote out of our brother's eye is a good work, but then we must qualify ourselves for it by beginning with ourselves; reforming our own lives.

VII. We may expect that men's words and actions will be according as they are.

1. The heart is the tree, and the words and actions are fruit according to the nature of the tree, v. 43, 44. If a man be really a good man, though perhaps he may not abound in fruit, and though he may be sometimes like a tree in winter, yet he does not bring forth corrupt fruit; though he may not do you all the good he should, yet he will not do you hurt. If he cannot reform ill manners, he will not corrupt good manners. If the fruit that a man brings forth be corrupt you may be sure that he is not a good tree. On the other hand, a corrupt tree doth not bring forth good fruit, though it may bring forth green leaves. So neither can you expect any good conduct from those who have justly a bad character. If the fruit be good, you may conclude that the tree is so; for every tree is known by its fruit.

2. The heart is the treasure, and the words and actions are the produce from that treasure, v. 45. The reigning love of God and Christ in the heart is a good treasure in the heart: it enriches a man, it furnishes him with a good stock to spend upon, for the benefit of others. Out of such a good treasure a man may bring forth that which is good. But where the love of the world and the flesh reign there is an evil treasure in the heart, out of which an evil man is continually bringing forth that which is evil. Of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks; what the mouth ordinarily speaks generally agrees with what is innermost and uppermost in the heart. Not but that a good man may possibly drop a bad word, and a wicked man make use of a good word to serve a bad turn; but, for the most part, the heart is as the words are, vain or serious; it therefore concerns us to get our hearts filled, not only with good, but with abundance of it.

VIII. It is not enough to hear the sayings of Christ, but we must do them.

1. It is putting an affront upon him to call him Lord, Lord, if we do not make conscience of conforming to his will. We do but mock Christ, as they that in scorn said, Hail, King of the Jews, if we call him ever so often Lord, Lord, and yet walk in the way of our own hearts.

2. It is putting a cheat upon ourselves if we think that hearing the sayings of Christ will bring us to heaven, without doing them. This he illustrates by a similitude (v. 47–49), which shows,

(1) That those only make sure work for their souls and eternity who do not only come to Christ as his scholars, and hear his sayings, but do them. They are like a house built on a rock. These are they that take pains in religion, as they do that build on a rock,—that begin low, as they do,—that dig deep, that found their hope upon Christ, who is the Rock of ages (and other foundation can no man lay). They who do thus do well for themselves; for, [1] They shall keep their integrity, in times of temptation and persecution; when others fall from their own steadfastness they shall stand fast in the Lord. [2] They shall keep their comfort, and peace, and hope, and joy, in the midst of the greatest distresses. The storms and streams of affliction shall not shock them, for their feet are set upon a rock. [3] Their everlasting welfare is secured. Obedient believers are kept by the power of Christ, through faith, unto salvation, and shall never perish.

(2) That those who rest in a bare hearing of the sayings of Christ, and do not live up to them, are but preparing for a fatal disappointment: He that heareth and doeth not, he is like a man that built a house without a foundation. His hopes will fail him when he most needs the comfort of them. When the stream beats vehemently upon his house, it is gone, the sand it is built upon is washed away, and immediately it falls.

CHAP. VII

I. Christ confirming the doctrine he had preached with two glorious miracles—the curing of one at a distance, and that was the centurion's servant (ver. 1–10), and the raising of one to life that was dead, the widow's son at Nain, ver. 11–18. II. Christ confirming the faith of John who was now in prison in answer to a question he received from him (ver. 19–23), to which he adds an honourable testimony concerning John, ver. 24–35. III. Christ comforting a poor penitent that applied herself to him, assuring her that her sins were pardoned, and justifying himself in the favour he showed her, ver. 36–50.

Verses 1–10

Some difference there is between this story of the cure of the centurion's servant as it is related here and as we had it in Matt. viii. 5, &c. There it was said that the centurion came to Christ; here it is said that he sent to him first some of the elders of the Jews (v. 3), and afterwards some other friends, v. 6.

This miracle is here said to have been wrought by our Lord Jesus when he had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people, v. 1. What Christ said he said publicly; In secret have I said nothing, John xviii. 20.

I. The centurion's servant that was sick was dear to his master, v. 2. It was the praise of the servant that by his diligence and faithfulness, he recommended himself to his master's esteem and love. Servants should study to endear themselves to their masters. It was likewise the praise of the master that, when he had a good servant, he knew how to value him. Many masters think it favour enough to the best servants they have not to rate them, whereas they ought to be kind to them, and tender of them, and solicitous for their welfare and comfort.

II. The master, when he heard of Jesus, v. 3, begged that Christ would come and heal his servant.

III. He sent some of the elders of the Jews to Christ, thinking that a greater piece of respect to Christ than if he had come himself. For that reason he sent Jews. And not ordinary Jews either, but elders of the Jews, that the dignity of the messengers might give honour to him to whom they were sent.

IV. The elders of the Jews were hearty intercessors for the centurion: They besought him instantly (v. 4), pleading for the centurion that which he would never have pleaded for himself, that he was worthy for whom he should do this. The centurion said, I am not so much as worthy of a visit (Matt. viii. 8), but the elders of the Jews thought him worthy of the cure. But that which they insisted upon in particular was, that, though he was a Gentile, yet he was a hearty well-wisher to the Jewish nation and religion, v. 5. He loveth our nation (which few of the Gentiles did). Even conquerors, and those in power, ought to keep up an affection for the conquered, and those they have power over. He was well-affected to their worship: He built them a new synagogue at Capernaum. Hereby he testified his veneration for the God of Israel, and his desire to have an interest in the prayers of God's Israel. Building places of meeting for religious worship is a very good work, and those who do good works of that kind are worthy of double honour.

V. Jesus Christ was very ready to show kindness to the centurion. He presently went with them (v. 6), though he was a Gentile. The centurion did not think himself worthy to visit Christ (v. 7), yet Christ thought him worthy to be visited by him.

VI. The centurion gave further proofs both of his humility and of his faith. When he was now not far from the house he sends friends to meet him with fresh expressions, 1. Of his humility: "Lord, trouble not thyself, for I am unworthy of such an honour." This bespeaks not only his low thoughts of himself, notwithstanding the greatness of his figure; but his high thoughts of Christ, notwithstanding the meanness of his figure in the world. 2. Of his faith: "Lord, trouble not thyself; thou canst cure my servant without coming under my roof. Say in a word, and my servant shall be healed." He illustrates this faith of his by a comparison taken from his own profession, and is confident that Christ can as easily command away the distemper as he can command any of his soldiers, as he can send a soldier on an errand, v. 8.

VII. Our Lord Jesus was wonderfully well pleased with the faith of the centurion, and the more surprised at it because he was a Gentile; and, the centurion's faith having thus honoured Christ, see how he honoured it (v. 9): He turned him about and said to the people that followed him, I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel. Christ will have those that follow him to observe and take notice of the great examples of faith—especially when any such are found among those that do not follow Christ so closely as they do in profession—that we may be shamed by the strength of their faith out of the weakness and waverings of ours.

VIII. The cure was presently and perfectly wrought (v. 10): They that were sent went back, and found the servant well. Christ will take cognizance of the distressed case of poor servants, for there is no respect of persons with him. Nor are the Gentiles excluded from the benefit of his grace.

Verses 11–18

We have here the story of Christ's raising to life a widow's son at Nain, which Matthew and Mark had made no mention of.

I. Where, and when, this miracle was wrought. It was the next day after he had cured the centurion's servant, v. 11. It was done at the gate of a small city, or town, called Nain, not far from Capernaum.

II. Who were the witnesses of it. It was done in the sight of two crowds that met in or near the gate of the city. There was a crowd of disciples and other people attending Christ (v. 11), and a crowd of relations and neighbours attending the funeral of the young man, v. 12.

III. How it was wrought by our Lord Jesus. The person raised to life was a young man. This young man was the only son of his mother, and she a widow. She depended upon him to be the staff of her old age, but he proves a broken reed; every man at his best estate is so. We may well think how deep the sorrow of this poor mother was for her only son, and it was the deeper in that she was a widow. Much people of the city was with her, condoling with her loss, to comfort her. Christ showed both his pity and his power in raising him to life. See how tender his compassions are towards the afflicted (v. 13): When the Lord saw the poor widow following her son to the grave, he had compassion on her. Here was no application made to him for her. Purely from the goodness of his nature, he was troubled for her. The case was piteous, and he looked upon it with pity. He said unto her, Weep not. What a pleasing idea does this give us of the compassions of the Lord Jesus, and the multitude of his tender mercies. Christ said, Weep not; and he could give her a reason for it which no one else could: "Weep not for a dead son, for he shall presently become a living one." This was a reason peculiar to her case; yet there is a reason common to all that sleep in Jesus, that they shall rise again, shall rise in glory; and therefore we must not sorrow as those that have no hope, 1 Thess. iv. 13. Let our passion at such a time be checked and calmed by the consideration of Christ's compassion. See how triumphant his commands are over even death itself (v. 14): He came, and touched the bier. Hereby he intimated to the bearers that they should not proceed. Hereupon they that bore him stood still, and then with solemnity, as one that had authority, he said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise. Power went along with that word to put life into him. Christ's dominion over death was evidenced by the immediate effect of his word (v. 15): He that was dead sat up. Have we grace from Christ? Let us show it. Another evidence of life was that he began to speak; for whenever Christ gives us spiritual life he opens the lips in prayer and praise. He delivered him to his mother, to attend her as became a dutiful son. Now she was comforted, according to the time in which she had been afflicted.

IV. What influence it had upon the people (v. 16): There came a fear on all; they were all struck with wonder at this miracle, and glorified God. The Lord and his goodness, as well as the Lord and his greatness, are to be feared. The inference they drew from it was, "A great prophet is risen up among us, and in him God hath visited his people." This would be life from the dead indeed to all them that waited for the consolation of Israel. The report of this miracle was carried, in general, all the country over (v. 17): This rumour of him went forth through all Judæa, which lay a great way off, and throughout all Galilee, which was the region round about. Many have the rumour of Christ's gospel in their ears that have not the savour and relish of it in their souls. In particular, it was carefully brought to John Baptist, who was now in prison (v. 18): His disciples came, and gave him an account of all things, that he might know that though he was bound yet the word of the Lord was not bound; God's work was going on, though he was laid aside.

Verses 19–35

I. We have here the message John Baptist sent to Christ, and the return he made to it. The great thing we are to enquire concerning Christ is whether he be he that should come, or whether we are to look for another, v. 19, 20. We are sure that God has promised that a Saviour shall come; we are as sure that what he has promised he will perform. If this Jesus be that promised Messiah, we will receive him; but, if not, we will continue our expectations, and will wait for him. The faith of John Baptist himself wanted to be confirmed in this matter. The great men of the Jewish church had not owned him. Nothing of that power and grandeur was to be seen about him in which it was expected that the Messiah would appear; and therefore it is not strange that they should ask, Art thou the Messiah? Christ left it to his own works to praise him. While John's messengers were with him, he wrought many miraculous cures, in that same hour, v. 21. He cured many of their infirmities and plagues in body, and of evil spirits, and unto many that were blind he gave sight. He multiplied the cures, that there might be no ground left to suspect a fraud; and then (v. 22) he bade them go and tell John what they had seen. And he and they might easily argue, as even the common people did (John vii. 31), When Christ cometh, will he do more miracles than these which this man hath done? You see that Jesus does this to the bodies of people, and therefore must conclude this is he that should come to do it to the souls of people, and you are to look for no other. To his miracles in the kingdom of nature he adds this in the kingdom of grace (v. 22), To the poor the gospel is preached, which they knew was to be done by the Messiah. Judge, therefore, whether you can look for any other that will more fully answer the characters of the Messiah. He gave them an intimation of the danger people were in of being prejudiced against him (v. 23): Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me, or scandalized at me. Christ's education at Nazareth, his residence at Galilee, the meanness of his family and relations, his poverty, and the despicableness of his followers—these and the like were stumbling-blocks to many. He is blessed, for he is wise, humble, and well disposed, that is not overcome by these prejudices. It is a sign that God has blessed him, and he shall be blessed indeed, blessed in Christ.

II. We have here the high encomium which Christ gave of John Baptist; when they were departed (v. 24). Let them now consider what they went out into the wilderness to see. "Come," saith Christ, "I will tell you."

1. He was a man of steadiness and constancy. He was not a reed shaken with the wind; he was firm as a rock, not fickle as a reed.

2. He was a man of unparalleled self-denial. He was not a man clothed in soft raiment, nor did he live delicately (v. 25); but, on the contrary, he lived in a wilderness and was clad and fed accordingly.

3. He was a prophet. Nay, he was more, he was much more than a prophet (v. 26), than any of the prophets of the Old Testament; for they spoke of Christ as at a distance, he spoke of him as at the door.

4. He was the harbinger and forerunner of the Messiah, and was himself prophesied of in the Old Testament (v. 27): This is he of whom it is written (Mal. iii. 1), Behold, I send my messenger before thy face. Before he sent the Master himself, he sent a messenger, to give notice of his coming. It was a previous indication, plain enough, of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, that the messenger he sent before him to prepare his way did it by preaching repentance and reformation. Certainly that kingdom was not of this world which was thus ushered in.

5. He was so great that really there was not a greater prophet than he. Prophets were the greatest that were born of women, and John was the greatest of all the prophets. And yet he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he. The meanest of those that follow the Lamb far excel the greatest of those that went before him. Those therefore who live under the gospel dispensation have so much the more to answer for.

III. We have here the just censure of the men of that generation.

1. Christ here shows what contempt was put upon John Baptist, while he was preaching and baptizing. Those who did show him any respect were but the common ordinary sort of people, v. 29. The people indeed, the vulgar herd, of whom it was said, This people, who know not the law, are cursed (John vii.

49), and the publicans, these were baptized with his baptism, and became his disciples. By their repentance and reformation they justified God in appointing such a one as John Baptist to be the forerunner of the Messiah: they hereby made it to appear that it was the best method that could be taken, for it was not in vain to them, whatever it was to others. The great men of their church and nation heard him indeed, but they were not baptized of him, v. 30. The Pharisees and the lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves; if they had closed with the counsel of God, it had been for themselves; but they rejected it, and it was against themselves, it was to their own ruin.

2. He here shows the strange perverseness of the men of that generation, and the prejudices they conceived. They made but a jesting matter of the methods God took to do them good (v. 31): "Whereunto shall I liken the men of this generation? They are, then, like children sitting in the market-place, that mind nothing that is serious, but are as full of play as they can hold. As if God were but in jest with them, as children are with one another in the market-place (v. 32), they turn it all off with a banter." This is the ruin of multitudes, they can never persuade themselves to be serious in the concerns of their souls. O the amazing stupidity and vanity of the blind and ungodly world! The Lord awaken them out of their security. They still found something or other to carp at. John Baptist was a reserved austere man, lived much in solitude, and ought to have been hearkened to as a man of thought and contemplation; but this, which was his praise, was turned to his reproach. Because he came neither eating nor drinking you say, "He has a devil; he is a melancholy man, he is possessed." Our Lord Jesus was of a more free and open conversation; he came eating and drinking, v. 34. He would go and dine with Pharisees, and with publicans. In hopes of doing good both to the one and the other, he conversed familiarly with them. By this it appears that the ministers of Christ may be of very different tempers and dispositions, very different ways of preaching and living, and yet all good and useful. Therefore none must make themselves a standard to all others, nor judge hardly of those that do not do just as they do. John Baptist bore witness to Christ, and Christ applauded John Baptist, though they were the reverse of each other in their way of living. But the common enemies of them both reproached them both. The very same men that had represented John as crazed in his intellects, represented our Lord Jesus as corrupt in his morals; he is a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber. Ill-will never speaks well.

3. He shows that, notwithstanding this, God will be glorified in the salvation of a chosen remnant (v. 35): Wisdom is justified of all her children. Wisdom's children are herein unanimous, one and all, they have all a complacency in the methods of grace which divine wisdom takes, and think never the worse of them for their being ridiculed by some.

When and where this passage of story happened does not appear, but it comes in here, upon occasion of Christ's being reproached as a friend to publicans and sinners. Who this woman was that here testified so great an affection to Christ does not appear.

I. The civil entertainment which a Pharisee gave to Christ (v. 36): One of the Pharisees desired him that he would eat with him. It appears that this Pharisee did not believe in Christ, for he will not own him to be a prophet (v. 39), and yet our Lord Jesus accepted his invitation, went into his house, and sat down to meat. And those may venture further into the society of such as are prejudiced against Christ, who have wisdom and grace sufficient to instruct and argue with them, than others may.

II. The great respect which a poor penitent sinner showed him. It was a woman in the city that was a sinner, a harlot, and infamous. She knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, and she came to acknowledge her obligations to him, having no opportunity of doing it in any other way than by washing his feet, and anointing them with some sweet ointment that she brought with her for that purpose. Now this woman did not look Christ in the face, but came behind him, and did the part of a maid-servant.

Now in what this good woman did, we may observe,

1. Her deep humiliation for sin. She stood behind him weeping; her eyes had been the inlets and outlets of sin, and now she makes them fountains of tears. Her face is now foul with weeping, which perhaps used to be covered with paints. Her hair now made a towel of, which before had been plaited and adorned. We have reason to think that she had before sorrowed for sin; but now that she had an opportunity of coming into the presence of Christ, her sorrow was renewed.

2. Her strong affection to the Lord Jesus. This was what our Lord Jesus took special notice of, that she loved much, v. 42, 47. She washed his feet, she washed them with her tears, tears of joy; she was in a transport, to find herself so near her Saviour, whom her soul loved. She kissed his feet. It was a kiss of adoration as well as affection. She wiped them with her hair. Her eyes shall yield water to wash them, and her hair be a towel to wipe them; and she anointed his feet with the ointment. All true penitents have a dear love to the Lord Jesus.

III. The offence which the Pharisee took at Christ, for admitting the respect which this poor penitent paid him (v. 39): He said within himself, This man, if he were a prophet, would then have so much knowledge as to perceive that this woman is a sinner, and so much sanctity as therefore not to suffer her to come so near him. See how apt proud and narrow souls are to think that others should be as haughty and censorious as themselves.

IV. Christ's justification of the woman in what she did to him, and of himself in admitting it. Christ knew what the Pharisee spoke within himself, and made answer to it: Simon, I have something to say unto thee, v. 40. Simon is willing to give him the hearing: He saith, Master, say on. Now Christ, in his answer to the Pharisee, reasons thus:—It is true this woman has been a sinner: he knows it; but she is a pardoned sinner, which supposes her to be a penitent sinner. What she did to him was an expression of her great love to her Saviour. If she was pardoned, who had been so great a sinner, it might reasonably be expected that she should love her Saviour more than others, and if this was the fruit of her love, and flowing from a sense of the pardon of her sins, it became him to accept of it, and it ill became the Pharisee to be offended at it.

1. He by a parable forces Simon to acknowledge that the greater sinner this woman had been the greater love she ought to show to Jesus Christ when her sins were pardoned, v. 41–43. A man had two debtors that were both insolvent, but one of them owed him ten times more than the other. He very freely forgave them both, and did not take the advantage of the law against them. Now they were both sensible of the great kindness they had received; but which of them will love him most? Certainly, saith the Pharisee, he to whom he forgave most. Hence learn the duty between debtor and creditor.

(1) The debtor, if he have anything to pay, ought to make satisfaction to his creditor.

(2) If God in his providence have disabled the debtor to pay his debt, the creditor ought not to be severe with him, but freely to forgive him.

(3) The debtor that has found his creditors merciful ought to be very grateful to them; and ought to love them. Some insolvent debtors, instead of being grateful, are spiteful, to their creditors that lose by them, and cannot give them a good word. But this parable speaks of God (or rather of the Lord Jesus himself, for he it is that forgives) and sinners are the debtors: and so we may learn here, [1] That sin is a debt, and sinners are debtors to God Almighty. As creatures, we owe a debt, a debt of obedience. We have not paid our rent; nay, we have wasted our Lord's goods, and so we become debtors. [2] That some are deeper in debt to God, by reason of sin, than others are: One owed five hundred pence and the other fifty. The Pharisee was the less debtor, yet he a debtor too, which was more than he thought himself. This woman was the greater debtor. Some sinners are in themselves greater debtors than others. [3] That, whether our debt be more or less, it is more than we are able to pay: They had nothing to pay, nothing at all to make a composition with. No righteousness of our own will pay it, no, not our repentance and obedience for the future; for it is what we are already bound to. [4] That the God of heaven is ready to forgive, frankly to forgive, poor sinners. If we repent, and believe in Christ, our iniquity shall not be laid to our charge. God has proclaimed his name gracious and merciful, and ready to forgive sin. [5] That those who have their sins pardoned are obliged to love him that pardoned them; and the more is forgiven them, the more they should love him. The greater sinners any have been before their conversion, the greater saints they should be after. When a persecuting Saul became a preaching Paul he laboured more abundantly.

2. He applies this parable to the different temper and conduct of the Pharisee and the sinner. Christ seems really to allow that he was one forgiven, though to him less was forgiven. He did indeed show some love to Christ, but nothing to what this poor woman showed. "Observe," saith Christ to him, "she is one that has much forgiven her, and therefore, she should love much more than thou dost, and so it appears. Seest thou this woman? (v. 44). Consider how much kinder a friend she is to me than thou art; should I then accept thy kindness, and refuse hers? Thou didst not so much as order a basin of water to be brought, to wash my feet in, but she has done much more: she has washed my feet with tears, and has wiped them with the hairs of her head, in token of her great love to me. Thou didst not so much as kiss my cheek, but this woman has not ceased to kiss my feet (v. 45). Thou didst not provide me a little common oil, as usual, to anoint my head with; but she has bestowed a box of precious ointment upon my feet (v. 46)." The reason why some people blame the pains and expense of zealous Christians, in religion, is because they are not willing themselves to come up to it, but resolve to rest in a cheap and easy religion.

3. He silenced the Pharisee's cavil: I say unto thee, Simon, her sins, which are many, are forgiven, v. 47. He owns that she had been guilty of many sins: "But they are forgiven her, for she loved much." It should be rendered, therefore she loved much; for it is plain that her loving much was not the cause, but the effect, of her pardon. We love God because he first loved us; he did not forgive us because we first loved him. "But to whom little is forgiven, as is to thee, the same loveth little, as thou dost." Instead of grudging greater sinners the mercy they find with Christ we should be stirred up by their example to examine ourselves whether we be indeed forgiven, and do love Christ.

4. He silenced her fears. Christ said unto her, Thy sins are forgiven, v. 48. She was dismissed with this word from Christ, Thy sins are forgiven! and what an effectual prevention would this be of her return to sin again! Though there were those present who quarrelled with Christ, in their own minds, for presuming to forgive sin, and to pronounce sinners absolved (v. 49), yet he stood to what he had said. He would now show that he had pleasure in forgiving sin; he loves to speak pardon and peace to penitents: He said to the woman, Thy faith hath saved thee, v. 50. All these expressions of sorrow for sin, and love to Christ, were the effects and products of faith. As faith of all graces doth most honour God, so Christ doth of all graces put most honour upon faith.

CHAP. VIII

Most of this chapter is a repetition of divers passages which we had before in Matthew and Mark. I. A general account of Christ's preaching, ver. 1–3. II. The parable of the sower, ver. 4–18. III. The preference which Christ gave to his obedient disciples before his nearest relations, ver. 19–21. IV. His stilling a storm at sea, ver. 22–25. V. His casting a legion of devils out of a man, ver 26–40. VI. His healing the woman that had the bloody issue, and raising Jairus's daughter to life, ver. 41–56.

Verses 1–3

I. What Christ made the constant business of his life—it was preaching; in that work he was indefatigable, and went about doing good (v. 1). 1. Where he preached: He went about. He was an itinerant preacher, did not confine himself to one place, but diffused the beams of his light. He went about through every city, that none might plead ignorance. Hereby he set an example to his disciples; they must traverse the nations of the earth, as he did the cities of Israel. Nor did he confine himself to the cities, but went into the villages, among the plain country-people. 2. What he preached: He showed the glad tidings of the kingdom of God. Tidings of the kingdom of God are glad tidings, and those Jesus Christ came to bring. It was glad tidings to the world that there was hope of its being reformed and reconciled. 3. Who were his attendants: The twelve were with him to learn from him what and how to preach hereafter.

II. Whence he had the necessary supports of life: He lived upon the kindness of his friends. There were certain women that ministered to him of their substance, v. 2, 3. Some of them are named; but there were many others.

1. They were such, for the most part, as were the monuments of his power and mercy; they had been healed by him of evil spirits and infirmities. We are bound in interest to attend him, that we may be ready to apply ourselves to him for help in case of a relapse; and we are bound in gratitude to serve him and his gospel, who hath saved us, and saved us by it.

2. One of them was Mary Magdalene, out of whom had been cast seven devils. Some think that she was one that had been very wicked, and then we may suppose her to be the woman that was a sinner mentioned just before, ch. vii. 37. Upon her repentance and reformation she found mercy, and became a zealous disciple of Christ. The worse any have been before their conversion the more they should study to do for Christ after. This Mary Magdalene was attending on Christ's cross and his sepulchre.

3. Another of them was Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward. Her husband, though preferred in Herod's court, had received the gospel, and was very willing that his wife should be both a hearer of Christ and a contributor to him.

4. There were many of them that ministered to Christ of their substance. Though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, and lived upon alms. Christ would rather be beholden to his known friends for a maintenance for himself and his disciples than be burdensome to strangers. It is the duty of those who are taught in the word to communicate to them who teach them in all good things.

Verses 4–21

The former paragraph began with an account of Christ's industry in preaching (v. 1); this begins with an account of the people's industry in hearing, v. 4. He went into every city, to preach; but there were those here that came to him out of every city, would not stay till he came to them, nor think that they had enough when he left them, but met him when he was coming towards them, and followed him when he was going from them.

Much people were gathered together, abundance of fish to cast his net among; and he was as ready and willing to teach as they were to be taught.

I. Necessary and excellent rules and cautions for hearing the word, in the parable of the sower. When Christ had put forth this parable, the disciples were inquisitive concerning the meaning of it, v. 9. They asked him, What might this parable be? We should covet earnestly to know the true *in*tent, and full *ex*tent, of the word we hear. They had opportunity of acquainting themselves with the mystery and meaning of his word, which others had not: Unto you it is given, v. 10. Happy are we, and for ever indebted to free grace, if the same thing that is a parable to others, with which they are only amused, is a plain truth to us.

Now from the parable itself, and the explication of it, observe,

1. The heart of man is as soil to the seed of God's word; it is capable of receiving it, and bringing forth the fruits of it; but, unless that seed be sown in it, it will bring forth nothing valuable. Our care therefore must be to bring the seed and the soil together.

2. The success of the seeding is very much according to the nature and temper of the soil. The word of God is to us, as we are, a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death.

3. The devil is a subtle and spiteful enemy. He takes the word out of the hearts of careless hearers, lest they should believe and be saved, v. 12. This is added here to teach us that we cannot be saved unless we believe. That therefore the devil does all he can to keep us from believing, to make us not believe the word when we read and hear it; or, if we heed it for the present, to make us forget it again, and let it slip (Heb. ii. 1); or, if we remember it, to create prejudices in our minds against it, or divert our minds from it to something else; and all is lest we should believe and be saved.

4. Where the word of God is heard carelessly there is commonly a contempt put upon it too. It is added here in the parable that the seed which fell by the wayside was trodden down, v. 5.

5. Those on whom the word makes some impressions, but they are not deep and durable ones; as the seed sown upon the rock, where it gains no root, v. 13. These for awhile believe, their profession promises something, but in time of temptation they fall away from their good beginnings.

6. The pleasures of this life are as dangerous and mischievous thorns to choke the good seed of the word. This is added here (v. 14), which was not in the other evangelists. The delights of sense may ruin the soul, even lawful delights, indulged, and too much delighted in.

7. It is not enough that the fruit be brought forth, but it must be brought to perfection, it must be fully ripened. If it be not, it is as if there was no fruit at all brought forth; for that which in Matthew and Mark is said to be unfruitful is the same that here is said to bring forth none to perfection.

8. The good ground, which brings forth good fruit, is an honest and good heart (v. 15); a heart firmly fixed for God and duty, an upright heart, a tender heart, is an honest and good heart, which, having heard the word, understands it (so it is in Matthew), receives it (so it is in Mark), and keeps it (so it is here), as the soil not only receives, but keeps, the seed.

9. Where the word is well kept there is fruit brought forth with patience. This also is added here; Patience to continue to the end in well-doing.

10. In consideration of all this, we ought to take heed how we hear (v. 18); take heed of those things that will hinder our profiting by the word we hear; take heed lest we hear carelessly and slightly; and take heed after we have heard the word, lest we lose what we have gained.

II. Needful instructions given to those that are appointed to preach the word, and to those also that have heard it. Those that have received the gift must minister the same. People that have profited by the word must look upon themselves as lighted candles. A candle must not be covered with a vessel nor put under a bed, v. 16. Ministers and Christians are to be lights in the world. Their light must shine before men; they must not only be good, but do good. What is now done in secret will shortly be manifested and made known, v. 17. What is committed to you in secret should be made manifest by you; for your Master did not give you talents to be buried, but to be traded with. The gifts we have will either be continued to us, or taken from us, according as we do, or do not, make use of them for the glory of God: Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, v. 18. He that hath gifts, and does good with them, shall have more; he that buries his talent shall lose it. From him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath, so it is in Mark; that which he seemeth to have, so it is in Luke. The grace that is lost was but seeming grace, was never true. Men do but seem to have what they do not use.

III. Great encouragement given to those that prove themselves faithful hearers of the word, by being doers of the work, in a particular instance of Christ's respect to his disciples, in preferring them even before his nearest relations (v. 19–21). Observe what crowding there was after Christ. There was no coming near for the throng of people that attended him. Some of his nearest kindred were least solicitous to hear him preach. Instead of getting within, desiring to hear him, they stood without, desiring to see him. Jesus Christ would rather be busy at his work than conversing with his friends. Christ is pleased to own those as his nearest and dearest relations that hear the word of God and do it.

We have here two illustrious proofs of the power of our Lord Jesus—his power over the winds, and his power over the devils. See Mark iv. and v.

I. His power over the winds.

1. Christ ordered his disciples to put to sea: He went into a ship with his disciples, v. 22. If Christ sends his disciples, he goes with them. And those may safely and boldly venture anywhere that have Christ accompanying them. He said, Let us go over unto the other side.

2. Those that put to sea in a calm, yea, and at Christ's word, must yet prepare for a storm. There came down a storm of wind on the lake (v. 23), and presently their ship was so tossed that it was filled with water, and they were in jeopardy of their lives.

3. Christ was asleep in the storm, v. 23. Some bodily refreshment he must have. The disciples of Christ may really have his gracious presence with them at sea, and in a storm, and yet he may seem as if he were asleep; he may not immediately appear for their relief. Thus he will try their faith and patience and make their deliverance the more welcome when it comes at last.

4. A complaint to Christ of our danger is enough to engage him to awake, and appear for us, v. 24. They cried, Master, master, we perish! The way to have our fears silenced is to bring them to Christ. Those that in sincerity call upon him as their Master, may be sure that he will not let them perish.

5. Christ's business is to lay storms, as it is Satan's business to raise them. He delights to do it: for he came to proclaim peace on earth. He rebuked the wind and the raging of the water, and immediately they ceased (v. 24); all of a sudden, there was a great calm.

6. When our dangers are over, it becomes us to take to ourselves the shame of our own fears and to give to Christ the glory of his power. Christ gives them a rebuke for their inordinate fear: Where is your faith? v. 25. Many that have true faith have it to seek when they have occasion to use it. A little thing disheartens them; and where is their faith then? They give him the glory of his power: They, being afraid, wondered. Those that had feared the storm feared him that had stilled it, and said one to another, What manner of man is this!

II. His power over the devil. Presently after the winds were stilled they were brought to their desired haven, and arrived at the country of the Gadarenes, and there went ashore (v. 26, 27).

1. These malignant spirits are very numerous. They that had taken possession of this one man called themselves Legion (v. 30), because many devils were entered into him: he had had devils a long time, v. 27. They either were, or at least would be thought to be, a legion.

2. They have an inveterate enmity to man. This man in whom the devils had got possession wore no clothes, neither abode in any house (v. 27). They forced this man to abide in the tombs, to make him so much the more a terror to himself and to all about him.

3. They are very strong, fierce, and unruly, and hate and scorn to be restrained: He was kept bound with chains and in fetters, but he broke the bands, v. 29. Those that are ungovernable by any other thereby show that they are under Satan's government. He was driven of the devil. Those that are under Christ's government are sweetly led with the bands of love; those that are under the devil's government are furiously driven.

4. They are much enraged against our Lord Jesus, and have a great dread and horror of him: When the man saw Jesus, he roared out and fell down before him, and owned him to be the Son of God most high, that was infinitely above him and too hard for him; but protested against having any league or confederacy with him: What have I to do with thee? The devils have neither inclination to do service to Christ nor expectation to receive benefit by him. But they dreaded his power and wrath: I beseech thee, torment me not. They do not say, I beseech thee, save me, but only, Torment me not. See whose language they speak that have only a dread of hell but no desire of heaven as a place of holiness and love.

5. They are perfectly at the command, and under the power, of our Lord Jesus; and they knew it, for they besought him that he would not command them to go into the deep. O what a comfort is this to the Lord's people, that all the powers of darkness are under the check and control of the Lord Jesus! He can send them to their own place, when he pleaseth.

6. They delight in doing mischief. When they found there was no remedy, but they must quit their hold of this poor man, they begged they might have leave to take possession of a herd of swine, v. 32. When he could not destroy the man, he would destroy the swine. If he could not hurt them in their bodies, he would hurt them in their goods, which sometimes prove a great temptation to men to draw them from Christ, as here. Christ suffered them to enter into the swine. They entered into the swine; and no sooner had they entered into them than the herd ran violently down a steep place into the lake, and were drowned.

7. When the devil's power is broken in any soul that soul recovers itself: The man out of whom the devils were departed sat at the feet of Jesus, v. 35. While he was under the devil's power he was ready to fly in the face of Jesus; but now he sits at his feet. If God has possession of us, he preserves to us the government and enjoyment of ourselves; but, if Satan has possession of us, he robs us of both. We are never more our own than when we are Christ's.

Let us now see what was the effect of this miracle.

(1) What effect it had upon the people of that country: The swineherds went and told it both in city and country (v. 34). They told by what means he that was possessed of the devils was healed (v. 36), that it was by sending the devils into the swine, as if Christ could not have delivered the man out of their hands, but by delivering the swine into them. The people came out, to see what was done, and they were afraid (v. 35); they were taken with great fear (v. 37). They thought more of the destruction of the swine than of the deliverance of their poor afflicted neighbour, and therefore the whole multitude besought Christ to depart from them. None need to be afraid of Christ that are willing to forsake their sins and give up themselves to him. But Christ took them at their word: He went up into the ship, and returned back again. Those lose their Saviour, and their hopes in him, that love their swine better.

(2) What effect it had upon the poor man. He desired Christ's company as much as others dreaded it: he besought Christ that he might be with him, as others were that have been healed by him of evil spirits and infirmities (v. 2). He was loth to stay among those rude and brutish Gadarenes that desired Christ to depart from them. But Christ sent him home, to publish among those that knew him the great things God had done for him, that so he might be a blessing to his country, as he had been a burden to it. We must sometimes deny ourselves the satisfaction even of spiritual benefits and comforts, to gain an opportunity of being serviceable to the souls of others.

Verses 40–56

Christ was driven away by the Gadarenes. But when he returned to the Galileans, they gladly received him, wished and waited for his return, and welcomed him with all their hearts, v. 40. He returned, and found work to do in the place whence he came, fresh work. The needy you have always with you.

We have here two miracles interwoven, as they were in Matthew and Mark.

I. A public address made to Christ by a ruler of the synagogue, whose name was Jairus, on the behalf of a little daughter of his, that was very ill. Jairus, though a ruler, fell down at Jesus's feet. He besought him that he would come into his house; not having the faith of the centurion, who desired Christ only to speak the healing word at a distance. But Christ complied with his request; he went along with him. Strong faith shall be applauded, and yet weak faith shall not be rejected. When Christ was going the people thronged him. Let us not complain of a crowd, and a throng, and a hurry, as long as we are in the way of our duty, and doing good; but otherwise it is what every wise man will keep himself out of as much as he can.

II. Here is a secret application made to Christ by a woman ill of a bloody issue, which had been the consumption of her body and the consumption of her purse too; for she had spent all her living upon physicians, and was never the better, v. 43. The nature of her disease was such that she did not care to make a public complaint of it and therefore she took this opportunity of coming to Christ in a crowd. Her faith was very strong; for she doubted not but that by the touch of the hem of his garment she should derive from him healing virtue, looking upon him to be such a full fountain of mercies that she should steal a cure and he not miss it. Thus many a poor soul is healed, and helped, and saved, by Christ, that is lost in a crowd. The woman found an immediate change for the better in herself, and that her disease was cured, v. 44. Believers have comfortable communion with Christ incognito.

III. Here is a discovery of this secret cure.

1. Christ takes notice that there is a cure wrought: Virtue is gone out of me, v. 46. Those that have been healed by virtue derived from Christ must own it, for he knows it. It was his delight that virtue was gone out of him to do any good, and he did not grudge it to the meanest; they were as welcome to it as to the light and heat of the sun.

2. The poor patient owns her case, and the benefit she had received: When she saw that she was not hid, she came, and fell down before him, v. 47. She came trembling, and yet her faith saved her, v. 48. There may be trembling where yet there is saving faith. She declared before all the people for what cause she had touched him, because she believed that a touch would cure her, and it did so.

3. The great physician confirms her cure, and sends her away with the comfort of it: Be of good comfort: thy faith hath made thee whole, v. 48. It was obtained surreptitiously and underhand, but it was secured and seconded aboveboard. She is healed, and she shall be healed.

IV. Here is an encouragement to Jairus not to distrust the power of Christ, though his daughter was now dead, and they that brought him the tidings advised him not to give the Master any further trouble about her: Fear not, saith Christ, only believe. Our faith in Christ should be bold and daring. Though the child is dead, yet believe, and all shall be well.

V. The preparatives for the raising of her to life again. 1. The choice Christ made of witnesses that should see the miracle wrought. A crowd followed him, but perhaps they were rude and noisy; however, it was not fit to let such a multitude come into a gentleman's house, especially now that the family was all in sorrow; therefore he sent them back. He took none with him but Peter, and James, and John, designing these three, with the parents, to be the only spectators of the miracle. 2. The check he gave to the mourners. They all wept, and bewailed her. But Christ bids them not weep; for she is not dead, but sleepeth. He means, as to her peculiar case, that she was not dead for good and all; it would be to her friends as if she had been but a few hours asleep. But it is applicable to all that die in the Lord; therefore we should not sorrow for them as those that have no hope, because death is but a sleep. This was a comfortable word which Christ said to these mourners, yet they wickedly ridiculed it, and laughed him to scorn for it. They knew that she was dead, they were certain of it, and therefore nothing less than a divine power could restore her to life. But he put them all out, v. 54. They were unworthy to be the witnesses of this work of wonder.

VI. Her return to life: He took her by the hand (as we do by one that we would awake out of sleep, and help up), and he called, saying, Maid, arise, v. 55. Here that is expressed which was only implied in the other evangelists, that her spirit came again. Where the soul of this child was in this interval we are not told; it was in the hand of the Father of spirits. When her spirit came again she arose, and made it appear that she was alive by her motion, as she did also by her appetite; for Christ commanded to give her meat. In the last verse, we need not wonder to find her parents astonished.

CHAP. IX

I. The commission Christ gave to his twelve apostles, ver. 1–6. II. Herod's terror at the growing greatness of our Lord Jesus, ver. 7–9. III. The apostles' return to Christ, his retirement with them, the great resort of people to them notwithstanding, and his feeding five thousand men, ver. 10–17. IV. His discourse with his disciples concerning himself and his own sufferings for them, ver. 18–27. V. Christ's transfiguration, ver. 28–36. VI. The cure of a lunatic child, ver. 37–42. VII. The repeated notice of his approaching sufferings, ver. 43–45. VIII. His check to the ambition of his disciples (ver. 46–48), and to their monopolizing the power over devils to themselves, ver. 49, 50. IX. The rebuke he gave them for an undue resentment of an affront given him by a village of the Samaritans, ver. 51–56. X. The answers he gave to several that were inclined to follow him, ver. 57–62.

Verses 1–9

I. The method Christ took to spread his gospel. He had himself travelled about; but he could be only in one place at a time, and therefore now he sent his twelve disciples abroad. Let them disperse themselves, some one way and some another, to preach the kingdom of God. For the confirming of their doctrine he empowered them to work miracles (v. 1, 2): He gave them authority over all devils, to dispossess them, and cast them out. He authorized and appointed them likewise to cure diseases, and to heal the sick, which would not only convince people's judgments, but gain their affections. This was their commission.

1. What Christ directed them to do, in prosecution of this commission. (1) They must not be solicitous to recommend themselves to people's esteem by their outward appearance. They must go as they were, and not change their clothes, or so much as put on a pair of new shoes. (2) They must depend upon Providence, and the kindness of their friends. They must not take with them either bread or money. Christ would not have his disciples shy of receiving the kindnesses of their friends, but rather to expect them. (3) They must not change their lodgings, as suspecting that those who entertained them were weary of them; "Whatsoever house ye enter into there abide (v. 4), that people may know where to find you; there abide till you depart out of that city; stay with those you are used to." (4) They must put on authority, and speak warning to those who refused them as well as comfort to those that received them, v. 5. "If there be any place that will not entertain you, bind them over to the judgment of God for it; shake off the dust of your feet for a testimony against them."

2. What they did, in prosecution of this commission (v. 6): They departed from their Master's presence; they went through the towns, preaching the gospel, and healing everywhere. Their work was the same with their Master's, doing good both to souls and bodies.

II. We have here Herod's perplexity and vexation at this. The communicating of Christ's power to those who were sent forth in his name was an amazing and convincing proof of his being the Messiah. That he could not only work miracles himself, but empower others to work miracles too, this spread his fame more than anything. They had been with Jesus, Acts iv. 13. When the country sees such as these healing the sick in the name of Jesus it gives it an alarm.

1. The various speculations it raised among the people, who, though they thought not rightly, yet could not but think honourably, of our Lord Jesus, and that he was one come from the other world; that either John Baptist or one of the old prophets was risen again; or that Elias had appeared, v. 7, 8.

2. The great perplexity it created in the mind of Herod: When he had heard of all that was done by Christ, he was ready to conclude with them that John was risen from the dead. "What shall I do now?" saith Herod. "John have I beheaded, but who is this? Is he carrying on John's work, or is he come to avenge John's death?" Those who oppose God will find themselves more and more embarrassed. He desired to see him; and why did he not go and see him? He desired to see him, but we do not find that ever he did, till he saw him at his bar.

Verses 10–17

I. The account which the twelve gave their Master of the success of their ministry. When they returned, they told him all that they had done.

II. Their retirement, for a little breathing: He took them, and went aside privately into a desert place. He that hath appointed our man-servant and maid-servant to rest would have his servants to rest too. Those in the most public stations, must sometimes go aside privately, both for the repose of their bodies, and for the furnishing of their minds by meditation for further public work.

III. The resort of the people to him, and the kind reception he gave them. They followed him, though it was into a desert place. He welcomed them, v. 11. Pious zeal may excuse a little rudeness; it did with Christ, and should with us. Though they came unseasonably, yet Christ gave them what they came for. He spoke unto them of the kingdom of God. He healed them that had need of healing. Christ hath still a power over bodily diseases, and heals his people that need healing. Sometimes he sees that we need the sickness for the good of our souls, more than the healing for the ease of our bodies. Death is the servant, to heal the saints of all diseases.

IV. The plentiful provision Christ made for the multitude that attended him. With five loaves of bread, and two fishes, he fed five thousand men. This narrative we had twice before, and shall meet with it again; it is the only miracle of our Saviour's that is recorded by all the four evangelists. Let us only observe out of it, 1. Those who diligently attend upon Christ in the way of duty, and therein deny or expose themselves, are taken under his particular care. He will not see those that fear him, and serve him faithfully, want any good thing. 2. Our Lord Jesus was of a free and generous spirit. His disciples said, Send them away, that they may get victuals; but Christ said, "No, give ye them to eat; let what we have go as far as it will reach, and they are welcome to it." Thus he has taught both ministers and Christians to use hospitality without grudging. Those that have but a little, let them do what they can with that little, and that is the way to make it more. 3. Jesus Christ has not only physic, but food. He not only heals them that need healing, but feeds them too that need feeding. Christ has provided not only to save the soul from perishing by its diseases, but to nourish the soul unto life eternal. 4. All the gifts of Christ are to be received in a regular orderly manner: Make them sit down by fifties in a company, v. 14. 5. When we are receiving our creature-comforts, we must look up to heaven. Christ did so, to teach us to do so. We receive them from God, we depend upon God's blessing upon them to make them serviceable to us, and desire that blessing. 6. The blessing of Christ will make a little go a great way. 7. Those whom Christ feeds he fills; as there is in him enough for all, so there is enough for each. Here were fragments taken up, to assure us that in our Father's house there is bread enough, and to spare. We are not straitened or stinted, in him.

Verses 18–27

One circumstance of this discourse is taken notice of here which we had not in the other evangelists—that Christ was alone praying, and his disciples with him, when he entered into this discourse, v. 18. He found some time to be alone in private, for converse with himself, with his Father, and with his disciples. When Christ was alone he was praying. It is good for us to improve our solitude for devotion, that, when we are alone, we may not be alone, but may have the Father with us. When Christ was alone, praying, his disciples were with him, to join with him in his prayer. Christ prayed with them before he examined them. Those we give instructions to we should put up prayers for and with. He discourses with them,

I. Concerning himself; and enquires,

1. What the people said of him: Who say the people that I am? They tell him what conjectures concerning him they had heard in their converse with the common people. Ministers would know better how to suit their instructions, reproofs, and counsels, to the case of ordinary people, if they did but converse more frequently and familiarly with them. The more conversant the physician is with his patient, the better he knows what to do for him. Some said that he was John Baptist, who was beheaded but the other day; others Elias, or one of the old prophets; anything but what he was.

2. What they said of him. Saith Peter, "We know that thou art the Christ of God, the Anointed of God." Now one would have expected that Christ should have charged his disciples to publish it to everyone they met with; but no, he strictly charged them to tell no man that thing as yet. After his resurrection, which completed the proof of it, Peter made the temple ring of it, that God had made this same Jesus both Lord and Christ (Acts ii. 36); but as yet the evidence was not ready to be summed up, and therefore it must be concealed.

II. Concerning his own sufferings and death. Now that his disciples were well established in the belief of his being the Christ, and able to bear it, he speaks of them expressly, v. 22. They must not yet preach that he was the Christ, because the wonders that would attend his death and resurrection would be the most convincing proof of his being the Christ of God.

III. Concerning their sufferings for him.

1. We must accustom ourselves to all instances of self-denial and patience, v. 23. We must not indulge our ease and appetite, for then it will be hard to bear toil, and weariness, and want, for Christ. We frequently meet with crosses in the way of duty; and, though we must not pull them upon our own heads, yet, when they are laid for us, we must take them up, carry them after Christ, and make the best of them.

2. We must prefer the salvation and happiness of our souls before any secular concern whatsoever. Reckon upon it, (1) That he who to preserve his liberty or estate, nay, or to save his life, denies Christ and his truths, will be, not only not a saver, but an unspeakable loser, in the issue. He that will save his life upon these terms will lose it, will lose that which is of infinitely more value, his precious soul. (2) We must firmly believe also that, if we lose our life for cleaving to Christ, we shall save it to our unspeakable advantage. We shall have it again a new and an eternal life. (3) That the gain of all the world, if we should forsake Christ, would be so far from countervailing the eternal loss and ruin of the soul that it would bear no manner of proportion to it, v. 25. If we could be supposed to gain all the wealth, honour, and pleasure, in the world, by denying Christ, yet when, by so doing, we lose ourselves to all eternity, and are cast away at last, what good will our worldly gain do us? In Matthew and Mark the dreadful issue is a man's losing his own soul, here it is losing himself, which plainly intimates that our souls are ourselves. The soul is the man; and it is well or ill with us according as it is well or ill with our souls. The body cannot be happy if the soul be miserable in the other world; but the soul may be happy though the body be greatly afflicted and oppressed in this world.

3. We must therefore never be ashamed of Christ and his gospel, v. 26. For whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, and justly. He can expect no other than that in the great day, when his case calls for Christ's appearance on his behalf, Christ will be ashamed to own such a cowardly, worldly, sneaking spirit, and will say, "He is none of mine; he belongs not to me." As Christ had a state of humiliation and of exaltation, so likewise has his cause. They, and they only, that are willing to suffer with it when it suffers, shall reign with it when it reigns. Observe here, How Christ, to support himself and his followers under present disgraces, speaks magnificently of the lustre of his second coming. He shall come in his own glory. This was not mentioned in Matthew and Mark. He shall come in his Father's glory. He shall come in the glory of the holy angels. What a figure will the blessed Jesus make in that day! Did we believe it, we should never be ashamed of him or his words now.

Lastly, To encourage them in suffering for him, he assures them that the kingdom of God would now shortly be set up, v. 27. "The kingdom of God shall come in its power in the present age, while some here present are alive." They saw the kingdom of God when the Spirit was poured out, when the gospel was preached to all the world and nations were brought to Christ by it.

We have here the narrative of Christ's transfiguration which was designed for a specimen of that glory of his of which he had lately been speaking, and, consequently, an encouragement to his disciples to suffer for him, and never to be ashamed of him. We had this account before in Matthew and Mark.

I. Here is one circumstance of the narrative that seems to differ from the other two evangelists. They said that it was six days after the foregoing sayings; Luke says that it was about eight days after, that is, it was that day sevennight, six whole days intervening, and it was the eighth day.

II. Here are divers circumstances added and explained.

1. We are here told that Christ had this honour put upon him when he was praying: He went up into a mountain to pray (v. 28), and as he prayed he was transfigured. When Christ humbled himself to pray, he was thus exalted. Christ himself must sue out the favours that were purposed for him, and promised to him. And thus he intended to put an honour upon the duty of prayer, and to recommend it to us. It is a transfiguring, transforming duty. By prayer we fetch in the wisdom, grace, and joy, which make the face to shine.

2. Luke does not use the word transfigured (which Matthew and Mark used), but makes use of a phrase equivalent, the fashion of his countenance was another thing from what it had been; and his raiment was white and glistening; it was bright like lightning (a word used only here), so that he seemed to be arrayed all with light, to cover himself with light as with a garment.

3. It was said in Matthew and Mark that Moses and Elias appeared to them; here it is said that they appeared in glory. He being in glory, they appeared with him in glory.

4. We are here told what was the subject of the discourse between Christ and the two great prophets of the Old Testament: They spoke of his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem. His departure; that is, his death. (1) The death of Christ is here called his exit, his going out, his leaving the world. The death of the saints is their exodus, their departure out of the Egypt of this world, their release out of a house of bondage. (2) This departure of his he must accomplish; for thus it was determined in the counsel of God, and could not be altered. (3) He must accomplish it at Jerusalem. (4) Moses and Elias spoke of this, to intimate that the sufferings of Christ, and his entrance into his glory, were what Moses and the prophets had spoken of; see Luke xxiv. 26, 27. (5) Our Lord Jesus, even in his transfiguration, was willing to enter into a discourse concerning his death and sufferings. In our greatest glories on earth, let us remember that here we have no continuing city.

5. We are here told, which we were not before, that the disciples were heavy with sleep, v. 32. Perhaps it was owing to a sinful carelessness: when Christ was at prayer with them, they did not regard his prayer as they should have done, and, to punish them for that, they were left to sleep on now, and so lost an opportunity of seeing how that work of wonder was wrought. These three were now asleep, when Christ was in his glory, as afterwards they were, when he was in his agony. Nothing could be more affecting to these disciples, one would think, than the glories and the agonies of their Master, and both in the highest degree; and yet neither the one nor the other would serve to keep them awake. What need have we to pray to God for quickening grace, to make us not only alive, but lively! After awhile they recovered themselves, and then they took an exact view of all those glories, so that they were able to give a particular account, as we find one of them does, of all that passed when they were with Christ in the holy mount, 2 Pet. i. 18.

6. It is here observed that it was when Moses and Elias were now about to depart that Peter said, Lord, it is good to be here, let us make three tabernacles. Thus we are often not sensible of the worth of our mercies till we are about to lose them; nor do we covet and court their continuance till they are upon the departure. Peter said this, not knowing what he said.

7. It is here added, concerning the cloud that overshadowed them, that they feared as they entered into the cloud. This cloud was a token of God's more peculiar presence. Then no wonder that the disciples were afraid to enter into it. But never let any be afraid to enter into a cloud with Jesus Christ; for he will be sure to bring them safely through it.

8. The voice which came from heaven is here, and in Mark, related not so fully as in Matthew: This is my beloved Son, hear him: though those words, in whom I am well pleased, which we have both in Matthew and Peter, are not expressed, they are implied in that, This is my beloved Son.

Lastly, The apostles are here said to have kept this vision private. They told no man in those days. As there is a time to speak, so there is a time to keep silence. Everything is beautiful and useful in its season.

Verses 37–42

This passage of story in Matthew and Mark follows immediately upon that of Christ's transfiguration, and his discourse with his disciples after it; but here it is said to be on the next day, as they were coming down from the hill. It was not till next day that they came down from the hill, and then he found things in some disorder among his disciples. 1. How forward the people were to receive Christ at his return to them.

Much people met him, as, at other times, much people followed him. 2. How importunate the father of the lunatic child was with Christ for help for him (v. 38): I beseech thee, look upon my son; this is his request; one compassionate look from Christ is enough to set everything to rights. Let us bring ourselves and our children to Christ, to be looked upon. His plea is, He is my only child. They that have many children may balance their affliction in one with their comfort in the rest. 3. How deplorable the case of the child was, v. 39. He was under the power of an evil spirit, that took him; when the fit seized him, he suddenly cried out, and many a time his shrieks had pierced the heart of his tender father. This malicious spirit tore him, and bruised him, and departed not from him but with great difficulty. What mischief doth Satan do where he gets possession! But happy they that have access to Christ! 4. How defective the disciples were in their faith. Though Christ had given them power over unclean spirits, yet they could not cast out this evil spirit, v. 40. Either they distrusted the power they were to fetch in strength from, or they did not exert themselves in prayer as they ought; for this Christ reproved them. 5. How effectual the cure was, which Christ wrought upon this child, v. 42. Christ can do that for us which his disciples cannot: Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit. The devil threw the child down, and tore him, as if he would have pulled him to pieces. But one word from Christ healed the child, and made good the damage the devil had done him. He delivered him again to his father. When our children are recovered from sickness, we must receive them as delivered to us again, receive them as life from the dead. It is comfortable to receive them from the hand of Christ: "Here, take this child, and be thankful; take it, and bring it up for me, for thou hast it again from me." With such cautions as these, parents should receive their children from Christ's hands, and then with comfort put them again into his hands.

Verses 43–50

I. The impression which Christ's miracles made upon all that beheld them (v. 43): They were all amazed at the mighty power of God. Their wonder was universal: they wondered every one. The causes of it were universal: they wondered at all things which Jesus did; all his actions had something uncommon and surprising in them.

II. The notice Christ gave to his disciples of his approaching sufferings: The Son of man shall be delivered into the hands of men. That is here implied which is expressed by the other evangelists: They shall kill him. But that which is peculiar here is, 1. The connection of this with what goes next before, of the admiration with which the people were struck at beholding Christ's miracles (v. 43): While they all wondered at all things which Jesus did, he said this to his disciples. They had a fond conceit of his temporal kingdom, and that he should reign, in secular pomp and power; and now they thought that this mighty power of his would easily effect the thing. Therefore Christ takes this occasion to tell them again that he was so far from having men delivered into his hands that he must be delivered into the hands of men. 2. The solemn preface with which it is introduced: "Let these sayings sink down into your ears. Admit what I say, and submit to it." Let it sink down into your hearts; so the Syriac and Arabic read it. The word of Christ does us no good, unless we let it sink down into our heads and hearts. 3. The unaccountable stupidity of the disciples. It was said in Mark, They understood not that saying. It was plain enough, but they would not understand it in the literal sense; and they could not understand it in any other, and were afraid to ask him lest they should be undeceived and awaked out of their pleasing dream. But it is here added that it was hidden from them, that they perceived it not. We cannot think that it was in mercy hidden from them, lest they should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow at the prospect of it; but that it was a paradox, because they made it so to themselves.

III. The rebuke Christ gave to his disciples for their disputing among themselves which should be greatest, v. 46–48. This passage we had before, and, the more is the pity, we shall meet with the like again.

1. Ambition of honour, and strife for superiority and precedency, are sins that most easily beset the disciples of our Lord Jesus. They flow from corruptions which they are highly concerned to subdue and mortify, v. 46. They that expect to be great in this world commonly aim high, and nothing will serve them short of being greatest; this exposes them to a great deal of temptation and trouble, which they are safe from that are content to be little, to be least, to be less than the least.

2. Jesus Christ is perfectly acquainted with the thoughts and intents of our hearts: He perceived their thoughts, v. 47. Thoughts are words to him, and whispers are loud cries.

3. Christ will have his disciples to aim at that honour which is to be obtained by a quiet humility, and not at that which is to be obtained by a restless and aspiring ambition. Christ took a child, and set him by him, v. 47 (for he always expressed a tenderness and kindness for little children). (1) Let them be of the temper of this child, humble and quiet, and easy to itself. Let them be willing to be the least, if that would contribute anything to their usefulness. (2) Let them assure themselves that this was the way to preferment. They that loved Christ would therefore receive them in his name, because they did most resemble him. Christ would take the kindnesses done to them as done to himself: Whosoever shall receive one such child receiveth me; and whosoever receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me; and what greater honour can any man attain to in this world than to have God and Christ own themselves received and welcomed in him?

IV. The rebuke Christ gave to his disciples for discouraging one that honoured him and served him, but was not of their communion, but, upon occasional hearing of Christ, believed in him, and made use of his name with faith and prayer in a serious manner, for the casting out of devils. This man they rebuked and restrained; they would not let him pray and preach, though it was to the honour of Christ. He did not follow Christ with them. Jesus Christ chid them for what they did: "Forbid him not (v. 50), but rather encourage him, for he is carrying on the same design that you are. He will meet you in the same end, though he does not accompany you in the same way. He that is not against us is for us, and therefore ought to be countenanced by us." We need not lose any of our friends, while we have so few, and so many enemies. Those may be found faithful followers of Christ, and, as such, may be accepted of him, though they do not follow with us.

This passage of story we have not in any other of the evangelists. Here they were for putting infidels to death. Christ reprimanded them, for a spirit of bigotry and persecution is directly contrary to the spirit of Christ.

I. The readiness and resolution of our Lord Jesus, in prosecuting his great undertaking for our redemption and salvation. Of this we have an instance, v. 51: When the time was come that he should be received up, he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem. There was a time fixed for the sufferings and death of our Lord Jesus, and he knew well enough when it was. Then he appeared most publicly of all, and was most busy, knowing that his time was short. When he saw his death and sufferings approaching, he looked through them and beyond them, to the glory that should follow, when he should be received up into glory (1 Tim. iii. 16). All good Christians may frame to themselves the same notion of death, and may call it their being received up, to be with Christ where he is. On this prospect of the joy set before him, he steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem. He was fully determined to go, and would not be dissuaded; he went directly to Jerusalem. He went cheerfully and courageously thither. He did not fail nor was discouraged, knowing that he should be not only justified, but glorified, not only not run down, but received up. How should this shame us for, and shame us out of, our backwardness to do and suffer for Christ!

II. The rudeness of the Samaritans in a certain village who would not receive him. 1. How civil he was to them: He sent messengers before his face, that went to take up lodgings, and to know whether he might have leave to accommodate himself and his company among them. He sent some to make ready for him that his coming might be no surprise. 2. How uncivil they were to him, v. 53. They did not receive him, would not suffer him to come into their village. He would have been the greatest blessing that ever came to their village, and yet they forbid him entrance. Now the reason was because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem. The great controversy between the Jews and the Samaritans was about the place of worship—whether Jerusalem or mount Gerizim near Sychar; see John iv. 20. And so hot was the controversy between them that the Jews would have no dealings with the Samaritans, nor they with them, John iv. 9. They were particularly incensed against Christ, who was a celebrated teacher, for owning and adhering to the temple at Jerusalem. They would not show him the common civility which probably they used formerly to show him in his journey thither.

III. The resentment which James and John expressed of this affront, v. 54. When these two heard this message brought, they were all in a flame presently, and nothing will serve them but Sodom's doom upon this village.

1. Here indeed was something commendable, for they showed, (1) A great confidence in the power they had received from Jesus Christ. They could with a word's speaking fetch fire from heaven. Wilt thou that we speak the word, and the thing will be done. (2) A great zeal for the honour of their Master. They took it very ill that he who did good wherever he came and found a hearty welcome should be denied the liberty of the road by a parcel of paltry Samaritans. (3) A submission, notwithstanding, to their Master's goodwill and pleasure. They will not offer to do such a thing, unless Christ give leave: Wilt thou that we do it? (4) A regard to the examples of the prophets that were before them. It is doing as Elias did. They thought that this precedent would be their warrant; so apt are we to misapply the examples of good men.

2. But though there was something right in what they said, yet there was much more amiss for (1) This was not the first time, by a great many, that our Lord Jesus had been thus affronted, yet he never called for any judgment upon them, but patiently put up with the injury. (2) These were Samaritans, from whom better was not to be expected, and perhaps they had heard that Christ had forbidden his disciples to enter into any of the cities of the Samaritans (Matt. x. 5), and therefore it was not so bad in them as in others who knew more of Christ. (3) Perhaps it was only some few of the town that sent that rude message to him, while, for aught they knew, there were many in the town who would have gone to meet him and welcomed him. (4) Their Master had never yet upon any occasion called for fire from heaven. James and John were the two disciples whom Christ had called Boanerges—sons of thunder (Mark iii. 17); and will not that serve them, but they must be sons of lightning too? (5) The example of Elias did not reach the case. Elijah was sent to display the terrors of the law, but it is a dispensation of grace that is now to be introduced, to which such a terrible display of divine justice will not be at all agreeable.

IV. The reproof he gave to James and John (v. 55): He turned and rebuked them; for as many as he loves he rebukes and chastens, particularly for what they do, that is irregular and unbecoming them, under colour of zeal for him.

1. He shows them in particular their mistake: Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. (1) "You are not aware how much there is of pride, and passion, and personal revenge, covered under this pretence of zeal for your Master." There may be much corruption lurking, nay, and stirring too, in the hearts of good people, and they themselves not be sensible of it. (2) "You do not consider what a good spirit you should be of. Surely you have yet to learn what the spirit of Christ is. Have you not been taught to love your enemies, and to bless them that curse you, and to call for grace from heaven, not fire from heaven, upon them? You are under the dispensation of love, and liberty, and grace, which was ushered in with a proclamation of peace on earth and goodwill toward men."

2. He shows them the general design and tendency of his religion (v. 56): The Son of man is not himself come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. He designed to propagate his holy religion by love and sweetness, and everything that is inviting and endearing, not by fire and sword, by miracles of healing, not by plagues and miracles of destruction, as Israel was brought out of Egypt. Christ came to slay all enmities, not to foster them. Christ came, not only to save men's souls, but to save their lives too. Christ would have his disciples do good to all, but hurt to none, to draw men into his church with the cords of a man and the bands of love, but not think to drive men into it.

V. His retreat from this village. Christ would not only not punish them for their rudeness but quietly and peaceably went to another village, where they were not so stingy. If some be very rude, instead of revenging it, we should try whether others will not be more civil.

Verses 57–62

We have here an account of three several persons that offered themselves to follow Christ.

I. Here is one that is extremely forward to follow Christ immediately, but seems to have been too rash and not to have set down and counted the cost.

1. He makes Christ a very large promise (v. 57): As they went in the way one said to him, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. This must be the resolution of all that will be found Christ's disciples indeed; they follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes.

2. Christ gives him a necessary caution, not to promise himself great things in the world, in following him; for the Son of man has not where to lay his head.

We may look upon this, (1) As setting forth the very low condition that our Lord Jesus was in, in this world. He not only wanted the delights and ornaments that great princes usually have, but even such accommodations for mere necessity as the foxes have, and the birds of the air. He that made all did not make a dwelling-place for himself, not a house of his own to put his head in. He here calls himself the Son of man, a Son of Adam, partaker of flesh and blood. He glories in his condescension towards us, to testify his love to us, and to teach us a holy contempt of the world, and a continual regard to another world. Christ was thus poor, to sanctify and sweeten poverty to his people. We may well be content to fare as Christ did. (2) As proposing this to the consideration of those who intend to be his disciples. If we mean to follow Christ, we must not reckon upon making anything more than heaven of our religion. Christ tells this man what he must count upon if he followed him, to lie cold and uneasy, to fare hard, and live in contempt; if he could not submit to this, let him not pretend to follow Christ. This word sent him back, for aught that appears; but it will be no discouragement to any that know what there is in Christ and heaven to set in the scale against this.

II. Here is another, that seems resolved to follow Christ, but he begs a day, v. 59. To this man Christ first gave the call; he said to him, Follow me. This man to whom Christ gave a call, though he hesitated at first, yet, as it should seem, afterwards yielded. It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth (as that forward spark in the foregoing verses), but of God that showeth mercy, that gives the call.

1. The excuse he made: "Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. I have an aged father at home, who cannot live long, and will need me while he does live; let me go and attend on him until he is dead, and then I will do anything." We may here see three temptations. (1) We are tempted to rest in a discipleship at large, in which we may be at a loose end, and not to come close. (2) We are tempted to defer the doing of that which we know to be our duty, and to put it off to some other time. When we have got clear of such a care and difficulty, then we will begin to think of being religious; and so we are cozened out of all our time, by being cozened out of the present time. (3) We are tempted to think that our duty to our relations will excuse us from our duty to Christ. The kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof must be sought and minded in the first place.

2. Christ's answer to it (v. 60): "Let the dead bury their dead. Thou hast other work to do; go thou, and preach the kingdom of God." Not that Christ would have his followers or his ministers to be unnatural; our religion teaches us to be kind and good in every relation. But we must not make these offices an excuse from our duty to God. If the nearest and dearest relation we have in the world stand in our way to keep us from Christ, it is necessary that we have a zeal that will make us forget father and mother. No excuses must be admitted against a present obedience to the call of Christ.

III. Here is another that is willing to follow Christ, but he must have a little time to talk with his friends about it.

1. His request for a dispensation, v. 61. He said, "Lord, I will follow thee; but let me first go bid them farewell that are at home." Let me go and set in order my household affairs, so some understand it. Now that which was amiss in this is, (1) That he looked upon his following Christ as a melancholy, troublesome, dangerous thing; it was to him as if he were going to die, and therefore he must take leave of all his friends; whereas in following Christ, he might be more a comfort and blessing to them than if he had continued with them. (2) That he seemed to have his worldly concerns more upon his heart than would consist with a close attendance to his duty as a follower of Christ. He seemed to hanker after his relations and family concerns; they stuck to him. It may be he had bidden them farewell once, but Loth to depart bids oft farewell, and therefore he must bid them farewell once more, for they are at home at his house. (3) That he was willing to enter into a temptation from his purpose of following Christ. To go and bid them farewell that were at home at his house would be to expose himself to the strongest solicitations imaginable to alter his resolution; for they would all beg and pray that he would not leave them. Those that resolve to follow their Redeemer, must resolve that they will not so much as parley with their tempter.

2. The rebuke which Christ gave him for this request (v. 62): "No man, having put his hand to the plough, will look back, or look behind him, for then he makes balks with his plough, and the ground he ploughs is not fit to be sown; so thou, if thou hast a design to follow me, yet if thou lookest back to a worldly life again and hankerest after that, thou art not fit for the kingdom of God. Thou art not a sower fit to scatter the good seed of the kingdom if thou canst hold the plough no better." Ploughing is in order to sowing. Those are not fit to be employed in sowing who know not how to break up the fallow ground, but, when they have laid their hand to the plough, upon every occasion look back and think of quitting it. Looking back inclines to drawing back, and drawing back is to perdition. Those are not fit for heaven, who, having set their faces heavenward, face about. But he, and he only, that endures to the end, shall be saved.

CHAP. X

I. The ample commission which Christ gave to the seventy disciples to preach the gospel, and to confirm it by miracles; and the full instructions he gave them, ver. 1–16. II. The report which the seventy disciples made, and his discourse thereupon, ver. 17–24. III. Christ's discourse with a lawyer concerning the way to heaven, and the instructions Christ gave him by a parable to look upon every one as his neighbour, ver. 25–37. IV. Christ's entertainment at Martha's house, the reproof he gave to her for her care about the world, and his commendation of Mary, ver. 38–42.

Verses 1–16

We have here the sending forth of seventy disciples, two and two. This is not taken notice of by the other evangelists: but the instructions here given them are much the same with those given to the twelve.

I. Their number: they were seventy. As in the choice of twelve apostles Christ has an eye to the twelve patriarchs, the twelve tribes, and the twelve princes of those tribes, so here he seems to have an eye to the seventy elders of Israel.

1. We are glad to find that Christ had so many followers fit to be sent forth; his labour was not altogether in vain, though he met with much opposition. These seventy, though they did not attend him so closely and constantly as the twelve did, were nevertheless the constant hearers of his doctrine, and witnesses of his miracles, and believed in him. These seventy are those of whom Peter speaks as "the men who companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us," and were part of the one hundred and twenty there spoken of, Acts i. 15, 21. Many of those that were the companions of the apostles, whom we read of in the Acts and the Epistles, we may suppose, were of these seventy disciples.

2. We are glad to find there was work for so many ministers, hearers for so many preachers: thus the grain of mustard-seed began to grow, and the savour of the leaven to diffuse itself in the meal.

II. Their work and business: He sent them two and two, that they might strengthen and encourage one another. He sent them, not to all the cities of Israel, as he did the twelve, but only to every city and place whither he himself would come (v. 1), as his harbingers. Two things they were ordered to do, the same that Christ did wherever he came: 1. They must heal the sick (v. 9), heal them in the name of Jesus, which would make people long to see this Jesus, and ready to entertain him whose name was so powerful. 2. They must publish the approach of the kingdom of God: The kingdom of God is come nigh to you. It is good to be made sensible of our advantages and opportunities, that we may lay hold of them. When the kingdom of God comes nigh us, it concerns us to go forth to meet it.

III. The instructions he gives them.

1. They must set out with prayer (v. 2). They must be duly affected with the necessities of the souls of men. They must look about, and see how great the harvest was. There was corn ready to shed and be lost for want of hands to gather it in. They must likewise be concerned that the labourers were so few. It is common for tradesmen not to care how few there are of their own trade; but Christ would have the labourers in his vineyard reckon it a matter of complaint when the labourers are few. They must earnestly desire to receive their mission from God, that he would send them forth as labourers into his harvest, and that he would send others forth; for, if God send them forth, they may hope he will go along with them and give them success.

2. They must set out with an expectation of trouble and persecution: "Behold, I send you forth as lambs among wolves; but go your ways. Your enemies will be as wolves. But you must be as lambs, peaceable and patient, though made an easy prey of." It would have been very hard thus to be sent forth as sheep among wolves, if he had not endued them with his spirit and courage.

3. They must not encumber themselves, as if they were going a long voyage, but depend upon God and their friends to provide: "Carry neither a purse for money, nor a scrip or knapsack for clothes or victuals, nor new shoes (as before to the twelve, ch. ix. 3); and salute no man by the way." (1) They must go as men in haste, must not hinder or retard themselves with needless ceremonies or compliments. (2) They must go as men of business, business that relates to another world, and therefore must not entangle themselves with conversation about secular affairs. (3) They must go as serious men.

4. They must show, not only their goodwill, but God's goodwill, to all to whom they came, v. 5, 6.

(1) The charge given them was, Whatsoever house they entered into, they must say, Peace be to this house. Here, [1] They are supposed to enter into private houses; for, being not admitted into the synagogues, they were forced to preach where they could have liberty. And, as their public preaching was driven into houses, so thither they carried it. Christ's church was at first very much a church in the house. [2] They are instructed to say, "Peace be to this house. Salute no man by the way in compliment, but to those into whose house ye enter, say, Peace be to you, with seriousness and in reality." Christ's ministers go into all the world, to say, in Christ's name, Peace be to you. We are to propose peace to all, to preach peace by Jesus Christ, peace on earth, and to invite the children of men to come and take the benefit of it. We are to pray for peace to all.

(2) The success was to be different, according to the different dispositions of those whom they preached to and prayed for. According as the inhabitants were sons of peace or not, so their peace should or should not rest upon the house. "You will meet with some that are the sons of peace, that are ready to admit the word of the gospel in the light and love of it. As to those, your peace shall find them out and rest upon them; your prayers for them shall be heard, the promises of the gospel shall be confirmed to them. You will meet with others that are no ways disposed to hear or heed your message, whole houses that have not one son of peace in them." Now it is certain that our peace shall not come upon them. But it shall return to us again; that is, we shall have the comfort of having done our duty to God and discharged our trust. Our peace shall return to us again, not only to be enjoyed by ourselves, but to be communicated to others, them that are sons of peace.

5. They must receive the kindnesses of those that should entertain them and bid them welcome, v. 7, 8. "Those that receive the gospel will receive you that preach it, and give you entertainment." (1) "Be not shy; do not suspect your welcome, nor be afraid of being troublesome, but eat and drink heartily such things as they give. You will deserve it, for the labourer is worthy of his hire, and it is not an act of charity, but of justice, in those who are taught in the word to communicate to those that teach them." (2) "Be not nice and curious in your diet: Eat and drink such things as they give (v. 7), such things as are set before you, v. 8. Be thankful for plain food, and do not find fault, though it be not dressed according to art." It ill becomes Christ's disciples to be desirous of dainties. Probably, Christ here refers to the traditions of the elders about their meat, but Christ would not have them to regard those things, but eat what was given them, asking no question for conscience' sake.

6. They must denounce the judgments of God against those who should reject them and their message: "If you enter into a city, and they do not receive you, leave them, v. 10. If they will not give you welcome into their houses, do you give them warning in their streets." He orders them to (ch. ix. 5) do as he had ordered the apostles to do: "Say to them: Even the dust of your city, which cleaveth on us, we do wipe off against you, v. 11. From them do not receive any kindnesses at all, be not beholden to them." It shall be a witness for Christ's messengers that they had been there according to their Master's order; tender and refusal were a discharge of their trust. "But tell them plainly, and bid them be sure of it, The kingdom of God is come nigh to you. Here is a fair offer made you; if you have not the benefit of it, it is your own fault. Now that the kingdom of God is come nigh to you, if you will not come up to it, and come into it, your sin will be inexcusable." The fairer offers we have of grace and life by Christ, the more we shall have to answer for another day, if we slight these offers: It shall be more tolerable for Sodom than for that city, v. 12. The Sodomites indeed rejected the warning given them by Lot; but rejecting the gospel is a more heinous crime.

Upon this occasion, the evangelist repeats,

(1) The particular doom of those cities wherein most of Christ's mighty works were done, which we had, Matt. xi. 20, &c. [1] They enjoyed greater privileges. Christ's mighty works were done in them. They were hereby exalted to heaven. They were brought as near heaven as external means could bring them. [2] God's design in favouring them thus was to bring them to repentance and reformation of life, to sit in sackcloth and ashes. [3] Their frustrating this design, and their receiving the grace of God therein in vain. It is implied that they repented not; they did not bring forth fruits agreeable to the advantages they enjoyed. [4] There was reason to think, morally speaking, that, if Christ had gone to Tyre and Sidon, Gentile cities, they would have repented long ago, so speedy would their repentance have been, and that in sackcloth and ashes, so deep would it have been. [5] The doom of those who thus receive the grace of God in vain will be very fearful. They that were thus exalted, not making use of their elevation, will be thrust down to hell. [6] In the day of judgment Tyre and Sidon will fare better, and it will be more tolerable for them than for these cities.

(2) The general rule which Christ would go by, as to those to whom he sent his ministers: He will reckon himself treated according as they treated his ministers, v. 16. "He that heareth you, heareth me. He that despiseth you doth in effect despise me, nay, he despiseth him that sent me." And they who despise the faithful ministers of Christ, and turn their backs upon their ministry, will be reckoned with as despisers of God and Christ.

Verses 17–24

I. What account they gave him of the success of their expedition: They returned again with joy (v. 17); not complaining of the fatigue of their journeys, but rejoicing in their success, especially in casting out unclean spirits: Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name. They give Christ the glory of this: It is through thy name. All our victories over Satan are obtained by power derived from Jesus Christ. We must in his name enter the lists with our spiritual enemies. If the work be done in his name, the honour is due to his name. They speak of it with an air of exultation: Even the devils are subject to us. If devils are subject to us, what can stand before us?

II. How he received this account.

1. He confirmed what they said, as agreeing with his own observation (v. 18): I saw Satan fall as lightning from heaven. Satan and his kingdom fell before the preaching of the gospel. He falls as lightning falls from heaven, so suddenly, so irrecoverably. Satan falls from heaven when he falls from the throne in men's hearts. And Christ foresaw that the preaching of the gospel would wherever it went pull down Satan's kingdom. Now is the prince of this world cast out.

2. He repeated, ratified, and enlarged their commission: Behold I give you power to tread on serpents, v. 19. They had employed their power vigorously against Satan, and now Christ entrusts them with greater power. (1) An offensive power, power to tread on serpents and scorpions, devils and malignant spirits, the old serpent. As the devils have now been subject to you, so they shall still be. (2) A defensive power: "Nothing shall by any means hurt you; not serpents nor scorpions. If wicked men be as serpents to you, and you dwell among those scorpions, you may despise their rage, and tread upon it. They may hiss, but they cannot hurt."

3. He directed them to turn their joy into the right channel (v. 20): "Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you. Do not rejoice in this only, or in this chiefly, but rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven, because you are the children of God through faith." Christ could tell them that their names were written in heaven, for it is the Lamb's book of life that they are written in. Power to become the children of God is to be valued more than a power to work miracles; for we read of those who did in Christ's name cast out devils, and yet will be disowned by Christ in the great day. But they whose names are written in heaven shall never perish; they are Christ's sheep, to whom he will give eternal life. Holy love is a more excellent way than speaking with tongues.

4. He offered up a solemn thanksgiving to his Father, v. 21, 22. This we had before (Matt. xi. 25–27), only here it is prefixed that in that hour Jesus rejoiced. In that hour in which he saw Satan fall, in that hour he rejoiced. Christ's joy was a solid substantial joy, an inward joy: he rejoiced in spirit. Before he applied himself to thank his Father, he stirred up himself to rejoice; for, as thankful praise is the genuine language of holy joy, so holy joy is the root and spring of thankful praise. Two things he gives thanks for:

(1) For what was revealed by the Father through the Son: I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, v. 21. Now that which he gives thanks for is, [1] That the counsels of God concerning man's reconciliation to himself were revealed to some of the children of men, who might be fit also to teach others; he has revealed that which had been kept secret from the beginning of the world. [2] That they were revealed to babes, to those who were but children in understanding, till God by his Spirit elevated their faculties. We have reason to thank God, not so much for the honour he has hereby put upon babes, as for the honour he has hereby done himself in perfecting strength out of weakness. [3] That, at the same time when he revealed them unto babes, he hid them from the wise and prudent, the Gentile philosophers, the Jewish rabbin. He did not reveal the things of the gospel to them, nor employ them in preaching up his kingdom. Paul indeed was bred a scholar among the wise and prudent; but he became a babe when he became an apostle, and made neither show nor use of any other knowledge than that of Christ and him crucified, 1 Cor. ii. 2, 4. [4] That God herein acted by way of sovereignty: Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. If God gives his grace and the knowledge of his son to some that are less likely, and does not give it to others whom we should think better able to deliver it with advantage, this must satisfy. He chooses to entrust the dispensing of his gospel in the hands of those who with a divine energy will give it the setting on, rather than in theirs who with human art will give it the setting off.

(2) For what was secret between the Father and the Son, v. 22. [1] The vast confidence that the Father puts in the Son: All things are delivered to me of my Father. In him all fulness must dwell, and from him it must be derived: he is the great trustee that manages all the concerns of God's kingdom. [2] The good understanding that there is between the Father and the Son: No man knows who the Son is but the Father, nor who the Father is but the Son, and he to whom the Son by the Spirit will reveal him.

5. He told his disciples how well it was for them that they had these things revealed to them, v. 23, 24. He turned to his disciples, designing to make them sensible how much it was for their happiness, that they knew the mysteries of the kingdom and were employed to lead others into the knowledge of them. (1) What a step it is towards something better. Though the bare knowledge of these things is not saving, yet it puts us in the way of salvation: Blessed are the eyes which see the things which we see. (2) What a step it is above those that went before them: "Many prophets and righteous men" (so it is in Matt. xiii. 17), "many prophets and kings" (so it is here), "have desired to see and hear those things which you are daily and intimately conversant with, and have not seen and heard them." The honour and happiness of the New Testament saints far exceed those even of the prophets and kings of the Old Testament. The general ideas which the Old Testament saints had of the graces and glories of the Messiah's kingdom, made them wish a thousand times that they might see the substance of those things of which they had faint shadows.

Verses 25–37

We have here Christ's discourse with a lawyer about some points of conscience, which we are all concerned to be rightly informed in, and are so here, from Christ.

I. We are concerned to know what that good is which we should do in this life, in order to our attaining eternal life. A question to this purport was proposed to our Saviour by a certain lawyer, only with a design to try him, v. 25. The lawyer stood up, and asked him, Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life? If Christ had anything peculiar to prescribe, by this question he would get it out of him; if not, he would expose his doctrine as needless; or, perhaps, he had no malicious design against Christ, only he was willing to have a little talk with him, just as people go to church to hear what the minister will say. This was a good question: What shall I do to inherit eternal life? But it lost all its goodness when it was proposed with an ill design. It is not enough to speak of the things of God, and to enquire about them, but we must do it with a suitable concern.

1. How Christ turned him over to the divine law. Though he knew the thoughts and intents of his heart, he did not answer him according to the folly of that, but according to the wisdom and goodness of the question he asked. He answered him with a question. What is written in the law? How readest thou? v. 26. Christ will catechize him, and make him know himself. The studies of his profession would inform him; let him practise according to his knowledge, and he should not come short of eternal life. It will be of great use to us, in our way to heaven, to consider what is written in the law, and what we read there. We must have recourse to our bibles, to the law, as it is now in the hand of Christ, and walk in the way that is shown us there. Having it written, it is our duty to read it, to read it with understanding so that, when there is occasion, we may be able to tell what is written in the law, and how we read.

2. What a good account he gave of the law, of the principal commandments of the law. He did not, like a Pharisee, refer himself to the tradition of the elders, but fastened upon the two first and great commandments of the law, which included all the rest, v. 27. We must love God with all our hearts, must look upon him as the best of beings, in himself most amiable, and infinitely perfect and excellent. Our love to him must be sincere, hearty, and fervent; it must be a superlative love, a love that is as strong as death, but an intelligent love. It must be an entire love; he must have our whole souls, and must be served with all that is within us. We must love our neighbours as ourselves, which we shall easily do, if we, as we ought to do, love God better than ourselves. We must do all the good we can in the world and no hurt, and must fix it as a rule to ourselves to do to others as we would they should do to us; and this is to love our neighbour as ourselves.

3. Christ's approbation of what he said, v. 28. What he said that was good Christ commended: Thou hast answered right. Christ himself fastened upon these as the two great commandments of the law (Matt. xxii. 37). So far is right; but the hardest part of this work yet remains: "This do, and thou shalt live; thou shalt inherit eternal life."

4. His care to avoid the conviction which was now ready to fasten upon him. When Christ said, This do, and thou shalt live, he began to be aware that Christ intended to draw from him an acknowledgment that he had not done this. He was willing to justify himself, and therefore cared not for carrying on that discourse. Many ask good questions with a design rather to justify themselves than to inform themselves, rather proudly to show what is good in them than humbly to see what is bad in them.

II. We are concerned to know who is our neighbour. This is another of this lawyer's queries. As to loving God, he was willing to say no more of it; but, as to his neighbour, he was sure that there he had come up to the rule, for he had always been very kind and respectful to all about him. Now observe,

1. What was the corrupt notion of the Jewish teachers in this matter. "Where he saith, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, he excepts all Gentiles, for they are not our neighbours, but those only that are of our own nation and religion." If they saw a Gentile in danger of death, they thought themselves under no obligation to help to save his life.

2. How Christ corrected this inhuman notion, and showed, by a parable, that whomsoever we have need to receive kindness from, and find ready to show us the kindness we need, we cannot but look upon as our neighbour.

(1) The parable itself, which represents to us a poor Jew in distressed circumstances, succoured and relieved by a good Samaritan. Let us see here,

[1] How he was abused by his enemies. The honest man was travelling peaceably upon his lawful business in the road, and it was a great road that led from Jerusalem to Jericho, v. 30. Probably it happened lately, just as it is here related. This poor man fell among thieves. They were very barbarous; they not only took his money, but stripped him of his clothes, and they wounded him, and left him half dead, ready to die of his wounds. What reason have we to thank God for our preservation from perils by robbers!

[2] How he was slighted by those who should have been his friends, one a priest and the other a Levite, men of professed sanctity, whose offices obliged them to tenderness and compassion, who ought to have taught others their duty in such a case as this. Many of the courses of the priests had their residence in Jericho, and thence came up to Jerusalem, and so back again, which occasioned abundance of passing and repassing of priests that way, and Levites their attendants. They came this way, and saw the poor wounded man. The Levite not only saw him, but came and looked on him, v. 32. But they passed by on the other side; when they saw his case, they got as far off him as ever they could.

[3] How he was succoured and relieved by a stranger, a certain Samaritan, of that nation which of all others the Jews most despised and detested and would have no dealings with. This man had some humanity in him, v. 33. The priest had his heart hardened against one of his own people, but the Samaritan had his opened towards one of another people. When he saw him he had compassion on him. Though he was a Jew, he was a man, and a man in misery, and the Samaritan has learned to honour all men; and therefore pities him, as he himself would desire and expect to be pitied in the like case. The compassion of this Samaritan was not an idle compassion; but, when he drew out his soul, he reached forth his hand also to this poor needy creature. See how friendly this good Samaritan was. He went to the poor man, whom the priest and Levite kept at a distance from. He did the surgeon's part, for want of a better. He bound up his wounds, making use of his own linen, it is likely, for that purpose; and poured in oil and wine; wine to wash the wound, and oil to mollify it, and close it up. He did all he could as one whose heart bled with them. He set him on his own beast, and went on foot himself, and brought him to an inn. We suppose this Samaritan went upon business; but he understood that both his own business and God's sacrifice too must give place to such an act of mercy as this. He took care of him in the inn, got him to bed, had food for him that was proper, and due attendance, and, it may be, prayed with him. As if he had been his own child, when he left him next morning, he left money with the landlord, and passed his word for what he should spend more. Twopence of their money would go a great way; however, here it was an earnest of satisfaction to the full of all demands. All this was kind and generous, and as much as one could have expected from a friend or a brother; and yet here it is done by a stranger and foreigner.

Now this parable is applicable to another purpose than that for which it was intended; and does excellently set forth the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards sinful miserable man. We were like this poor distressed traveller. The law of Moses passes by on the other side, as having neither pity nor power to help us; but then comes the blessed Jesus, that good Samaritan; he has compassion on us. He takes care of us. This magnifies the riches of his love, and obliges us all to say, "How much are we indebted, and what shall we render?"

(2) The application of the parable. [1] The truth contained in it is extorted from the lawyer's own mouth. Saith Christ, "Which of these three was neighbour to him that fell among thieves (v. 36). Which of these did the neighbour's part?" To this the lawyer would not answer, "Doubtless, the Samaritan was"; but, "He that showed mercy on him; doubtless, he was a good neighbour to him." [2] The duty inferred from it is pressed home upon the lawyer's own conscience: Go, and do thou likewise. If a Samaritan does well that helps a distressed Jew, certainly a Jew does not well if he refuses in like manner to help a distressed Samaritan. "And therefore go thou and do as the Samaritan did, whenever occasion offers: show mercy to those that need thy help, and do it freely, and with concern and compassion, though they be not of thy own nation." This lawyer thought to have puzzled Christ himself; but Christ sends him to school to a Samaritan, to learn his duty: "Go, and do like him." It is the duty of everyone of us to succour, help, and relieve all that are in distress and necessity, and of lawyers particularly.

Verses 38–42

I. The entertainment which Martha gave to Christ and his disciples at her house, v. 38.

1. Christ's coming to the village where Martha lived: As they went he entered into a certain village. This village was Bethany, nigh to Jerusalem. Christ honoured the country-villages with his presence and favour, and not the great and populous cities only; for, as he chose privacy, so he countenanced poverty.

2. His reception at Martha's house: A certain woman, named Martha, received him into her house, and made him welcome. There were some who were Christ's particular friends, whom he loved more than his other friends, and them he visited most frequently. He loved this family (John xi. 5), and often invited himself to them. It is called Martha's house, for, probably, she was a widow, and was the housekeeper. Though at this time it was grown dangerous to entertain him, especially so near Jerusalem, yet she cared not what hazard she ran for his name's sake. Though there were many that rejected him, and would not entertain him, yet there was one that would bid him welcome.

II. The attendance which Mary, the sister of Martha, gave upon the word of Christ, v. 20. 1. She heard his word. It seems, our Lord Jesus, as soon as he came into Martha's house, addressed himself to his great work of preaching the gospel. A good sermon is never the worse for being preached in a house. Since Christ is forward to speak, we should be swift to hear. She sat to hear, which denotes a close attention. Her mind was composed, and she resolved not to catch a word now and then, but to receive all that Christ delivered. If we sit with him at his feet now, we shall sit with him on his throne shortly.

III. The care of Martha about her domestic affairs: But Martha was cumbered about much serving (v. 40), and that was the reason why she was not where Mary was. Housekeepers know what care and bustle there must be when a great entertainment is to be made. Observe here,

1. Something commendable, which must not be overlooked. Here was a commendable respect to our Lord Jesus. It was not for ostentation, but purely to testify her goodwill to him, that she made this entertainment. Here was a commendable care of her household affairs. It is the duty of those who have the charge of families to look well to the ways of their household. The affectation of state and the love of ease make many families neglected.

2 Here was something culpable. She was for much serving. Her heart was upon it, to have a very sumptuous and splendid entertainment. She was in care, concerning much attendance. It does not become the disciples of Christ to affect much serving; what need is there of much serving, when much less will serve? She was cumbered about it; she was just distracted with it. Note, Whatever cares the providence of God casts upon us we must not be cumbered with them. Care is good and duty; but cumber is sin and folly. She was then cumbered about much serving when she should have been with her sister, sitting at Christ's feet to hear his word.

IV. The complaint which Martha made to Christ against her sister Mary (v. 40): "Lord, dost thou not care that my sister has left me to serve alone? Bid her come and help me."

1. This complaint of Martha's may be considered as a discovery of her worldliness; it was the language of her inordinate care and cumber. The inordinacy of worldly cares and pursuits is often the occasion of disturbance in families and of strife and contention among relations. Martha, being angry at her sister, appealed to Christ, and would have him say that she did well to be angry. Lord, dost thou not care that my sister has left me to serve alone? When Martha was caring, she must have Mary, and Christ and all, to care too, or else she is not pleased. Those are not always in the right that are most forward to appeal to God; we must therefore take heed, lest at any time we expect that Christ should espouse our unjust and groundless quarrels. The cares which he casts upon us we may cheerfully cast upon him, but not those which we foolishly draw upon ourselves.

2. It may be considered as a discouragement of Mary's piety and devotion. Her sister should have commended her for it, but, instead of this, she condemns her as wanting in her duty. It is no strange thing for those that are zealous in religion to meet, not only with opposition from enemies, but with blame and censure from their friends.

V. The reproof which Christ gave to Martha for her inordinate care, v. 41. Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things, whereas but one thing is needful.

1. He reproved her, though he was at this time her guest. As many as Christ loves he rebukes and chastens. Even those that are dear to Christ, if anything be amiss in them, shall be sure to hear of it.

2. When he reproved her, he called her by her name, Martha. He repeated her name, Martha, Martha; he speaks as one in earnest, and deeply concerned for her welfare. Those that are entangled in the cares of this life are not easily disentangled.

3. That which he reproved her for was her being careful and troubled about many things. Christ reproves her, both for the intenseness of her care ("Thou art careful and troubled, divided and disturbed by thy care"), and for the extensiveness of it, "about many things. Poor Martha, thou hast many things to fret at, and this puts thee out of humour, whereas less ado would serve." Inordinate care or trouble about many things in this world is a common fault among Christ's disciples. If they fret for no just cause, it is just with him to order them something to fret at.

4. That which aggravated the sin and folly of her care was that but one thing is needful. The one thing needful is certainly meant of that which Mary made her choice—sitting at Christ's feet, to hear his word. She was troubled about many things, when she should have applied herself to one; godliness unites the heart, which the world had divided. The many things she was troubled about were needless, while the one thing she neglected was needful. Martha's care and work were good in their proper season and place; but now she had something else to do, which was unspeakably more needful. She expected Christ to have blamed Mary for not doing as she did, but he blamed her for not doing as Mary did. The day will come when Martha will wish she had set where Mary did.

VI. Christ's approbation and commendation of Mary for her serious piety: Mary hath chosen the good part.

1. She had justly given the preference to that which best deserved it; for one thing is needful, this one thing that she has done. Serious godliness is a needful thing, it is the one thing needful. Nothing but this will go with us into another world.

2. She had herein wisely done well for herself. Christ justified Mary against her sister's clamours. Sooner or later, Mary's choice will be justified, and all those who make that choice, and abide by it. But this was not all; he applauded her for her wisdom: She hath chosen the good part; for she chose to be with Christ, and took a better way of honouring Christ and of pleasing him, by receiving his word into her heart, than Martha did by providing for his entertainment in her house. (1) A part with Christ is a good part; it is a part for the soul and eternity. (2) It is a part that shall never be taken away from those that have it. Nothing shall separate us from the love of Christ, and our part in that love. Men and devils cannot take it away from us, and God and Christ will not. (3) It is the wisdom and duty of everyone of us to choose this good part. Mary was at her choice whether she would partake with Martha in her care, and get the reputation of a fine housekeeper, or sit at the feet of Christ and approve herself a zealous disciple; and, by her choice in this particular, Christ judges of her general choice.

CHAP. XI

I. Christ teaches his disciples to pray, ver. 1–13. II. The blasphemous imputation of the Pharisees, who charged him with casting out devils by confederacy with Beelzebub, ver. 14–26. III. He shows the honour of obedient disciples to be greater than that of his own mother, ver. 27, 28. IV. He upbraids the men of that generation for their infidelity and obstinacy, ver. 29–36. V. He severely reproves the Pharisees and lawyers, ver. 37–54.

Verses 1–13

Prayer is one of the great laws of natural religion. One great design therefore of Christianity is to assist us in prayer, to enforce the duty upon us, to instruct us in it, and encourage us to expect advantage by it.

I. We find Christ himself praying in a certain place. This evangelist has taken particular notice of Christ's praying often, more than any other of the evangelists: when he was baptized (ch. iii. 21), he was praying; he withdrew into the wilderness, and prayed (ch. v. 16); he went out into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer (ch. vi. 12); he was alone praying (ch. ix. 18); soon after, he went up into a mountain to pray, and as he prayed he was transfigured (ch. ix. 28, 29); and here he was praying in a certain place.

II. His disciples applied themselves to him for direction in prayer. When he was praying, they asked, Lord, teach us to pray. They came to him with this request, when he ceased; for they would not disturb him when he was at prayer. One of his disciples said, Lord, teach us. Though Christ is apt to teach, yet he will for this be enquired of.

1. Their request is, "Lord, teach us to pray." It becomes the disciples of Christ to apply themselves to him for instruction in prayer. Lord, teach us to pray, is itself a good prayer, and a very needful one, for it is a hard thing to pray well; and it is Jesus Christ only that can teach us, by his word and Spirit, how to pray. "Give me a mouth and wisdom in prayer, that I may speak as I ought; teach me what I shall say."

2. Their plea is, "As John also taught his disciples. He took care to instruct his disciples in this necessary duty, and we would be taught as they were." Whereas the Jews' prayers were generally adorations, and praises of God, and doxologies, John taught his disciples such prayers as were more filled up with petitions and requests. "Now, Lord, teach us this, to be added to those benedictions of the name of God which we have been accustomed to from our childhood." Christ did there teach them a prayer consisting wholly of petitions, and even omitting the doxology which had been affixed; and the Amen.

III. Christ gave them direction, much the same as he had given them before in his sermon upon the mount, Matt. vi. 9, &c. They would find all their requests couched in these few words, and would be able, in words of their own, to expatiate and enlarge upon them.

1. There are some differences between the Lord's prayer in Matthew and in Luke. There is a difference in the fourth petition. In Matthew we pray, "Give us daily bread this day": here, "Give it us day by day. Give us each day the bread which our bodies require, as they call for it." Let us have bread today for today, and to*morrow* for to*morrow*; for thus we may be kept in a continual dependence upon God, as children upon their parents, and may find ourselves under fresh obligations to do the work of every day in the day, according as the duty of the day requires, because we have from God the supplies of every day in the day, according as the necessity of the day requires. Here is likewise some difference in the fifth petition. In Matthew it is, Forgive us our debts, as we forgive: here it is, Forgive us our sins. For we forgive. This is a very necessary qualification for forgiveness, and, if God have wrought it in us, we may plead that work of his grace for the enforcing of our petitions for the pardon of our sins: "Lord, forgive us, for thou hast thyself inclined us to forgive others." There is another addition here; we plead not only in general, We forgive our debtors, but in particular, "We profess to forgive everyone that is indebted to us." Here also the doxology in the close is wholly omitted, and the Amen. He left a vacuum here, to be filled up by a doxology more peculiar to the Christian institutes, ascribing glory to Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

2. Yet it is, for substance, the same; and we shall therefore here only gather up some general lessons from it.

(1) That in prayer we ought to come to God as children to a Father, a common Father to us and all mankind.

(2) That at the same time, and in the same petitions, which we address to God for ourselves, we should take in with us all the children of men. A rooted principle of catholic charity should go along with us throughout this prayer, which is so worded as to be accommodated to that noble principle.

(3) That in order to the confirming of the habit of heavenly-mindedness in us, we should, with an eye of faith look heavenward, and view the God we pray to as our Father in heaven.

(4) That in prayer we must seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, by ascribing honour to his name, his holy name, and power to his government. O that both the one and the other may be more manifested.

(5) That the principles and practices of the unseen world (which therefor by faith only we are apprized of), are the great original—the ἀρχέτυπον, to which we should desire that the principles and practices of this lower world may be more conformable. Those words, As in heaven, so on earth, refer to all the first three petitions.

(6) That those who faithfully and sincerely mind the kingdom of God may humbly hope that all other things shall be added to them, and they may in faith pray for them. If our first chief desire and care be that God's name may be sanctified, his kingdom come, and his will be done, we may then come boldly to the throne of grace for our daily bread.

(7) That in our prayers for temporal blessings we must moderate our desires, and confine them to a competency. The expression here used of day by day is the very same with our daily bread.

(8) That sins are debts which we are daily contracting, and which therefore we should every day pray for the forgiveness of. Every day adds to the score of our guilt, and it is a miracle of mercy that we have so much encouragement given us to come every day to the throne of grace, to pray for the pardon of our sins of daily infirmity, God multiplies to pardon beyond seventy times seven.

(9) That we have no reason to expect that God would forgive our sins against him, if we do not sincerely forgive those that have at any time affronted us or been injurious to us.

(10) That temptations to sin should be as much dreaded and deprecated by us as ruin by sin. We must be as earnest with God that we may not be led into it as that we may not be led by that to sin, and by sin to ruin.

(11) That God is to be depended upon for our deliverance from all evil; and we should pray, not only that we may not be left to ourselves to run into evil, but that we may not be left to Satan to bring evil upon us.

IV. He stirs up and encourages importunity, fervency, and constancy, in prayer, by showing,

1. That importunity will go far in our dealings with men, v. 5–8. Suppose a man, upon a sudden emergency, goes to borrow a loaf or two of bread of a neighbour, at an unseasonable time of night, not for himself, but for his friend that came unexpectedly to him. His neighbour will be loth to accommodate him, for he has wakened him with his knocking, and put him out of humour, and he has a great deal to say in his excuse. But his neighbour will have no nay, therefore he continues knocking still, and tells him he will do so till he has what he comes for; so that he must give it to him, to be rid of him: He will rise and give him as many as he needs, because of his importunity. We prevail with men by importunity because they are displeased with it, but with God because he is pleased with it. Now this similitude may be of use to us to direct us in prayer. (1) We must come to God with boldness and confidence for what we need, as a man does to the house of his neighbour or friend, who, he knows, loves him, and is inclined to be kind to him. (2) We must come for bread, for that which is needful. (3) We must come to him by prayer for others as well as for ourselves. This man did not come for bread for himself, but for his friend. We cannot come to God upon a more pleasing errand than when we come to him for grace to enable us to do good. (4) We may come with the more boldness to God in a strait, if it be a strait that we have not brought ourselves into by our own folly and carelessness, but Providence has led us into it. This man would not have wanted bread if his friend had not come in unexpectedly. The care which Providence casts upon us, we may with cheerfulness cast back upon Providence. If importunity could prevail thus with a man who was angry at it, much more with a God who is infinitely more kind, and is not angry at our importunity, but accepts it. If he do not answer our prayers presently, yet he will in due time, if we continue to pray.

2. That God has promised to give us what we ask of him. We have not only the goodness of nature to take comfort from, but the word which he has spoken (v. 9, 10): "Ask, and it shall be given you." I say unto you. We have it from Christ's own mouth. We must not only ask, but we must seek, must second our prayers with our endeavours; and, in asking and seeking, we must continue pressing, still knocking at the same door, and we shall at length prevail. Every one that asketh receiveth, even the meanest saint that asks in faith. When we ask of God those things which Christ has here directed us to ask, that his name may be sanctified, that his kingdom may come, and his will be done, in these requests we must be importunate.

V. He gives us both instruction and encouragement in prayer from the consideration of our relation to God as a Father.

1. An appeal to the bowels of earthly fathers: "Let any of you that is a father tell me, if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? If he ask a fish will he for a fish give him a serpent? Or, if he shall ask an egg for his supper (an egg and to bed), will he offer him a scorpion? You know you could not be so unnatural to your own children," v. 11, 12.

2. An application of this to the blessings of our heavenly Father (v. 13): If ye then, being evil, give good gifts to your children, much more shall God give you the Spirit. He shall give good things; so it is in Matthew. Observe,

(1) The direction he gives us what to pray for. We must ask for the Holy Spirit, not only as necessary in order to our praying well, but as inclusive of all the good things we are to pray for.

(2) The encouragement he gives us to hope that we shall speed in this prayer: Your heavenly Father will give. It is in his power to give the Spirit; he has all good things to bestow, wrapped up in that one; but that is not all, it is in his promise. If our earthly parents, though evil, be yet so kind, if they, though weak, be yet so knowing, that they not only give, but give with discretion, give what is best, much more will our heavenly Father give us his Holy Spirit.

Verses 14–26

The substance of these verses we had in Matt. xii. 22, &c. Christ is here giving a general proof of his divine mission, by a particular proof of his power over Satan. Here too he gives an earnest of the success of that undertaking. He is here casting out a devil that made the poor possessed man dumb: in Matthew we are told that he was blind and dumb. When the devil was forced out by the word of Christ, the dumb spoke immediately, and the lips were opened to show forth his praise.

I. Some were affected with this miracle. The people wondered; they admired the power of God.

II. Others were offended at it, and suggested that it was by virtue of a league with Beelzebub, the prince of the devils, that he did this, v. 15. Some, to corroborate this suggestion and confront the evidence of Christ's miraculous power, challenged him to give them a sign from heaven (v. 16), to confirm his doctrine. As if a sign from heaven could not have been given them as well by a compact and collusion with the prince of the power of the air, as the casting out of a devil. Obstinate infidelity will never be at a loss for something to say in its own excuse, though ever so frivolous and absurd. Christ here returns a full and direct answer in which he shows,

1. That it can by no means be imagined that such a subtle prince as Satan is should ever agree to measures that had such a direct tendency to his own overthrow, v. 17, 18. Jesus knew their thoughts, even when they industriously thought to conceal them, and he said, "You yourselves cannot but see the groundlessness of this charge; for it is an allowed maxim that no interest can stand that is divided against itself; not the more public interest of a kingdom, nor the private interest of a house or family; if either the one or the other be divided against itself, it cannot stand. Now, if Satan should thus be divided against himself, he would hasten his own overthrow."

2. That it was a very partial ill-natured thing for them to impute that in him to a compact with Satan which yet they applauded and admired in others that were of their own nation (v. 19): "By whom do your sons cast them out? Some of your own kindred, some of your own followers, have undertaken, in the name of the God of Israel, to cast out devils, and they were never charged with such a hellish combination." It is gross hypocrisy to condemn that in those who reprove us which yet we allow in those that flatter us.

3. That, in opposing the conviction of this miracle, they were enemies to themselves, for they thrust from them the kingdom of God (v. 20): "If I with the finger of God cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come upon you, and if you receive it not, it is at your peril." In Matthew it is by the Spirit of God, here by the finger of God. He needed not make bare his everlasting arm; that roaring lion, when he pleases, is crushed, like a moth, with a touch of a finger.

4. That his casting out devils was really the destroying of them and their power, v. 21, 22. When Christ cast out devils he was stronger than they, and could do it by force, and did it so as to ruin Satan's power. Now this is applicable to Christ's victories over Satan both in the world and in the hearts of particular persons. And so we may observe here,

(1) The miserable condition of an unconverted sinner. In his heart, which was fitted to be a habitation of God, the devil has his palace; and all the powers and faculties of the soul are his goods. The heart is a palace, a noble dwelling; but the unsanctified heart is the devil's palace. The devil, as a strong man armed, keeps this palace. All the prejudices with which he hardens men's hearts against truth and holiness are the strongholds which he erects for the keeping of his palace. There is a kind of peace in the palace of an unconverted soul, while the devil, as a strong man armed, keeps it. The sinner has a good opinion of himself, is very secure and merry; he flatters himself in his own eyes, and cries peace to himself. Before Christ appeared, all was quiet, because all went one way; but the preaching of the gospel disturbed the peace of the devil's palace.

(2) The wonderful change that is made in conversion. Satan is a strong man armed; but our Lord Jesus is stronger than he, see the manner of this victory: He comes upon him by surprise, when his goods are in peace and overcomes him. See the evidences of this victory. First, He takes from him all his armour wherein he trusted. Christ disarms him. When the power of sin and corruption in the soul is broken then Satan's armour is taken away. Secondly, He divides the spoils; he takes possession of them for himself. All the endowments of mind and body are now converted to Christ's service. Yet this is not all; he makes a distribution of them among his followers, and gives to all believers the benefit of that victory. Hence Christ infers that, since the whole drift of his doctrine and miracles was to break the power of the devil, it was the duty of all to join with him, to receive his gospel and come heartily into the interests of it; for otherwise they would justly be reckoned as siding with the enemy (v. 23): He that is not with me is against me.

5. That there was a vast difference between the devil's going out by compact and his being cast out by compulsion. Those out of whom Christ cast him he never entered into again, for so was Christ's charge (Mark ix. 25); whereas, if he had gone out, whenever he saw fit he would have made a re-entry, v. 24–26. Christ, as he gives a total, so he gives a final, defeat to the enemy. Here we have,

(1) The condition of a formal hypocrite, his bright side and his dark side. His heart still remains the devil's house, and yet [1] The unclean spirit is gone out. He was not driven out, but he went out, withdrew for a time, so that the man seemed not to be under the power of Satan as formerly. [2] The house is swept from common pollutions by a partial reformation. The house is swept, but it is not washed; the house must be washed, or it is none of his. Sweeping takes off only the loose dirt, while the sin that besets the sinner, is untouched. It is swept from the filth that lies open to the eye of the world, but it is not searched and ransacked for secret filthiness. It is swept, but the leprosy is in the wall. [3] The house is garnished with common gifts and graces. It is not furnished with any true grace, but garnished with the pictures of all graces. It is all paint and varnish, not real, not lasting. The house is garnished, but the property is not altered; it was never surrendered to Christ.

(2) Here is the condition of a final apostate, into whom the devil returns after he had gone out: Then goes he, and takes seven other spirits more wicked than himself (v. 26). These enter in without any difficulty or opposition; they are welcomed, and they dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Hypocrisy is the high road to apostasy. Where secret haunts of sin are kept up conscience is debauched, and the close hypocrite commonly proves an open apostate. The last state of such is worse than the first, in respect both of sin and punishment. Apostates are usually the worst of men; their consciences are seared, and their sins of all others the most aggravated. In the other world they will receive the greater damnation.

Verses 27, 28

We had not this passage in the other evangelists.

1. The applause which an affectionate, honest, well-meaning woman gave to our Lord Jesus, upon hearing his excellent discourses. This good woman admired them: As he spoke these things (v. 27), a certain woman of the company was so pleased that she could not forbear crying out, "Blessed is the womb that bore thee. Happy the woman that has thee for her son. I should have thought myself very happy to have been the mother of one that speaks as never man spoke, that has so much of the grace of heaven in him, and is so great a blessing to this earth." To all that believe the word of Christ the person of Christ is precious.

2. The occasion which Christ took from this to pronounce them more happy who are his faithful and obedient followers than she was who bore and nursed him. Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it, v. 28. This is intended partly as a check to her, for doting so much upon his bodily presence, partly as an encouragement to her to hope that she might be as happy as his own mother, if she would hear the word of God and keep it. Those only are truly blessed that hear it and keep it.

Verses 29–36

I. What is the sign we may expect from God for the confirmation of our faith. The great and most convincing proof of Christ's being sent of God was the resurrection of Christ from the dead.

1. A reproof to the people for demanding other signs than what had already been given them in great plenty: The people were gathered thickly together (v. 29), a vast crowd of them. Christ knew what brought such a multitude together; they came seeking a sign, they came to gaze, to have something to talk of when they went home.

2. A promise that yet there should be one sign more given them, even the sign of Jonas the prophet, which in Matthew is explained as meaning the resurrection of Christ. But, if this do not work upon them, let them look for nothing but utter ruin: The Son of man shall be a sign to this generation (v. 30), a sign speaking to them, though a sign spoken against by them.

3. A warning to them to improve this sign. The queen of Sheba would rise up in judgment against them, and condemn their unbelief, v. 31. She was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, and yet she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear his wisdom, not only to satisfy her curiosity, but to inform her mind; and, behold, a greater than Solomon is here. Yet these wretched Jews will give no manner of regard to what Christ says to them, though he be in the midst of them. The Ninevites would rise up in judgment against them (v. 32): They repented at the preaching of Jonas; but here is preaching which far exceeds that of Jonas, and yet none are startled by it, to turn from their evil way, as the Ninevites did.

II. What is the sign that God expects from us for the evidencing of our faith, and that is the serious practice of that religion which we profess to believe.

1. They had the light. For God, having lighted the candle of the gospel, did not put it in a secret place, or under a bushel; Christ did not preach in corners. It is a great privilege that the light of the gospel is put on a candlestick, so that all that come in may see it, and may see by it.

2. Having the light, their concern was to have the sight. Be the object ever so clear, if the organ be not right, we are never the better: The light of the body is the eye (v. 34) So the light of the soul is its power of discerning between good and evil, truth and falsehood. Now, according as this is, so the light of divine revelation is to us, and our benefit by it. (1) If this eye of the soul be single, if it see clear, if it aim at truth only, and seek it for its own sake, the whole body, that is, the whole soul, is full of light. If our understanding admits the gospel in its full light, it fills the soul, and it has enough to fill it. And if the soul be thus filled, having no part dark, then the whole soul shall be full of light. It was darkness itself, but is now light in the Lord, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light, v. 36. The gospel will come into those souls whose doors and windows are thrown open to receive it. (2) If the eye of the soul be evil, it is no wonder that the whole body, the whole soul, should be full of darkness, v. 34. The inference hence therefore is, Take heed that the light which is in thee be not darkness, v. 35. Be sincere in your enquiries after truth, and ready to receive the light, and love, and power of it; and not as the men of this generation to whom Christ preached, who never sincerely desired to know God's will, nor designed to do it, and therefore no wonder that they walked on in darkness.

Christ here says many of those things to a Pharisee and his guests, in a private conversation at table, which he afterwards said in a public discourse in the temple (Matt. 23); for what he said in public and private was of a piece.

I. Christ's going to dine with a Pharisee that very civilly invited him to his house (v. 37): As he spoke a certain Pharisee interrupted him with a request to him to come and dine with him. We know not the mind of this Pharisee; but, whatever it was, Christ knew it: if he meant ill, he shall know Christ does not fear him; if well, he shall know Christ is willing to do him good: so he went in, and sat down to meat. Christ's disciples must learn of him to be conversable, and not morose. Though we have need to be cautious what company we keep, yet we need not be rigid.

II. The offence which the Pharisee took at Christ for not washing before dinner, v. 38. He wondered that a man of his sanctity should sit down to meat, and not first wash his hands; the Pharisee himself and all his guests, no doubt, washing. The ceremonial law consisted in divers washings, but this was none of them, and therefore Christ would not practise it, though he knew that offence would be taken at his omitting it.

III. The sharp reproof which Christ gave to the Pharisees.

1. He reproves them for placing religion so much in those instances of it which are only external, and fall under the eye of man, while those were not only postponed, but quite expunged, which respect the soul, and fall under the eye of God, v. 39, 40. (1) The absurdity they were guilty of: "You Pharisees make clean the outside only, you wash your hands with water, but do not wash your hearts from wickedness." Those can never be reckoned cleanly servants that wash only the outside of the cup or the platter, and take no care to make clean the inside. The frame or temper of the mind in every religious service is as the inside of the cup and platter; the impurity of this infects the services. To live under the dominion of spiritual wickedness, is as great an affront to God as it would be for a servant to give the cup into his master's hand, clean wiped from all the dust on the outside, but within full of cobwebs and spiders. Ravening and wickedness are the dangerous damning sins of many who have made the outside of the cup clean from the more gross, and scandalous, and inexcusable sins of whoredom and drunkenness. (2) A particular instance of the absurdity of it, "Ye fools, did not he that made that which is without make that which is within also? (v. 40). Did not that God who in the law of Moses appointed divers ceremonial washings, appoint also that you should cleanse and purify your hearts? He who made laws for that which is without, did not he even in those laws further intend something within. Did not God, who made us these bodies, make us these souls also? Now, if he made both, he justly expects we should take care of both; and therefore not only wash the body, but wash the spirit, which he is the Father of, and get the leprosy in the heart cleansed?"

To this he subjoins a rule for making our creature-comforts clean to us (v. 41): "Instead of washing your hands before you go to meat, give alms of such things as you have, let the poor have their share out of them, and then all things are clean to you, and you may use them comfortably." Here is a plain allusion to the law of Moses, by which it was provided that certain portions of the increase of their land should be given to the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow; and, when that was done, what was reserved for their own use was clean to them. Deut. xxvi. 12–15. Then we can with comfort enjoy the gifts of God's bounty ourselves when we send portions to them for whom nothing is prepared. What we have is not our own, unless God have his dues out of it; and it is by liberality to the poor that we clear up to ourselves our liberty to make use of our creature-comforts.

2. He reproves them for laying stress upon trifles, and neglecting the weighty matters of the law, v. 42. Those laws which related only to the means of religion they were very exact in the observance of: Ye pay tithe of mint and rue, pay it in kind and to the full. By this they would gain a reputation with the people as strict observers of the law. Now Christ does not condemn them for being so exact in paying tithes (these things ought ye to have done), but for thinking that this would atone for the neglect of their greater duties. Those laws which relate to the essentials of religion they made nothing of: You pass over judgment and the love of God, you make no conscience of giving men their dues and God your hearts.

3. He reproves them for their pride and vanity (v. 43): "Ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues, and you love greetings in the markets." It is not sitting uppermost, or being greeted, that is reproved, but loving it.

4. He reproves them for their hypocrisy (v. 44): "You are as graves overgrown with grass, which therefore appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them, and so they contract the ceremonial pollution which by the law arose from the touch of a grave." These Pharisees were within full of abominations, as a grave of putrefaction; and yet they concealed it so artfully that it did not appear, so that they who conversed with them, and followed their doctrine, were infected with their corruptions and ill morals, and yet suspected no danger by them. The contagion insinuated itself, and was insensibly caught, and those that caught it thought themselves never the worse.

IV. The testimony which he bore also against the lawyers or scribes, who made it their business to expound the law, as the Pharisees did to observe the law.

1. There was one of that profession who resented what he said against the Pharisees (v. 45): "Master, thus saying thou reproachest us also." It is the folly of those who are wedded to their sins, and resolved not to part with them, to make an ill use of the faithful and friendly admonitions given them, which come from love, and to have their passions provoked by them as if they were intended for reproaches. This lawyer espoused the Pharisee's cause, and so made himself partaker of his sins.

2. Our Lord Jesus thereupon took them to task (v. 46): Woe unto you also, ye lawyers; and again (v. 52): Woe unto you, lawyers. They blessed themselves in the reputation they had among the people, but Christ denounced woes against them, for he sees not as man sees. Those who quarrel with the reproofs of others, and suspect them to be reproaches to them, do but get woes of their own by so doing.

(1) The lawyers are reproved for making the services of religion more burdensome to others, but more easy to themselves, than God had made them (v. 46): "You lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, but you yourselves touch them not with one of your fingers"; that is, [1] "You will not burden yourselves with them, nor be yourselves bound by those restraints with which you hamper others." [2] "You will not lighten them, you will not touch them, that is, either to repeal them or to dispense with them when you find them to be burdensome and grievous to the people." They would come in with both hands to dispense with a command of God, but not with a finger to mitigate the rigour of any of the traditions of the elders.

(2) They are reproved for pretending a veneration for the memory of the prophets whom their fathers killed, when yet they hated and persecuted those in their own day who were sent to them on the same errand, v. 47–49. [1] These hypocrites built the sepulchres of the prophets; that is, they erected monuments over their graves, in honour of them. They were not so superstitious as to enshrine their relics, or to think their devotions the more acceptable to God for being offered at the tombs of the martyrs; but, as if they owned themselves the children of the prophets, they repaired and beautified the monuments sacred to their pious memory. [2] Notwithstanding this, they had an inveterate enmity to those in their own day that came to them in the spirit and power of those prophets. For the Wisdom of God said that they would slay and persecute the prophets and apostles that would be sent them. The Wisdom of God would thus make trial of them by sending them prophets, to reprove them for their sins and warn them of the judgments of God. "I will send them prophets under the style and title of apostles, and these they shall not only contradict and oppose, but slay and persecute, and put to death." [3] Therefore God will justly put another construction upon their building the tombs of the prophets, and it shall be interpreted their allowing the deeds of their fathers (v. 45); the building of their sepulchres shall have this sense put upon it, that they resolved to keep them in their graves whom their fathers had hurried thither. [4] They must expect no other than to be reckoned with, as the fillers up of the measure of persecution, v. 50, 51. It shall all be required of this generation whose sin in persecuting Christ's apostles would exceed any of the sins of that kind that their fathers were guilty of. Their destruction by the Romans was so terrible that it might well be reckoned the completing of God's vengeance upon that persecuting nation.

(3) They are reproved for opposing the gospel of Christ, v. 52. They had not, according to the duty of their place, faithfully expounded to the people those scriptures of the Old Testament which pointed at the Messiah. Instead of that, they had perverted those texts by their corrupt glosses upon them, and this is called taking away the key of knowledge; instead of using that key for the people, and helping them to use it aright, they hid it from them; this is called, in Matthew, shutting up the kingdom of heaven against men, Matt. xxiii. 13. They themselves did not embrace the gospel of Christ, though by their acquaintance with the Old Testament they could not but know that the time was fulfilled, and the kingdom of God was at hand, and yet would not themselves enter into it. Them that without any guidance or assistance of theirs were entering in they did all they could to hinder and discourage, by threatening to cast them out of the synagogue. It is bad for people to be averse to revelation, but much worse to be adverse to it.

Lastly, In the close of the chapter we are told how spitefully and maliciously the scribes and Pharisees contrived to draw him into a snare, v. 53, 54. They could not bear those cutting reproofs which they must own to be just, as if, because his reproofs were warm, they hoped to stir him up to some intemperate heat and passion, so as to put him off his guard, they began to urge him vehemently, and to provoke him to speak of many things, laying wait for something which might serve the design they had of making him either odious to the people, or obnoxious to the government, or both. Faithful reprovers of sin must expect to have many enemies. That we may bear trials of this kind with patience, and get through them with prudence, let us consider him who endured such contradiction of sinners against himself.

CHAP. XII

In this chapter we have divers excellent discourses of our Saviour's upon various occasions, many of which are to the same purport with what we had in Matthew, and we need thus to have precept upon precept, line upon line. I. Christ warns his disciples to take heed of hypocrisy, and of cowardice, ver. 1–12. II. He gives a caution against covetousness, and illustrates that caution by a parable of a rich man suddenly cut off by death, ver. 13–21. III. He encourages his disciples to cast all their care upon God, ver. 22–34. IV. He stirs them up to watchfulness for their Master's coming, ver. 35–48. V. He bids them expect trouble and persecution, ver. 49–53. VI. He warns the people to observe and improve the day of their opportunities, ver. 54–59.

Verses 1–12

I. A vast auditory that was got together to hear Christ preach. The scribes and Pharisees sought to accuse him, but the people still admired him, attended on him, and did him honour. In the meantime (v. 1), while he was in the Pharisee's house, the people got together for an afternoon sermon, a sermon after dinner, after dinner with a Pharisee; and he would not disappoint them. Though in the morning sermon, when they were gathered thickly together (ch. xi. 29), he had severely reproved them, yet they renewed their attendance on him; so much better could the people bear their reproofs than the Pharisees theirs. The more the Pharisees strove to drive the people from Christ, the more flocking there was to him. Here was an innumerable multitude of people gathered together, so that they trode one upon another. It is a good sight to see people thus forward to hear the word. When the net is cast where there is such a multitude of fish, it may be hoped that some will be enclosed.

II. The instructions which he gave his followers.

1. He began with a caution against hypocrisy. This he said to his disciples first of all. These were his more peculiar charge, and therefore he particularly warned them as his beloved sons; they made more profession of religion than others, and hypocrisy in that was the sin they were most in danger of. Hypocrisy would be worse in them than in others. Christ's disciples were, for aught we know, the best men then in the world, yet they needed to be cautioned against hypocrisy. Christ said this to the disciples, in the hearing of this great multitude, to add the greater weight to the caution, and to let the world know that he would not countenance hypocrisy, no, not in his own disciples.

(1) The description of that sin which he warns them against: It is the leaven of the Pharisees. It is leaven; it is spreading as leaven, insinuating itself into the whole man, and all that he does; it is swelling and souring as leaven, for it puffs men up with pride, embitters them with malice, and makes their service unacceptable to God. It is the leaven of the Pharisees: "It is the sin they are most of them found in. Take heed of imitating them; do not dissemble in Christianity as they do in Judaism."

(2) A good reason against it: "For there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, v. 2, 3. Sooner or later, truth will come out. If you speak in darkness that which is inconsistent with your public professions, it shall be heard in the light; some way or other it shall be discovered, and your folly and falsehood will be made manifest." If men's religion prevail not to conquer and cure the wickedness of their hearts, it shall not always serve for a cloak. The day is coming when hypocrites will be stripped of their fig-leaves.

2. To this he added a charge to them to be faithful to the trust reposed in them, and not to betray it, through cowardice or base fear. "Whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear, tell them the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; what has been spoken to you privately, that do you preach publicly, whoever is offended." It was likely to be a suffering cause, though never a sinking one; let them therefore arm themselves with courage; and divers arguments are furnished here to steel them with a holy resolution in their work.

(1) "The power of your enemies is a limited power (v. 4): I say unto you, my friends" (Christ's disciples are his friends, he calls them friends, and gives them this friendly advice), "be not afraid." Those whom Christ owns for his friends need not be afraid of any enemies. "Be not afraid, no, not of them that kill the body; after that there is no more that they can do." Those can do Christ's disciples no real harm who can but kill the body, for they only send that to its rest, and the soul to its joy, the sooner.

(2) God is to be feared more than the most powerful men: "I will forewarn you whom you shall fear (v. 5). By owning Christ you may incur the wrath of men, but by denying Christ, and disowning him, you will incur the wrath of God, which has power to send you to hell. Therefore I say unto you, Fear him." "It is true," said that blessed martyr, Bishop Hooper, "life is sweet, and death bitter; but eternal life is more sweet, and eternal death more bitter."

(3) The lives of good Christians and good ministers are the particular care of divine Providence, v. 6, 7. Providence takes cognizance of the meanest creatures, even of the sparrows. "Though they are of such small account that five of them are sold for two farthings, yet not one of them is forgotten of God. Now, you are of more value than many sparrows, and therefore you may be sure you are not forgotten." Providence takes cognizance of the meanest interest of the disciples of Christ: "Even the very hairs of your head are all numbered (v. 7); much more are your sighs and tears numbered, and the drops of your blood, which you shed for Christ's name's sake."

(4) "You will be owned or disowned by Christ, according as you now own or disown him," v. 8, 9. To engage us to confess Christ before men, how dear soever it may cost us, we are assured that they who confess Christ now shall be owned by him in the great day before the angels of God. Jesus Christ will confess, not only that he suffered for them, but that they suffered for him, and what greater honour can be done them? To deter us from denying Christ we are here assured that those who deny Christ, whatever they may save by it, though it were life itself, and whatever they may gain by it, will be vast losers at last, for they shall be denied before the angels of God; Christ will not know them, will not own them.

(5) The errand they were shortly to be sent out upon was of the highest and last importance, v. 10. Let them be bold in preaching the gospel, for a sorer and heavier doom would attend those that rejected them (after the Spirit was poured upon them, which was to be the last method of conviction) than those that now rejected Christ himself. "Whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it is capable of some excuse: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. But unto him that blasphemes the Holy Ghost, the privilege of the forgiveness of sins shall be denied; he shall have no benefit by Christ and his gospel." There were hopes of those who, though not convinced by them at first, yet admired them, but those who blasphemed them were given over.

(6) Whatever trials they should be called out to, they should be sufficiently furnished for them, and honourably brought through them, v. 11, 12. The faithful martyr for Christ has not only sufferings to undergo, but a testimony to bear, a good confession to witness, and is concerned to do that well, so that the cause of Christ may not suffer, though he suffer for it; and, if this be his care, let him cast it upon God: "When they bring you into the synagogues, or before magistrates and powers, to be examined about your doctrine, take no thought what ye shall answer," [1] "That you may save yourselves. If it be the will of God that you should come off, and your time is not yet come, he will bring it about effectually." [2] "That you may serve your Master; aim at this, but do not perplex yourselves about it, for the Holy Ghost, as a Spirit of wisdom, shall teach you what you ought to say, and how to say it, so that it may be for the honour of God and his cause."

I. The application that was made to Christ by one of his hearers, desiring him to interpose between him and his brother in a matter that concerned the estate of the family (v. 13): "Master, speak to my brother that he divide the inheritance with me." Some think that his brother did him wrong, and that he appealed to Christ to right him. Such brethren there are in the world, who have no sense at all either of natural equity or natural affection. They who are so wronged have a God to go to, who will execute judgment and justice for those that are oppressed. Others think that he had a mind to do his brother wrong, and would have Christ to assist him; that, whereas the law gave the elder brother a double portion of the estate, he would have Christ to alter that law, and oblige his brother to divide the inheritance equally with him. It was not a lawful desire of getting his own, but a sinful desire of getting more than his own.

II. Christ's refusal to interpose this in matter (v. 14): Man, who made me a judge or divider over you? Christ will not assume either a legislative power, or a judicial power. He corrects the man's mistake. If he had come to him to desire him to assist his pursuit of the heavenly inheritance, Christ would have given him his best help; but as to this matter he has nothing to do. Whatever he did, he could tell by what authority he did it, and who gave him that authority. Now this shows us what is the nature and constitution of Christ's kingdom. It is a spiritual kingdom, and not of this world. 1. It does not interfere with civil powers. Christianity leaves the matter as it found it, as to civil power. 2. It does not intermeddle with civil rights; it obliges all to do justly, according to the settled rules of equity. 3. It does not encourage our expectations of worldly advantages by our religion. 4. It does not encourage our contests with our brethren, and our being rigorous and high in our demands.

III. The necessary caution which Christ took occasion from this to give to his hearers.

1. The caution itself (v. 15): Take heed and beware of covetousness; ὁρᾶτε—"Observe yourselves, keep a jealous eye upon your own hearts, lest covetous principles steal into them; and φυλάσσεσθε—preserve yourselves, keep a strict hand upon your own hearts, lest covetous principles rule and give law in them."

2. An argument to enforce this caution: For a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth; that is, "our happiness and comfort do not depend upon our having a great deal of the wealth of this world." The life of the soul, undoubtedly, does not depend upon it. The things of the world will not suit the nature of a soul, nor supply its needs, nor satisfy its desires. Even the life of the body and the happiness of that do not consist in an abundance of these things; for many live very contentedly and easily, who have but a little of the wealth of it (a dinner of herbs with holy love is better than a feast of fat things); and, on the other hand, many live very miserably who have a great deal of the things of this world.

3. The illustration of this by a parable, which is intended for the enforcing of that necessary caution to us all, to take heed of covetousness. The parable gives us the life and death of a rich man, and leaves us to judge whether he was a happy man.

(1) Here is an account of his worldly wealth and abundance (v. 16): The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully. His wealth lay much in the fruits of the earth. He had a great deal of ground, and his ground was fruitful; much would have more, and he had more.

(2) Here are the workings of his heart. We are here told what he thought within himself, v. 17. The God of heaven knows and observes whatever we think within ourselves, and we are accountable to him for it. Let us here observe,

[1] What his cares and concerns were. When he saw an extraordinary crop upon his ground, instead of thanking God for it, or rejoicing in the opportunity it would give him of doing the more good, he afflicts himself with this thought, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? He speaks as one at a loss, and full of perplexity. What shall I do now? The poorest beggar in the country, that did not know where to get a meal's meat, could not have said a more anxious word. Even the abundance of the rich will not suffer them to sleep, for thinking what they shall do with what they have. The rich man seems to speak it with a sigh, What shall I do? And if you ask, Why, what is the matter? Truly he has abundance of wealth, and wants a place to put it in, that is all.

[2] What his projects and purposes were (v. 18): "This will I do, I will pull down my barns, and I will build greater, and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods, and then I shall be at ease." It was folly for him to call the fruits of the ground his fruits and his goods. What we have is but lent us for our use, the property is still in God; we are but stewards of our Lord's goods. It was folly for him to hoard up what he had, and then to think it well bestowed. There will I bestow it all; as if none must be bestowed upon the poor, and the stranger, the fatherless and the widow, but all in the great barn. It was folly for him to let his mind rise with his condition; to talk of bigger barns, as if the next year must needs be as fruitful as this, and much more abundant, whereas the barn might be as much too big the next year as it was too little this. It was folly for him to think to ease his care by building new barns, for the building of them would but increase his care; those know this who know anything of the spirit of building. It was folly for him to contrive and resolve all this absolutely and without reserve. This I will do. I will; without so much as that necessary proviso, If the Lord will, I shall live, James iv. 13–15. Peremptory projects are foolish projects; for our times are in God's hand, and not in our own, and we do not so much as know what shall be on the morrow.

[3] What his pleasing hopes and expectations were. "Then I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; now take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry," v. 19. Here also appears his folly. It was folly for him to put off his comfort in his abundance till he had compassed his projects concerning it. When he has built bigger barns, then he will take his ease; and might he not as well have done that now? It was folly for him to be confident that his goods were laid up for many years, whereas in an hour's time they might be burnt to the ground and all that was laid up in them, perhaps by lightning. A few years may make a great change; moth and rust may corrupt, or thieves break through and steal. It was folly for him to count upon certain ease, whereas there are many things that may make people uneasy in the midst of their greatest abundance. One dead fly may spoil a whole pot of precious ointment; and one thorn a whole bed of down. Pain and sickness of body, disagreeableness of relations, and especially a guilty conscience, may rob a man of his ease, who has ever so much of the wealth of this world. It was folly for him to think of making no other use of his plenty than to eat and drink, and to be merry; to indulge the flesh, and gratify the sensual appetite, without any thought of doing good to others: as if we lived to eat, and did not eat to live. It was the greatest folly of all to say all this to his soul. If he had said, Body, take thine ease, for thou hast goods laid up for many years, there had been sense in it; but the soul was no way interested in a barn full of corn or a bag full of gold. If he had had the soul of a swine, he might have blessed it with the satisfaction of eating and drinking. It is the great absurdity which the children of this world are guilty of that they portion their souls in the wealth of the world and the pleasures of sense.

(3) Here is God's sentence upon all this. He said to himself, Take thine ease. If God had said so too, the man had been happy. But God said quite otherwise; God said he did ill for himself: Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee, v. 20. God said to him, that is, decreed this concerning him. This was said when he was in the fulness of his sufficiency, when his eyes were held waking upon his bed with his cares and contrivances about enlarging his barns. When he was forecasting this, and then lulled himself asleep again with a pleasing dream of many years' enjoyment, then God said this to him. Now observe what God said,

The character he gave him: Thou fool, thou Nabal, alluding to the story of Nabal, that fool (Nabal is his name, and folly is with him). Carnal worldlings are fools, and the day is coming when God will call them by their own name, Thou fool, and they will call themselves so.

The sentence he passed upon him, a sentence of death: This night thy soul shall be required of thee; and then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided? He thought he had goods that should be his for many years, but he must part from them this night; he thought he should enjoy them himself, but he must leave them to he knows not who.

First, It is a force, an arrest; it is the requiring of the soul; what hast thou to do with a soul, who canst use it no better? Thy soul shall be required. A good man cheerfully resigns his soul at death, and gives it up; but a worldly man has it torn from him with violence. They shall require thy soul. God shall require it; he shall require an account of it. "Man, woman, what hast thou done with thy soul. Give an account of that stewardship."

Secondly, It is a surprise, an unexpected force. It is in the night. The time of death is day-time to a good man; it is his morning. But it is night to a worldling, a dark night. It is this night, this present night, without delay. This pleasant night, when thou art promising thyself many years to come, now thou must die. In the midst of all, here is an end of all.

Thirdly, It is the leaving of all those things behind which they have provided. All that which they have placed their happiness in, and built their hope upon, they must leave behind.

Fourthly, It is leaving them to they know not who: "Then whose shall those things be? Not thine to be sure, and thou knowest not what they will prove for whom thou didst design them, thy children and relations, whether they will be wise or fools (Eccles. ii. 18, 19), whether such as will bless thy memory or curse it, be a credit to thy family or a blemish, do good or hurt with what thou leavest them." If many a man could have foreseen to whom his house would have come after his death, he would rather have burned it than beautified it.

Fifthly, It is a demonstration of his folly. At his end he shall be a fool, for then it will appear that he took pains to lay up treasure in a world he was hastening from, but took no care to lay it up in the world he was hastening to.

Lastly, Here is the application of this parable (v. 21): So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God. This is the way and this is the end of such a man.

1. The description of a worldly man: He lays up treasure for himself, for himself in opposition to God, for that self that is to be denied. It is his error that he counts his flesh himself, as if the body were the man. It is his error that he makes it his business to lay up for the flesh, which he calls laying up for himself. It is his error that he counts those things his treasure which are thus laid up for the world, and the body, and the life that now is. The greatest error of all is that he is in no care to be rich towards God, rich in the things of God. Many who have abundance of this world are wholly destitute of that which will enrich their souls, which will make them rich towards God, rich for eternity.

2. The folly and misery of a worldly man: So is he. Our Lord Jesus Christ has here told us what his end will be. It is the unspeakable folly of the most of men to mind that which is merely for the body and for time, more than that which is for the soul and eternity.

Verses 22–40

"Therefore, because there are so many that are ruined by covetousness, I say unto you, my disciples, take heed of it." Thou, O man of God, flee these things, as well as thou, O man of the world, 1 Tim. vi. 11.

I. He charges them not to afflict themselves with disquieting perplexing cares about the necessary supports of life: Take no thought for your life, v. 22. In the foregoing parable he had given us warning against that branch of covetousness of which rich people are most in danger. He here warns them against another branch of covetousness, which they are most in temptation to that have but a little of this world, and that was, an anxious solicitude about the necessary supports of life: "Take no thought for your life what ye shall eat or what ye shall put on." This is the caution he had largely insisted upon, Matt. vi. 25, &c.; and the arguments here used are much the same.

1. God, who has done the greater for us, may be depended upon to do the less. He has given us life and a body, and therefore we may cheerfully leave it to him to provide meat for the support of that life, and raiment for the defence of that body.

2. God, who provides for the inferior creatures, may be depended upon to provide. "Trust God for meat, for he feeds the ravens (v. 24); they neither sow nor reap, and yet they are fed. Now consider how much better ye are than the fowls, than the ravens. Trust God for clothing, for he clothes the lilies (v. 27, 28); they toil not, they spin not, and yet, as the flower grows up, it appears wonderfully beautified. Now, if God has so clothed the flowers, shall he not much more clothe you?" Then let them not be of little faith. Our inordinate cares are owing to the weakness of our faith; for a powerful practical belief of the all-sufficiency of God would be mighty, through God, to the pulling down of the strongholds of these disquieting perplexing imaginations.

3. Our cares are fruitless, vain, and insignificant. They will not gain us our wishes, and therefore ought not to hinder our repose (v. 25): "Which of you by taking thought can add to his stature one cubit? Now if ye be not able to do that which is least, if it be not in your power to alter your statures, why should you perplex yourselves about other things, which are as much out of your power?" As in our stature, so in our state, it is our wisdom to take it as it is, and make the best of it; for fretting and vexing, carping and caring, will not mend it.

4. An inordinate anxious pursuit of the things of this world, even necessary things, very ill becomes the disciples of Christ (v. 29, 30): "Seek not ye what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; do not you afflict yourselves with perplexing cares." Let not the disciples of Christ thus seek their food, but ask it of God day by day; let them not be of doubtful mind; blown hither and thither with every wind. Be even and steady, and have your hearts fixed; live not in careful suspense; let not your minds be continually perplexed between hope and fear, ever upon the rack. Let not the children of God make themselves uneasy; for,

(1) This is to make themselves like the children of this world: "All these things do the nations of the world seek after, v. 30. They that take care for this world only, and not for the other, look no further than what they shall eat and drink. But it ill becomes you to do so. When inordinate cares prevail over us, we should think, "What am I, a Christian or a heathen? If a Christian, shall I rank myself with Gentiles, and join with them in their pursuits?"

(2) It is needless for them to disquiet themselves with care about the necessary supports of life: "Your Father knows that you have need of these things, and will supply your needs according to his riches in glory; for he is your Father, and therefore will take care that you want no good thing."

(3) They have better things to mind and pursue (v. 31): "But rather seek ye the kingdom of God, and mind this, you, my disciples, who are to preach the kingdom of God. Let all that have souls to save seek the kingdom of God, in which only they can be safe. Then all these things shall be added to you. Mind the affairs of your souls with diligence and care, and then trust God with all your other affairs."

(4) They have better things to expect and hope for: Fear not, little flock, v. 32. When we frighten ourselves with an apprehension of evil to come, we put ourselves upon the stretch of care how to avoid it, when after all perhaps it is but the creature of our own imagination. Therefore fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. This comfortable word we had not in Matthew. [1] Christ's flock in this world is a little flock. The church is a vineyard, a garden, a small spot, compared with the wilderness of this world. [2] Though it be a little flock, quite over-numbered by its enemies, yet it is the will of Christ that they should not be afraid: "Fear not, little flock, but see yourselves safe under the protection and conduct of the great and good Shepherd." [3] God has a kingdom in store for all that belong to Christ's little flock, a crown of glory (1 Pet. v. 4). [4] The kingdom is given according to the good pleasure of the Father: It is your Father's good pleasure; it is given not of debt, but of grace. [5] The believing hopes and prospects of the kingdom should silence and suppress the fears of Christ's little flock in this world. "Fear no trouble; for, though it should come, it shall not come between you and the kingdom." (That is not an evil worth trembling at the thought of which cannot separate us from the love of God.)

II. He charged them to make sure work for their souls, by laying up their treasure in heaven, v. 33, 34.

1. "Sell that ye have, and give alms," that is, "rather than want wherewith to relieve those that are truly necessitous, sell what you have that is superfluous, and give it to the poor. Sell what you have, if you find it a hindrance from, or incumbrance in, the service of Christ. Do not sell to hoard up the money, or because you can make more of it by usury, but sell and give alms; what is given in alms, in a right manner, is put out to the best interest, upon the best security."

2. "Set your hearts upon the other world. Provide yourselves bags that wax not old." Grace will go with us into another world, for it is woven in the soul; and our good works will follow us. These will be treasures in heaven, that will enrich us to eternity. (1) It is treasure that will not be exhausted; we may spend upon it to eternity; there is no danger of seeing the bottom of it. (2) It is treasure that we are in no danger of being robbed of; what is laid up in heaven is out of the reach of enemies. (3) It is treasure that will not spoil with keeping, any more than it will waste with spending; the moth does not corrupt it. We have laid up our treasure in heaven if our hearts be there while we are here (v. 34). But, if your hearts be set upon the earth and the things of it, it is to be feared that you have your treasure and portion in it, and are undone when you leave it.

III. He charges them to get ready, and to keep in a readiness for Christ's coming, v. 35, &c.

1. Christ is our Master, and we are his servants, not only working servants, but waiting servants. We must be as men that wait for their Lord, that sit up late while he stays out late, to be ready to receive him.

2. Christ our Master, though now gone from us, will return again. Christ's servants are now in a state of expectation, looking for their Master's glorious appearing. He will come to take cognizance of his servants, and they shall either stay with him or be turned out of doors, according as they are found in that day.

3. The time of our Master's return is uncertain; it will be far in the night, when he has long deferred his coming; in the second watch, just before midnight, or in the third watch, next after midnight, v. 38. The Son of man cometh at an hour that ye think not (v. 40). This bespeaks the prevailing security of the greatest part of men, who are unthinking, so that, whenever he comes, it is in an hour that they think not.

4. That which he expects and requires from his servants is that they be ready to open to him immediately (v. 36), that is, that they be found as his servants, with their loins girded about, having their long garments tucked up (which otherwise would hang about them, and hinder them), and their lights burning, with which to light their master into the house.

5. Those servants will be happy who shall be found ready when their Lord shall come (v. 37): Blessed are those servants who, after having waited long, are then found awake and aware of his first approach, of his first knock; and again (v. 38): Blessed are those servants. He will make them sit down to meat, and will serve them. For the bridegroom to wait upon his bride at table is not uncommon, but to wait upon his servants is not the manner of men; yet Jesus Christ did once, to show his condescension, gird himself, and serve them, when he washed their feet (John xiii. 4, 5).

6. We are therefore kept at uncertainty concerning the precise time of his coming that we may be always ready: The good man of the house, if he had known what hour the thief would have come, though he were ever so careless a man, would yet have watched, v. 39. But we do not know at what hour the alarm will be given us, and therefore are concerned never to be off our guard. Or this may intimate the miserable case of those who are careless and unbelieving in this great matter. We have notice of the day of the Lord's coming, as a thief in the night, and yet do not thus watch. If men will take such care of their houses, O let us be thus wise for our souls: Be ye therefore ready also, as ready as the good man of the house would be if he knew what hour the thief would come.

I. Peter's question, which he put to Christ upon occasion of the foregoing parable (v. 41): "Lord, speakest thou this parable to us, or also to all—to all the hearers?" Peter was now, as often, spokesman for the disciples. We have reason to bless God that there are some such forward men; let those that are such take heed of being proud. Now Peter desires Christ to explain himself. Lord, said Peter, was it intended for us, or for all? To this Christ gives a direct answer (Mark xiii. 37): What I say unto you, I say unto all. Yet here he seems to show that the apostles were primarily concerned in it. Speakest thou this to us? Doth this word belong to me? Speak it to my heart.

II. Christ's reply to this question, directed to Peter and the rest of the disciples. This that follows is peculiarly adapted to ministers, who are the stewards in Christ's house.

1. What was their duty as stewards, and what the trust committed to them. They are made rulers of God's household, under Christ, whose own the house is; ministers derive an authority from Christ. Their business is to give God's children and servants their portion of meat, that which is proper for them; convictions and comfort to those to whom they respectively belong; to give it to them in due season; a word in season to him that is weary. Herein they must approve themselves faithful and wise; faithful to their Master, and faithful to their fellow-servants; and wise. Ministers must be both skilful and faithful.

2. What would be their happiness if they approved themselves faithful and wise (v. 43): Blessed is that servant, (1) That is doing, and is not idle. (2) That is so doing, doing as he should be, by public preaching and personal application. (3) That is found so doing when his Lord comes. Now his happiness is illustrated by the preferment of a steward that has approved himself within a lower and narrower degree of service; he shall be preferred to a larger and higher (v. 44): He will make him ruler over all that he has. Ministers that obtain mercy of the Lord to be faithful shall obtain further mercy to be abundantly rewarded for their faithfulness in the day of the Lord.

3. What a dreadful reckoning there would be if they were treacherous and unfaithful, v. 45, 46. We had all this before in Matthew, and therefore shall here only observe, (1) He saith in his heart, My Lord delays his coming. Christ's patience is very often misinterpreted as delay, to the discouragement of his people, and the encouragement of his enemies. (2) The persecutors of God's people are commonly abandoned to security and sensuality; they beat their fellow-servants, and then eat and drink with the drunken, altogether unconcerned either at their own sin or their brethren's sufferings. (3) Death and judgment will be very terrible to all wicked people, but especially to wicked ministers. It will be a surprise to them: At an hour when they are not aware.

4. What an aggravation it would be of their sin and punishment that they knew their duty, and did not do it (v. 47, 48): That servant that knew his lord's will, and did it not, shall be beaten with many stripes; and he that knew not shall be beaten with few stripes, his punishment shall be mitigated. Here seems to be an allusion to the law, which made a distinction between sins committed through ignorance, and presumptuous sins (Num. xv. 29, 30). (1) Ignorance of our duty is an extenuation of sin. He that knew not his lord's will, and did things worthy of stripes, he shall be beaten, because he might have known his duty better, but with few stripes; his ignorance excuses in part, but not wholly. Thus through ignorance the Jews put Christ to death, and Christ pleaded that ignorance in their excuse: They know not what they do. (2) The knowledge of our duty is an aggravation of our sin: That servant that knew his lord's will shall be beaten with many stripes. God will justly inflict more upon him because it argues a great degree of wilfulness and contempt to sin against knowledge. Here is a good reason for this added: To whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required. Those that have greater capacities of mind than others, more knowledge and learning, more acquaintance and converse with the scriptures, to them much is given, and their account will be accordingly.

III. A further discourse concerning his own sufferings, and concerning the sufferings of his followers. In general (v. 49): I am come to send fire on the earth. By this some understand the preaching of the gospel, and the pouring out of the Spirit, holy fire; and it was already kindled. But, by what follows, it seems rather to be understood of the fire of persecution. Christ is not the Author of it, as it is the sin of the incendiaries, the persecutors; but he permits it as a refining fire for the trial of the persecuted.

1. He must himself suffer many things; he must pass through this fire that was already kindled (v. 50): I have a baptism to be baptized with. Afflictions are compared both to fire and water, Ps. lxvi. 12. Christ's sufferings were both. He calls them a baptism (Matt. xx. 22); for he was watered or sprinkled with them, and dipped into them, as Israel was baptized in the sea, 1 Cor. x. 2. Christ's foresight of his sufferings: I am to be baptized with a baptism. He calls his sufferings by a name that mitigates them; it is a baptism, not a deluge; I must be dipped in them, not drowned in them; and by a name that sanctifies them, for baptism is a sacred rite. Christ's forwardness to his sufferings: How am I straitened till it be accomplished! He longed for the time when he should suffer and die, having an eye to the glorious issue of his sufferings. Christ's sufferings were the travail of his soul, which he cheerfully underwent. So much was his heart set upon the redemption and salvation of man.

2. He tells those about him that they also must bear with hardships and difficulties (v. 51): "Suppose ye that I came to give peace on earth?" It is intimated that they went upon this supposition, that the gospel would meet with a universal welcome, that people would unanimously embrace it, that Christ would at least give them peace. "But," saith Christ, "you will be mistaken, the event will declare the contrary, and therefore do not flatter yourselves into a fool's paradise. You will find:

(1) "That the effect of the preaching of the gospel will be division." Not but that the design of the gospel and its proper tendency are to unite the children of men to one another, to knit them together in holy love, and, if all would receive it, this would be the effect of it; but there being multitudes that not only will not receive it, but oppose it, it proves, though not the cause, yet the occasion of division. While the strong man armed kept his palace, in the Gentile world, his goods were at peace. The sects of philosophers agreed well enough, so did the worshippers of different deities; but when the gospel was preached, and many were turned from the power of Satan to God, then there was a disturbance. Some distinguished themselves by embracing the gospel, and others were angry that they did so. Yea, and among them that received the gospel there would be division; and Christ permits it for holy ends, that Christians may learn and practise mutual forbearance.

(2) "That this division will reach into private families" (v. 53): The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father, when the one turns Christian and the other does not; for the one that does turn Christian will be zealous by arguments and endearments to turn the other too. The one that continues in unbelief will be provoked, and will hate and persecute the one that by his faith and obedience witnesses against, and condemns, his unbelief and disobedience. Even mothers and daughters fall out about religion; and those that believe not are ready to deliver up those that believe, though otherwise very near and dear to them. We find in the Acts that, wherever the gospel came, persecution was stirred up; it was everywhere spoken against, and there was no small stir about that way. Therefore let not the disciples of Christ promise themselves peace upon earth.

Verses 54–59

Having given his disciples their lesson in the foregoing verses, here Christ turns to the people, and gives them theirs, v. 54. In general, he would have them be as wise in the affairs of their souls as they are in their outward affairs.

I. Let them learn to discern the way of God towards them, that they may prepare accordingly. They were weather-wise, could foresee when there would be rain and when there would be hot weather (v. 54, 55). Even in regard to changes of the weather God gives warning to us what is coming, and art has improved the notices of nature in weather-glasses. From what has been we conjecture what will be. See the benefit of experience; by taking notice we may come to give notice. Whoso is wise will observe and learn.

1. The particulars of the presages: "When you see a cloud arising out of the west, perhaps it is at first no bigger than a man's hand (1 Kings xviii. 44), but you say, There is a shower in the womb of it, and it proves so. When you observe the south wind blow, you say, There will be heat, and it usually comes to pass"; yet nature has not tied itself to such a track but that sometimes we are mistaken in our prognostics.

2. The inferences from them (v. 56): "Ye hypocrites, who pretend to be wise, but really are not so, how is it that you do not discern this time? Why are you not aware that you have now an opportunity which you will not have long, and which you may never have again?" Now is the accepted time, now or never. It is the folly and misery of man that he knows not his time. This was the ruin of the men of that generation, that they knew not the day of their visitation, ch. xix. 44. He adds, "Yea, and why even of yourselves, judge ye not what is right?" v. 57. If men would allow themselves the liberty of judging what is right, they would soon find that all Christ's precepts concerning all things are right, and that there is nothing more equitable in itself, than to submit to them and be ruled by them.

II. Let them hasten to make their peace with God in time, before it be too late, v. 58, 59. This we had upon another occasion, Matt. v. 25, 26. 1. We reckon it our wisdom in our temporal affairs to compound with those with whom we cannot contend. "When thou goest with thine adversary to the magistrate, and thou art in danger of being cast, thou knowest it is the most prudent course to make the matter up between yourselves; as thou art in the way, give diligence to be delivered from him." Wise men will not let their quarrels go to an extremity, but accommodate them in time. 2. Let us do thus in the affairs of our souls. We have by sin made God our adversary, and he has both right and might on his side. Christ, to whom all judgment is committed, is the magistrate before whom we are hastening to appear: if we stand a trial before him, the cause will certainly go against us, the Judge will deliver us to the officer, and we shall be cast into the prison of hell, till the last mite be paid, which will not be to all eternity. Christ's sufferings were short, yet the value of them made them fully satisfactory. Now, in consideration of this, let us give diligence to be delivered out of the hands of God as an adversary, into his hands as a Father, and this as we are in the way, which has the chief stress laid upon it here. While we are alive, we are in the way; and now is our time, by repentance and faith, to get the quarrel made up, while it may be done, before it be too late. Let us take hold on the arm of the Lord stretched out in this gracious offer, that we may make peace.

CHAP. XIII

I. The good improvement Christ made of a piece of news that was brought him concerning some Galileans, that were lately massacred by Pilate, ver. 1–5. II. The parable of the fruitless fig-tree, ver. 6–9. III. Christ's healing a poor infirm woman on the sabbath day, ver. 11–17. IV. A repetition of the parables of the grain of mustard-seed, and the leaven, ver. 18–22. V. His answer to the question concerning the number of the saved, ver. 23–30. VI. The slight he put upon Herod's malice and menaces, and the doom of Jerusalem read, ver. 31–35.

Verses 1–5

We have here, I. Tidings brought to Christ of the death of some Galileans lately, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices, v. 1.

1. What this tragical story was. It is briefly related here, and is not met with in any of the historians of those times. The Galileans being Herod's subjects, it is probable that this outrage committed upon them by Pilate occasioned the quarrel that was between Herod and Pilate, which we read of in ch. xxiii. 12. We are not told what number they were, perhaps but a few; but the circumstance remarked is that he mingled their blood with their sacrifices. Though perhaps they had reason to fear Pilate's malice, yet they would not keep away from Jerusalem, whither the law obliged them to go up with their sacrifices. Neither the holiness of the place nor of the work would be a protection to them from the fury of an unjust judge, who neither feared God nor regarded man. The altar, which used to be a sanctuary and place of shelter, is now become a snare and a trap, a place of danger and slaughter.

2. Why it was related at this season to our Lord Jesus. Perhaps merely as a matter of news, which they supposed he had not heard before, and as a thing which they lamented and believed he would do so too. Perhaps it was intended as a confirmation of what Christ had said in the close of the foregoing chapter, concerning the necessity of making our peace with God in time, "Master, here is a fresh instance of some that were very suddenly delivered to the officer, that were taken away by death when they little expected it; and therefore we have all need to be ready." It will be of good use to us both to explain the word of God and to enforce it upon ourselves by observing the providences of God. Perhaps they would stir him up, being himself of Galilee, and a prophet, to find out a way to revenge the death of these Galileans upon Herod. Perhaps this was told Christ to deter him from going up to Jerusalem, to worship (v. 22), lest Pilate should serve him as he had served those Galileans. Now, lest Pilate, when his hand was in, should proceed further, they think it advisable that Christ should for the present keep out of the way. Christ's answer intimates that they told him this with a spiteful innuendo, that without doubt they were secretly bad men, else God would not have permitted Pilate thus barbarously to cut them off. It was very invidious; rather than they would allow them to be martyrs they would, without any colour of proof, suppose them to be malefactors. This fate of theirs was capable not only of a favourable, but an honourable construction.

II. Christ's reply to this report.

1. He seconded it with another story, which, like it, gave an instance of people's being taken away by sudden death. It is not long since the tower of Siloam fell, and there were eighteen persons killed and buried in the ruins of it. It was a sad story; yet such melancholy accidents we often hear of. Towers, that were built for safety, often prove men's destruction.

2. He cautioned his hearers not to make an ill use of these and similar events, nor take occasion thence to censure great sufferers, as if they were therefore to be accounted great sinners: Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you nay, v. 2, 3. Perhaps they that told him the story of the Galileans were Jews, and were glad of anything that furnished them with matter of reflection upon the Galileans, and therefore Christ retorted upon them the story of the men of Jerusalem, that came to an untimely end. "Now suppose ye that those eighteen who met with their death from the tower of Siloam, while perhaps they were expecting their cure from the pool of Siloam, were debtors to divine justice above all men that dwelt at Jerusalem? I tell you nay." We cannot judge of men's sins by their sufferings in this world; for many are thrown into the furnace as gold to be purified, not as dross and chaff to be consumed. We must therefore not be harsh in our censures of those that are afflicted more than their neighbours, lest we add sorrow to the sorrowful. If we will be judging, we have enough to do to judge ourselves. And we might as justly conclude that the oppressors on whose side are power and success, are the greatest saints, as that the oppressed are the greatest sinners. Let us, in our censures of others, do as we would be done by; for as we do we shall be done by: Judge not, that ye be not judged, Matt. vii. 1.

3. On these stories he founded a call to repentance, adding to each of them this awakening word, Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish, v. 3–5. (1) This intimates that we all deserve to perish as much as they did. It must moderate our censures, not only that we are sinners, but that we are as great sinners as they, have as much sin to repent of as they had to suffer for. (2) That therefore we are all concerned to repent, to be sorry for what we have done amiss, and to do so no more. The judgments of God upon others are loud calls to us to repent. (3) That repentance is the way to escape perishing, and it is a sure way. (4) That, if we repent not, we shall certainly perish, as others have done before us. Except we repent, we shall perish eternally, as they perished out of this world. The same Jesus that calls us to repent because the kingdom of heaven is at hand, bids us repent because otherwise we shall perish; so that he has set before us life and death, good and evil, and put us to our choice.

This parable is intended to enforce that word of warning immediately going before, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

I. This parable primarily refers to the nation and people of the Jews. God chose them for his own, made them a people near to him, expected answerable returns of duty and obedience from them, which he would have accounted fruit; but they disappointed his expectations; they were a reproach instead of being a credit to their profession. Upon this, he justly determined to abandon them; but, upon Christ's intercession, he graciously gave them further time and further mercy; tried them, as it were, another year, by sending his apostles among them, to call them to repentance, and in Christ's name to offer them pardon. Some of them were wrought upon to repent, and bring forth fruit, and with them all was well; but the body of the nation continued impenitent and unfruitful, and ruin without remedy came upon them.

II. Yet it has a further reference, and is designed for the awakening of all that enjoy the means of grace to see to it that the temper of their minds and the tenor of their lives be answerable to their opportunities, for that is the fruit required.

1. The advantages which this fig-tree had. It was planted in a vineyard, in better soil, and where it had more care taken of it than other fig-trees had, that commonly grew by the way-side, Matt. xxi. 19. This fig-tree belonged to a certain man. The church of God is his vineyard. We are fig-trees planted in this vineyard. It is a distinguishing favour.

2. The owner's expectation from it: He came, and sought fruit thereon. He did not send, but came himself. Christ came into this world, came to his own, seeking fruit. The God of heaven requires and expects fruit from those that have a place in his vineyard. Leaves will not serve, crying, Lord, Lord; blossoms will not serve, beginning well and promising fair; there must be fruit. Our thoughts, words, and actions must be according to the gospel, light and love.

3. The disappointment of his expectation: He found none, not one fig. It is sad to think how many enjoy the privileges of the gospel, and yet do nothing at all to the honour of God.

(1) He here complains of it to the dresser of the vineyard: I come, seeking fruit, but am disappointed—I find none.

(2) He aggravates it, with two considerations: [1] That he had waited long, and yet was disappointed. As he was not high in his expectations, he only expected fruit, not much fruit, so he was not hasty, he came three years, year after year. In general, it teaches us that the patience of God is stretched out to longsuffering with many that enjoy the gospel, and do not bring forth the fruits of it. How many times three years has God come to many of us, seeking fruit, but has found none. [2] That this fig-tree did not only not bring forth fruit, but did hurt; it cumbered the ground; it took up the room of a fruitful tree, and was injurious to all about it. Those who do not do good commonly do hurt by the influence of their bad example. And the mischief is the greater, and the ground the more cumbered, if it be a high, large, spreading tree, and if it be an old tree of long standing.

4. The doom passed upon it: Cut it down. No other can be expected concerning barren trees than that they should be cut down. And with good reason, for why cumbers it the ground? What reason is there why it should have a place in the vineyard to no purpose?

5. The dresser's intercession for it. Christ is the great Intercessor. Ministers are intercessors; those we preach to we should pray for.

(1) What it is he prays for, and that is a reprieve: Lord, let it alone this year also. He doth not pray, "Lord, let it never be cut down," but, "Lord, not now." It is desirable to have a barren tree reprieved. Some have not yet grace to repent, yet it is a mercy to them to have space to repent. We owe it to Christ, the great Intercessor, that barren trees are not cut down immediately. We are encouraged to pray to God for the merciful reprieve of barren fig-trees: "Lord, let them alone; bear with them a little longer, and wait to be gracious." Thus must we stand in the gap, to turn away wrath. Reprieves of mercy are but for a time: Let it alone this year also. When God has borne long, we may hope he will bear yet a little longer, but we cannot expect he should bear always. Reprieves may be obtained by the prayers of others for us, but not pardons; there must be our own faith, and repentance, and prayers.

(2) How he promises to improve this reprieve: Till I shall dig about it, and dung it. In general, our prayers must always be seconded with our endeavours. Thus in all our prayers we must request God's grace, with a humble resolution to do our duty, else we mock God, and show that we do not rightly value the mercies we pray for. The dresser of the vineyard engages to do his part, and therein teaches ministers to do theirs. He will dig about the tree and will dung it. Unfruitful Christians must be awakened by the terrors of the law, which break up the fallow ground, and then encouraged by the promises of the gospel, which are warming and fattening, as manure to the tree. Both methods must be tried; the one prepares for the other, and all little enough.

(3) Upon what foot he leaves the matter: "Let us try what we can do with it one year more, and, if it bear fruit, well," v. 9. The word well is not in the original, but the expression is abrupt: If it bear fruit! —supply it how you please. so as to express how wonderfully well-pleased both the owner and dresser will be. Unfruitful professors of religion, if after long unfruitfulness they will repent, and amend, and bring forth fruit, shall find all is well. God will be pleased, ministers' hands will be strengthened. Nay, there will be joy in heaven for it; the ground will be no longer cumbered, but bettered, the vineyard beautified, and the good trees in it made better. As for the tree itself, it is well for it; it shall receive blessing from God (Heb. vi. 7); it shall be purged, and shall bring forth more fruit.

But he adds, If not, then after that thou shalt cut it down. Though God bear long, he will not bear always. Barren trees will certainly be cut down at last, and cast into the fire. The longer God has waited the greater will their destruction be: to be cut down after that will be sad indeed. Cutting down, though it is work that shall be done, is work that God does not take pleasure in. Those that now intercede for barren trees, if they persist in their unfruitfulness will be even content to see them cut down. Their best friends will acquiesce in the righteous judgment of God.

I. The miraculous cure of a woman that had been long under a spirit of infirmity. Our Lord Jesus spent his sabbaths in the synagogues, v. 10. We should make conscience of doing so, and not think we can spend the sabbath as well at home in reading a good book. And, when he was in the synagogues on the sabbath day, he was teaching there. He was in his element when he was teaching. Now to confirm the doctrine he preached, he wrought a miracle, a miracle of mercy.

1. The object of charity was a woman in the synagogue that had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, v. 11. She had an infirmity which was such that she was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself; she could not stand erect. Though she was under this infirmity, yet she went to the synagogue on the sabbath day. Even bodily infirmities, unless they be very grievous indeed, should not keep us from public worship on sabbath days; for God can help us, beyond our expectation.

2. The offer of this cure to one that sought it not bespeaks the preventing mercy and grace of Christ: When Jesus saw her, he called her to him, v. 12. Before she called he answered. She came to him to be taught, and to get good to her soul, and then Christ gave this relief to her bodily infirmity. Those whose first and chief care is for their souls do best befriend the true interests of their bodies likewise.

3. The cure effectually and immediately wrought bespeaks his almighty power. He laid his hands on her, and said, "Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity." Though she could in no wise lift up herself, Christ could lift her up, and enable her to lift up herself. She that had been crooked was immediately made straight. This cure represents the work of Christ's grace upon the souls of people, in the conversion of sinners. Unsanctified hearts are under this spirit of infirmity; they are distorted. They can in no wise lift up themselves to God and heaven; the bent of the soul is the quite contrary way. Such crooked souls seek not to Christ; but he calls them to him, speaks a healing word to them, by which he looses them from their infirmity, makes the soul straight. The grace of God can make that straight which the sin of man has made crooked. In the consolation of good people. Many of the children of God are long under a spirit of infirmity, a spirit of bondage. Christ, by his Spirit of adoption, looses them from this infirmity in due time.

4. The present effect of this cure upon the soul of the patient as well as upon her body. She glorified God. When crooked souls are made straight, they will show it by their glorifying God.

II. The offence that was taken at this by the ruler of the synagogue. He had indignation at it, because it was on the sabbath day, v. 14. What light can shine so clear, so strong, that a spirit of bigotry will not serve to shut men's eyes against it? He said to the people, reflecting upon Christ in what he said, There are six days in which men ought to work, in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the sabbath day. See here how light he made of the miracles Christ wrought, as if they were things of course: "You may come and be healed any day of the week." Christ's cures were become, in his eyes, cheap and common things. This was evidently the work of God; and, when God tied us out from working that day, did he tie himself out? The same word in Hebrew signifies both godly and merciful (chesed), to intimate that works of mercy and charity are in a manner works of piety and therefore very proper on sabbath days.

III. Christ's justification of himself in what he had done (v. 15): The Lord then answered him, Thou hypocrite. We must judge charitably, and can judge only according to the outward appearance. Christ knew that he had a real enmity to him and to his gospel, that he did but cloak this with a pretended zeal for the sabbath day. Christ could have told him this, but he vouchsafes to reason the case with him.

1. He appeals to the common practice among the Jews, which was never disallowed, that of watering their cattle on the sabbath day. Those cattle that are kept up in the stable are constantly loosed from the stall on the sabbath day, and led away to watering. It would be a barbarous thing not to do it. Letting the cattle rest on the sabbath day, would be worse than working them, if they must be made to fast on that day.

2. He applies this to the present case (v. 16): "Must the ox and the ass have compassion shown them on the sabbath day, and shall not this woman be loosed from a much greater grievance? She is a daughter of Abraham; she is your sister, and shall she be denied a favour that you grant to an ox or an ass? She is a daughter of Abraham, and therefore is entitled to the Messiah's blessings. She is one whom Satan has bound. Therefore it was not only an act of charity to the poor woman, but of piety to God, to break the power of the devil. She has been in this deplorable condition lo, these eighteen years, and therefore, now that there is an opportunity of delivering her, it ought not to be deferred a day longer. Any of you would have thought eighteen years' affliction full long enough."

IV. The different effect that this had upon those that heard him.

1. What a confusion this was to the malice of his persecutors: When he had said these things, all his adversaries were ashamed (v. 17). It was not a shame that worked repentance, but rather indignation.

2. What a confirmation this was to the faith of his friends: All the people rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by him. The shame of his foes was the joy of his followers. The things Christ did were glorious things, and we ought to rejoice in them.

Verses 18–22

I. The gospel's progress foretold in two parables, which we had before, Matt. xiii. 31–33. Christ undertakes here to show what the kingdom of God is like (v. 18): "Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God? v. 20. It will be quite another thing from what you expect. You expect it will appear great, and will arrive at its perfection all of a sudden; but you are mistaken, it is like a grain of mustard-seed, a little thing, makes but a little figure, and promises but little; yet, when sown it waxes a great tree, v. 19." Many perhaps were prejudiced against the gospel, because its beginning was so small. Christ would remove this prejudice, by assuring them that though its beginning was small its latter end should greatly increase; so that many should come upon the wing, to lodge in the branches of it. "You expect it will make its way by external means, but it shall work like leaven, silently and insensibly, and without any force or violence," v. 21. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump; so the doctrine of Christ will strangely diffuse its relish into the world of mankind. But you must give it time, and you will find it does wonders. By degrees the whole will be leavened.

II. Christ's progress towards Jerusalem recorded: He went through the cities and villages, teaching and journeying, v. 22. Here we find Christ journeying towards Jerusalem, to the feast of dedication, which was in the winter, when travelling was uncomfortable.

Verses 23–30

I. A question put to our Lord Jesus. Who it was that put it we are not told, whether a friend or a foe. The question was, Are there few that are saved? v. 23. Perhaps it was a captious question. If he should say that many would be saved, they would reproach him as too loose; if few, they would reproach him as precise and strait-laced. In nothing do men more betray their ignorance than in judging of the salvation of others. Perhaps it was a curious question, a nice speculation. Many are more inquisitive respecting who shall be saved, and who not, than respecting what they shall do to be saved. Perhaps it was an admiring question. He had taken notice how strict the law of Christ was, and how bad the world was, and, comparing these together, cries out, "How few are there that will be saved!" We have reason to wonder that of the many to whom the word of salvation is sent there are so few to whom it is indeed a saving word. Perhaps it was an enquiring question: "If there be few that be saved, what then? What influence should this have upon me?"

II. Christ's answer to this question. Our Saviour did not give a direct answer to this enquiry, for he came to guide men's consciences, not to gratify their curiosity. Not, "What shall become of such and such?" But, "What shall I do, and what will become of me?"

1. A quickening exhortation and direction: Strive to enter in at the strait gate. This is directed not to him only that asked the question, but to all: Strive ye. All that will be saved must enter in at the strait gate, and must submit to a strict discipline. Those that would enter in at the strait gate must strive to enter. It is a hard matter to get to heaven, and a point that will not be gained without a great deal of care and pains. "Be in an agony; strive as those that run for a prize; excite and exert ourselves to the utmost."

2. Divers awakening considerations.

(1) Think how many take some pains for salvation and yet perish because they do not take enough. Many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able; they seek, but they do not strive. The reason why many come short of grace and glory is because they rest in a lazy seeking. They have a good mind to happiness, and a good opinion of holiness, and take some good steps towards both. But their convictions are weak; their desires are cold, and their endeavours feeble, and there is no strength or steadiness in their resolutions; and thus they come short.

(2) Think of the distinguishing day that is coming and the decisions of that day: The Master of the house will rise up, and shut to the door, v. 25. Now he seems as if he left things at large; but the day is coming when he will rise up, and shut to the door. What door? A door of distinction. Now, within the temple of the church there are carnal professors who worship in the outer-court, and spiritual professors who worship within the veil; between these the door is now open. But, when the Master of the house is risen up, the door will be shut between them, that those who are in the outer-court may be kept out. As to those that are filthy, shut the door upon them, that those who are within may be kept within, that those who are holy may be holy still. The door is shut to separate between the precious and the vile. A door of denial and exclusion. The door of mercy and grace has long stood open to them, but they would not come in by it; they hoped to get to heaven by their own merits, and therefore when the Master of the house is risen up he will justly shut that door.

(3) Think how many who were very confident that they should be saved will be rejected in the day of trial, and you will say that there are few that shall be saved and that we are all concerned to strive. Consider,

[1] How far their hope carried them, even to heaven's gate. There they stand and knock, knock as those that belong to the house, saying, "Lord, Lord, open to us, for we think we have a right to enter." Many are ruined by an ill-grounded hope of heaven, which they never distrusted or called in question. They call Christ, Lord; they are desirous now to enter in by that door which they had formerly made light of.

[2] What grounds they had for this confidence. Let us see what their plea is, v. 26. They had been Christ's guests and had shared in his favours: We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, at thy table. They had been Christ's hearers: "Thou hast taught in our streets. Wouldest thou teach us, and not save us?"

[3] How their confidence will fail them. Christ will say to them, I know you not whence you are, v. 25. And again (v. 27), I tell you, I know you not, depart from me. First, He disowns them: "I know you not; you do not belong to my family." The Lord knows them that are his, but them that are not he does not know, he has nothing to do with them. Secondly, He discards them: Depart from me. "Depart from my door, here is nothing for you." Thirdly, He gives them such a character as is the reason of this doom: You are workers of iniquity. This is their ruin, that, under a pretence of piety, they did the devil's drudgery in Christ's livery.

[4] How terrible their punishment will be (v. 28): There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, the utmost degree of grief and indignation: You shall see the patriarchs and prophets in the kingdom of God, and yourselves thrust out. The Old Testament saints are in the kingdom of God; they saw his day at a distance and it reflected comfort upon them. New Testament sinners will be thrust out of the kingdom of God. They shall be thrust out with shame, as having no part or lot in the matter. The sight of the saint's glory will be a great aggravation of sinner's misery.

(4) Think who are they that shall be saved, notwithstanding: They shall come from the east and the west; and the last shall be first, v. 29, 30. By what Christ said, it appears that but few shall be saved of those who we think most likely. Yet do not say then that the gospel is preached in vain. There shall come many from all parts of the Gentile world that shall be admitted. When we come to heaven, we shall meet a great many there whom we little thought to have met there, and miss a great many thence whom we verily expected to have found there. Those who sit down in the kingdom of God are such as had taken pains to get thither, for they came from far—from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south. This shows that they who would enter into that kingdom must strive. Many who stood fair for heaven came short, and others who seemed cast behind will win and wear this prize, and therefore it concerns us to strive to enter. Shall I, who started first, and stood nearest, miss of heaven, when others, less likely, enter into it? If it be got by striving, why should not I strive?

Verses 31–35

I. A suggestion to Christ of his danger from Herod, now that he was in Galilee, within Herod's jurisdiction (v. 31): Certain of the Pharisees came to Christ, and said, Get thee out of this country, and depart hence, for otherwise Herod will kill thee. Some think that these Pharisees had no ground at all for this, but that they framed this lie, to drive him out of Galilee, and to drive him into Judea, where they knew there were those that really sought his life. But, Christ's answer being directed to Herod himself, it should seem that the Pharisees had ground for what they said, and that Herod was enraged against Christ, and designed him a mischief. Herod was willing to get rid of Christ. He hoped to frighten him away by sending him this threatening message.

II. His defiance of Herod's rage: Go you, and tell that fox so, v. 32. In calling him a fox, he gives him his true character; for he was subtle as a fox, noted for his craft, and treachery, and baseness. And, though it is a black and ugly character, yet it did not ill become Christ to give it to him. For Christ was a prophet, and prophets always had a liberty of speech in reproving princes and great men. Therefore it became him to call this proud king by his own name: "Go, and tell that fox that I do not fear him. I know that I must die, and must die shortly; I expect it, the third day," that is, "very shortly; my hour is at hand. If Herod should kill me, he will not surprise me. Tell him I do not fear him; when I die, I shall be perfected; I shall have completed my business"; I shall be consecrated. When Christ died, he is said to have sanctified himself; he consecrated himself to his priestly office with his own blood. "I know that neither he nor any one else can kill me till I have done my work. I will cast out devils, and do cures, today and tomorrow, in spite of him and all his threats. It is not in his power to hinder me. I must go about preaching and healing, today, and tomorrow, and the day following." It is good for us to look upon the time we have before us as but a little, that we may thereby be quickened to do the work of the day in its day. And it is a comfort to us, in reference to the power and malice of our enemies, that they can have no power to take us off as long as God has any work for us to do. "I know that Herod can do me no harm, not only because my time is not yet come, but because the place appointed for my death is Jerusalem, which is not within his jurisdiction: It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem." Now none undertook to try prophets, but the great sanhedrim, which always sat at Jerusalem; and therefore, if a prophet be put to death, it must be at Jerusalem.

III. His lamentation for Jerusalem, and his denunciation of wrath against that city, v. 34, 35. This we had in Matt xxiii. 37–39. 1. The wickedness of persons and places that more eminently than others profess relation to God is in a particular manner provoking and grieving to the Lord Jesus. How pathetically does he speak of the sin and ruin of that holy city! O Jerusalem! O Jerusalem! 2. Those that enjoy great plenty of the means of grace, if they are not profited by them, are often prejudiced against them. If men's corruptions are not conquered, they are provoked. 3. Jesus Christ has shown himself willing to receive and entertain poor souls that come to him: How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings, with such care and tenderness! 4. I would, I often would, and ye would not. Christ's willingness aggravates sinners' unwillingness. 5. The house that Christ leaves is left desolate. The temple is desolate if Christ has deserted it. He leaves it to them; let them take it to themselves, and make their best of it, Christ will trouble it no more. 6. Christ justly withdraws from those that drive him from them. They would not be gathered by him, and therefore, saith he, "You shall not see me any more." 7. The judgment of the great day will effectually convince unbelievers that would not now be convinced: "Then you will say, Blessed is he that cometh"—"you will not see me to be the Messiah till then when it is too late."

CHAP. XIV

I. The cure which our Lord Jesus wrought upon a man that had the dropsy, on the sabbath day, ver. 1–6. II. A lesson of humility, ver. 7–11. III A lesson of charity, ver. 12–14. IV. The success of the gospel offer foretold in the parable of the guests invited to a feast, ver. 15–24. V. The great law of discipleship laid down, ver. 25–35.

Verses 1–6

I. The Son of man came eating and drinking, conversing familiarly with all sorts of people. Here he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread on the sabbath day, v. 1. See how favourable God is to us, that he allows us time, even on his own day, for bodily refreshments; and how careful we should be not to abuse that liberty. Christ went only to eat bread, to take such refreshment as was necessary on the sabbath day. Our sabbath meals must, with a particular care, be guarded against all manner of excess.

II. He went about doing good. Here was a certain man before him who had the dropsy, v. 2. Christ prevented him with the blessings of his goodness, and before he called he answered him. It is a happy thing to be where Christ is. This man had the dropsy, it is probable, in a high degree.

III. He endured the contradiction of sinners against himself: They watched him, v. 1. The Pharisee that invited him, it should seem, did it with a design to pick some quarrel with him. When Christ asked them whether they thought it lawful to heal on the sabbath day they would say neither yea nor nay, for their design was to inform against him, not to be informed by him. They would not say it was lawful to heal, they could not for shame say it was not lawful. Good men have often been persecuted for doing that which even their persecutors could not but own to be lawful and good. Many a good work Christ did, for which they cast stones at him and his name.

IV. Christ would not be hindered from doing good by the opposition and contradiction of sinners. He took him, and healed him, and let him go, v. 4. He took him, that is, he laid hands on him, to cure him; he embraced him, took him in his arms, big and unwieldly as he was (for so dropsical people generally are), and reduced him to shape. Christ cured even that disease, perfectly cured it, in a moment. He then let him go, lest the Pharisees should fall upon him for being healed, for what absurdities would not such men as they were be guilty of?

V. Our Lord Jesus did nothing but what he could justify, v. 5, 6. He still answered their thoughts, and made them hold their peace for shame who before held their peace for subtlety, by an appeal to their own practice. Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not pull him out on the sabbath day, and that straightway, not deferring it till the sabbath be over, lest it perish? It is not so much out of compassion to the poor creature that they do it as a concern for their own interest. It is their own ox, and their own ass, that is worth money, that they will dispense with the law of the sabbath for the saving of. Many can easily dispense with that, for their own interest, which they cannot dispense with for God's glory and the good of their brethren. This question silenced them: They could not answer him again to these things, v. 6. Christ will be justified when he speaks.

Verses 7–14

Our Lord Jesus here sets us an example of profitable edifying discourse at our tables, when we are in company with our friends. When he was in company with strangers, nay, with enemies that watched him, he took occasion to reprove what he saw amiss in them, and to instruct them. We must not only not allow any corrupt communication at our tables, but we must go beyond common harmless talk, and should take occasion from God's goodness to us at our tables to speak well of him, and learn to spiritualise common things. Our Lord Jesus was among persons of quality, yet, as one that had not respect of persons,

I. He takes occasion to reprove the guests for striving to sit uppermost.

1. He observed how these lawyers and Pharisees affected the highest seats, v. 7. He had charged that sort of men with this in general, ch. xi. 43. Here he brings home the charge to particular persons. He marked how they chose out the chief rooms; every man, as he came in, got as near the best seat as he could. Even in the common actions of life, Christ's eye is upon us, and he marks what we do.

2. He observed how those who were thus aspiring often exposed themselves, and came off with a slur; whereas those who were modest, and seated themselves in the lowest seats, often gained respect by it. Those who assume the highest seats, may perhaps be degraded, and forced to come down to give place to one more honourable, v. 8, 9. It ought to check our high thoughts of ourselves to think how many there are that are more honourable than we, not only in respect of worldly dignities, but of personal merits and accomplishments. The master of the feast will marshal his guests, and will not see the more honourable kept out of the seat that is his due, and therefore will make bold to take him lower that usurped it: Give this man place. Pride will have shame, and will at last have a fall. Those who content themselves with the lowest seats, are likely to be preferred (v. 10): "Go, and seat thyself in the lowest room, as taking it for granted that thy friend has guests to come that are of better rank and quality than thou art; but perhaps it may not prove so, and then it will be said to thee, Friend, go up higher." The way to rise high is to begin low: "Thou shalt have honour and respect before those that sit with thee. They will see thee to be an honourable man. Honour appears the brighter for shining out of obscurity. They will likewise see thee to be a humble man, which is the greatest honour of all." A parable out of one of the rabbin is somewhat like this. "Three men," said he, "were bidden to a feast; one sat highest, For, said he, I am a prince; the other next, For, said he, I am a wise man; the other lowest, For, said he, I am a humble man. The king seated the humble man highest, and put the prince lowest."

3. He applied this generally, and would have us all learn not to mind high things. Pride and ambition are disgraceful before men: for whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; but humility and self-denial are really honourable: he that humbleth himself shall be exalted, v. 11.

II. He takes occasion to reprove the master of the feast for inviting so many rich people, when he should rather have invited the poor. Our Saviour here teaches us that the using of what we have in works of charity is better than using it in magnificent housekeeping.

1. "Covet not to treat the rich; invite not thy friends, and brethren, and neighbours, that are rich," v. 12. This does not prohibit the entertaining of such, for the cultivating of friendship among relations and neighbours. "Do not make a common custom of it. One feast for the rich will make a great many meals for the poor. Be not proud of it." Many make feasts only to make a show, and thus rob their families, to please their fancies. "Aim not at being paid again in your own coin." This is that which our Saviour blames in making such entertainments: "You commonly do it in hopes that you will be invited by them, and so a recompense will be made you."

2. "Be forward to relieve the poor (v. 13, 14): When thou makest a feast invite the poor and maimed, such as have nothing to live upon, nor are able to work for their living. These are objects of charity; they want necessaries; furnish them, and they will recompense thee with their prayers. They will go away, and thank God for thee. Say not that thou art a loser, because they cannot recompense thee, for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Works of charity perhaps may not be rewarded in this world, for the things of this world are not the best things, but they shall in no wise lose their reward. It will be found that the longest voyages make the richest returns.

1. The occasion of the discourse was given by one of the guests, who said to him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God (v. 15).

1. But with what design does this man bring it in here? (1) Perhaps this man, fearing he should put the company out of humour, started this, to divert the discourse to something else. Or, (2) Admiring the good rules which Christ had now given, but despairing to see them lived up to, he longs for the kingdom of God, and pronounces them blessed who shall have a place in that kingdom. Or, (3) Christ having mentioned the resurrection of the just, he here confirms what he said, "Yea, Lord, they that shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, shall eat bread in the kingdom." Or, (4) Observing Christ to be silent, he was willing to draw him in again to further discourse; and he knew nothing more likely to engage him than to mention the kingdom of God. Even those that are not of ability to carry on good discourse themselves ought to put in a word now and then, to help it forward.

2. Now what this man said was a plain and acknowledged truth, and it was quoted very appositely now that they were sitting at meat. This thought will be very seasonable when we are partaking of bodily refreshments: Blessed are they that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God. (1) In the kingdom of grace. Christ promised his disciples that they should eat and drink with him in his kingdom. (2) In the kingdom of glory. Blessed are they that shall sit down at that table, whence they shall rise no more.

II. The parable which our Lord Jesus put forth upon this occasion, v. 16, &c. "But who are they that shall enjoy that privilege? You Jews will generally reject it, and the Gentiles will be the greatest sharers in it." Now in the parable we may observe,

1. The free grace and mercy of God, shining in the gospel of Christ; it appears,

(1) In the rich provision he has made for poor souls (v. 16): A certain man made a great supper. It is called a supper, because in those countries supper time was the chief feasting time.

(2) In the gracious invitation given us to come and partake of this provision. A general invitation given: He bade many. Christ invited the whole nation and people of the Jews to partake of the benefits of his gospel. Christ in the gospel, as he keeps a good house, keeps an open house. A particular memorandum given; the servant was sent round to put them in mind of it: Come, for all things are now ready. This is the call now given to us: "All things are now ready, now is the accepted time; and therefore come now; do not delay; accept the invitation; believe yourselves welcome."

2. The cold entertainment which the grace of the gospel meets with. The invited guests declined coming. They all with one consent began to make excuse, v. 18. They all found out some pretence or other to shift off their attendance. This bespeaks the general neglect of the Jewish nation to close with Christ. It also intimates the backwardness there is in most people to close with the gospel call. They cannot for shame avow their refusal, but they desire to be excused. They were unanimous in it; with one voice. Here were two that were purchasers. One had bought a piece of ground which was represented to him to be a good bargain, and he must needs go and see whether it was so or no; and therefore I pray thee have me excused. But what a frivolous excuse was this! He might have deferred going to see his piece of ground till the next day, and have found it in the same place and plight it was now in. Another had purchased stock for his land. "I have bought five yoke of oxen for the plough, and I must just now go and prove them, and therefore excuse me for this time." The former intimates that inordinate complacency in the world, this the inordinate care and concern about the world, which keep people from Christ and his grace. It is very criminal, when we are called to any duty, to make excuses for our neglect of it: it is a sign that there are convictions that it is duty, but no inclination to it. These things here were, [1] Little things. It had better become them to have said, "I am invited to eat bread in the kingdom of God, and therefore must be excused from going to see the ground or the oxen." [2] Lawful things. Things lawful in themselves, when the heart is too much set upon them, prove fatal hindrances in religion. Here was one that was newly married (v. 30): I have married a wife, and therefore, in short, I cannot come. He pretends that he cannot, when the truth is he will not. Thus many pretend inability for the duties of religion when really they have an aversion to them. Our affection to our relations often proves a hindrance to us in our duty to God. He might have gone and taken his wife along with him; they would both have been welcome.

3. The account which was brought to the master of the feast of the affront put upon him by his friends, who now showed how little they valued him (v. 21): That servant came, and showed his lord these things, told him with surprise that he was likely to sup alone. He made the matter neither better nor worse, but related it just as it was. Ministers must give account of the success of their ministry. They must do it now at the throne of grace. If they see of the travail of their soul, they must go to God with their thanks; if they labour in vain, they must go to God with their complaints. The apostle urges this as a reason why people should give ear to the word of God sent them by his ministers; for they watch for your souls, as those that must give account, Heb. xiii. 17.

4. The master's just resentment of this affront: He was angry, v. 21. The ingratitude of those that slight gospel offers, and the contempt they put upon the God of heaven thereby, are a very great provocation to him, and justly so. Abused mercy turns into the greatest wrath. None of the men that were bidden shall taste of my supper. Grace despised is grace forfeited, like Esau's birthright. They that will not have Christ when they may shall not have him when they would.

5. The care that was taken to furnish the table with guests, as well as meat. "Go" (saith he to the servants), "go first into the streets and lanes of the city that you may invite those that will be glad to come, bring in hither the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind; pick up the common beggars." They soon gather an abundance of such guests: Lord, it is done as thou hast commanded. Many of the Jews are brought in, not of the scribes and Pharisees, but publicans and sinners; these are the poor and the maimed. But yet there is room for more guests. "Go, then, secondly, into the highways and hedges. Go out into the country, and pick up the vagrants, or those that are returning now in the evening from their work in the field, and compel them to come in, not by force of arms, but by force of arguments. Be earnest with them; for in this case it will be necessary to convince them that the invitation is sincere. They will hardly believe that they shall be welcome, and therefore do not leave them till you have prevailed with them." This refers to the calling of the Gentiles, and with them the church was filled. (1) The provision made for precious souls in the gospel of Christ shall appear not to have been made in vain; for, if some reject it, yet others will thankfully accept the offer of it. (2) Those that are very poor and low in the world shall be as welcome to Christ as the rich and great. Christ here plainly refers to what he had said just before, to invite to our tables the poor and maimed, the lame and blind, v. 13. His condescensions and compassions towards them should engage ours. (3) Many times the gospel has the greatest success among those that are least likely to have the benefit of it. The publicans and harlots went into the kingdom of God before the scribes and Pharisees; so the last shall be first, and the first last. Let us not be confident concerning those that are most forward, nor despair of those that are least promising. (4) Christ's ministers must be both very expeditious and very importunate in inviting to the gospel feast: "Go out quickly (v. 21); lose no time, because all things are now ready." (5) Though many have been brought in to partake of the benefits of the gospel, yet still there is room for more. There is in him enough for all, and enough for each; and the gospel excludes none that do not exclude themselves. (6) Christ's house, though it be large, shall at last be filled.

Verses 25–35

He is in these verses directing his discourse to the multitudes that crowded after him, and his exhortation to them is to understand the terms of discipleship.

I. How zealous people were in their attendance on Christ (v. 25): There went great multitudes with him, many for love and more for company. Here was a mixed multitude.

II. How considerate he would have them to be in their zeal. Those that undertake to follow Christ must count upon the worst, and prepare accordingly.

1. He tells them what the worst is that they must count upon. He takes it for granted that they had a mind to be his disciples. They expected that he should say, "If any man come to me, and be my disciple, he shall have wealth and honour in abundance." But he tells them quite the contrary.

(1) They must be willing to quit that which was very dear, rather than quit their interest in Christ, v. 26. A man cannot be Christ's disciple but he must hate father, and mother, and his own life. He is not sincere, he will not be constant and persevering, unless he love Christ better than anything in this world. Mention is not made here of houses and lands; philosophy will teach a man to look upon these with contempt; but Christianity carries it higher. Every good man loves his relations; and yet, if he be a disciple of Christ, he must comparatively hate them. Not that their persons must be in any degree hated, but our comfort and satisfaction in them must be lost and swallowed up in our love to Christ. When our duty to our parents comes in competition with our evident duty to Christ, we must give Christ the preference. If we must either deny Christ or be banished from our families and relations (as many of the primitive Christians were), we must rather lose their society than his favour. Every man loves his own life, no man ever yet hated it; and we cannot be Christ's disciples if we do not love him better than our own lives. The experience of the pleasures of the spiritual life, and the believing hopes and prospects of eternal life will make this hard saying easy. When tribulation and persecution arise because of the word, then chiefly the trial is. Yet even in days of peace this matter is sometimes brought to the trial. Those that are ashamed to confess him, for fear of disobliging a relation or friend, or losing a customer, give cause to suspect that they love him better than Christ.

(2) That they must be willing to bear that which was very heavy (v. 27): Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and so come after me, he cannot be my disciple. Though the disciples of Christ are not all crucified, yet they all bear their cross. They must be content to be put into an ill name, for no name is more ignominious than Furcifer—the bearer of the gibbet. He must bear his cross, and come after Christ; that is, he must bear it in the way of his duty, whenever it lies in that way. He must bear it when Christ calls him to it, and live in hope of a recompense with him.

2. He bids them count upon it, and then consider of it. It is better never to begin than not to proceed; and therefore before we begin we must consider what it is to proceed. This is to act rationally, and as becomes men. The cause of Christ will bear a scrutiny. Satan shows the best, but hides the worst. This considering of the case is necessary to perseverance. Our Saviour here illustrates the necessity of it by two similitudes. We are like a man that undertakes to build a tower, and therefore must consider the expense of it (v. 28–30): Which of you, intending to build a tower sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost? Let him compare the charge with his purse, lest he make himself to be laughed at, by beginning to build what he is not able to finish. All that take upon them a profession of religion undertake to build a tower. Begin low, and lay the foundation deep, lay it on the rock, and make sure work, and then aim as high as heaven. Those that intend to build this tower must sit down and count the cost. Let them consider that it will cost them a life of self-denial and watchfulness. It may, perhaps, cost them their reputation among men, and all that is dear to them in this world, even life itself. And if it should cost us all this, what is it in comparison with what it cost Christ? Many that begin to build this tower do not go on with it, nor persevere in it, and it is their folly. It is true, we have none of us in ourselves sufficient to finish this tower, but Christ hath said, My grace is sufficient for thee. Nothing is more shameful than for those that have begun well in religion to break off.

(2) When we undertake to be Christ's disciples we are like a man that goes to war, and therefore must consider the hazard of it, v. 31, 32. A king that declares war against a neighbouring prince considers whether he has strength wherewith to make his part good, and, if not, he will lay aside his thoughts of war. Is not the Christian life a warfare? We must fight every step we go, so restless are our spiritual enemies in their opposition. We ought to consider whether we can endure the hardness which a good soldier of Jesus Christ must expect and count upon, before we enlist ourselves under Christ's banner. Of the two it is better to make the best terms we can with the world than pretend to renounce it and afterwards return to it. That young man that could not find in his heart to part with his possessions for Christ did better to go away from Christ sorrowing than to have stayed with him dissembling.

This parable is another way applicable, and may be taken as designed to teach us to begin speedily to be religious, rather than to begin cautiously; and may mean the same with Matt. v. 25, Agree with thine adversary quickly. Those that persist in sin make war against God. The proudest and most daring sinner is no equal match for God. In consideration of this, it is our interest to make peace with him. We need not send to desire conditions of peace; they are offered to us, and are unexceptionable. Let us acquaint ourselves with them, and be at peace; do this in time, while the other is yet a great way off.

But the application of this parable here (v. 33) is to the consideration that ought to be exercised when we take upon us a profession of religion. Enter upon a profession of religion, as those that know that except you forsake all you have you cannot be Christ's disciples.

3. He warns them against apostasy, for that would make them utterly useless, v. 34, 35. Good Christians are the salt of the earth, and good ministers especially (Matt. v. 13); salt is good and of great use. Degenerate Christians, who, rather than part with what they have in the world, will throw up their profession, are like salt that has lost its savour, that is the most useless worthless thing in the world; it has no manner of virtue or good property in it. It can never be recovered: Wherewith shall it be seasoned? You cannot salt it. This intimates that it is extremely difficult, and next to impossible, to recover an apostate, Heb. vi. 4–6. It is of no use. It is not fit, as dung is, for the land, to manure that, nor will it be the better if it be laid in the dunghill to rot. A professor of religion whose mind and manners are depraved is the most insipid animal that can be. It is abandoned: Men cast it out, they will have no more to do with it. Such scandalous professors ought to be cast out of the church, because there is danger that others will be infected by them. Our Saviour concludes this with a call to all to take notice of it, and to take warning: He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

CHAP. XV

The murmuring of the scribes and Pharisees at the grace of Christ, and the favour he showed to publicans and sinners, gave occasion for a more full discovery of that grace than perhaps otherwise we should have had in these three parables which we have in this chapter, the scope of all of which is the same, to show, not only what God had said and sworn in the Old Testament, that he had no pleasure in the death and ruin of sinners, but that he has great pleasure in their return and repentance. I. The offence which the Pharisees took at Christ, ver. 1, 2. II. His justifying himself in it, as the bringing of them to repent and reform their lives, than which there could not be a more pleasing and acceptable service done to God, which he shows in the parables, 1. Of the lost sheep that was brought home with joy, ver. 4–7. 2. Of the lost silver that was found with joy, ver. 8–10. 3. Of the lost son that had been a prodigal, but returned to his father's house, and was received with great joy, though his elder brother, like these scribes and Pharisees, was offended at it, ver. 11–32.

Here is, I. The diligent attendance of the publicans and sinners upon Christ's ministry. Great multitudes of Jews went with him (ch. xiv. 25), with such an assurance of admission into the kingdom of God that he found it requisite to say that to them which would shake their vain hopes. Here multitudes of publicans and sinners drew near to him, with a humble modest fear of being rejected by him, and to them he found it requisite to give encouragement. The publicans were perhaps some of them bad men, but they were all industriously put into an ill name, because of the prejudices of the Jewish nation against their office. They are sometimes ranked with harlots (Matt. xxi. 32); here and elsewhere with sinners. They drew near to him, not, as some did, for curiosity to see him, nor as others did, to solicit for cures, but to hear his excellent doctrine. In all our approaches to Christ we must have this in our eye, to hear him; to hear the instructions he gives us, and his answers to our prayers.

II. The offence which the scribes and Pharisees took at this. They murmured, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them, v. 2. 1. They were angry that publicans and heathens had the means of grace allowed them, and were encouraged to hope for pardon upon repentance. 2. They thought it inconsistent with the dignity of his character, to make himself familiar with such sort of people, and to eat with them. They could not, for shame, condemn him for preaching to them, and therefore they reproached him for eating with them, which was more expressly contrary to the tradition of the elders.

III. Christ's justifying himself in it, by showing that the worse these people were, the more glory would redound to God, and the more joy there would be in heaven, if by his preaching they were brought to repentance. It would be a more pleasing sight in heaven to see publicans and sinners live an orderly sort of life than to see scribes and Pharisees go on in living such a life. This he here illustrates by two parables.

1. The parable of the lost sheep. Something like it we had in Matt. xviii. 12. There it was designed to show the care God takes for the preservation of saints; here it is designed to show the pleasure God takes in the conversion of sinners. We have here,

(1) The case of a sinner that goes on in sinful ways. He is like a lost sheep, a sheep gone astray; he is lost to God; lost to the flock; lost to himself: he knows not where he is, wanders endlessly, is continually exposed to the beasts of prey, subject to frights and terrors, taken from under the shepherd's care, and wanting the green pastures; and he cannot of himself find the way back to the fold.

(2) The care the God of heaven takes of poor wandering sinners. There is a particular care to be taken of this lost sheep; and though he has a hundred sheep, yet he will not lose that one, but he goes after it, and shows abundance of care in finding it out. He follows it, looking about for it, until he finds it. God follows backsliding sinners until at length they are wrought upon to think of returning. Though he finds it weary and not able to bear being driven home, yet he does not leave it to perish, but lays it on his shoulders, and, with a great deal of tenderness and labour, brings it to the fold. God sends his Son to seek and save that which was lost, ch. xix. 10. Christ is said to gather the lambs in his arms, and carry them in his bosom, denoting his pity and tenderness. Here he is said to bear them upon his shoulders; those can never perish whom he carries upon his shoulders.

(3) The pleasure that God takes in repenting returning sinners. He lays it on his shoulders rejoicing, and the joy is the greater because he began to be out of hope of finding it; and he calls his friends and neighbours, saying, Rejoice with me. Observe, he calls it his sheep, though a stray, a wandering sheep. Therefore he looks after it himself: I have found it; he did not send a servant, but his own Son, the great and good Shepherd, who will find what he seeks, and will be found of those that seek him not.

2. The parable of the lost piece of silver. (1) The loser is here supposed to be a woman. She has ten pieces of silver, and out of them loses only one. Notwithstanding the sinfulness and misery of the world of mankind there are nine to one, nay, in the foregoing parable there are ninety-nine to one, that retain their integrity, in whom God is praised, and never was dishonoured. (2) That which is lost is a piece of silver. The soul is silver, of intrinsic worth and value; not base metal, as iron or lead, but silver. It is silver coin. It is stamped with God's image and superscription. This silver was lost in the dirt; a soul plunged in the world is like a piece of money in the dirt; anyone would say, It is a thousand pities that it should lie there. (3) Here is a great deal of care and pains taken in quest of it. The woman lights a candle, sweeps the house, and seeks diligently till she finds it. This represents the various means and methods God makes use of to bring lost souls home to himself: he has lighted the candle of the gospel, not to show himself the way to us, but to show us the way to him; his heart is upon it, to bring lost souls to himself. (4) Here is a great deal of joy for the finding of it: Rejoice with me, for I have found the piece which I had lost, v. 9. Those that rejoice desire that others should rejoice with them. The pleasing surprise of finding it put her, for the present, into a kind of transport—I have found, I have found, is the language of joy.

3. The explication of these two parables is to the same purport (v. 7, 10): There is joy in heaven, joy in the presence of the angels of God, over one sinner that repenteth, more than over a great number of just persons, who need no repentance.

(1) The repentance and conversion of sinners on earth are matter of joy and rejoicing in heaven. It is possible that the greatest sinners may be brought to repentance. While there is life there is hope, and the worst are not to be despaired of. God will delight to show them mercy. There is always joy in heaven. God rejoiceth in all his works, but particularly in the works of his grace. He rejoiceth to do good to penitent sinners. He rejoiceth not only in the conversion of nations, but even over one sinner that repenteth, though but one. The good angels will be glad that mercy is shown them. The redemption of mankind was matter of joy in the presence of the angels; for they sung, Glory to God in the highest, ch. ii. 14.

(2) There is more joy over one sinner that repenteth than there is over ninety-nine just persons, who need no repentance. More joy for the conversion of the sinners of the Gentiles, and of those publicans that now heard Christ preach, than for all the praises and devotions, and all the God I thank thee, of the Pharisees, and the other self-justifying Jews, who thought that they needed no repentance. Christ tells them that God was more praised in, and pleased with, the penitent broken heart of one of those despised, envied sinners, than all the long prayers which the scribes and Pharisees made, who could not see anything amiss in themselves; more joy for the conversion of one such great sinner than for the regular conversion of one that had always conducted himself decently and well, and comparatively needs no repentance.

Not but that it is best not to go astray; but the grace of God is more manifested in the reducing of great sinners than in the conducting of those that never went astray. And many times those that have been great sinners before their conversion prove more eminently and zealously good after. They to whom much is forgiven will love much. We are moved with a more sensible joy for the recovery of what we had lost than for the continuance of what we had always enjoyed, for health out of sickness than for health without sickness. A constant course of religion may in itself be more valuable, and yet a sudden return from an evil course and way of sin may yield a more surprising pleasure.

Verses 11–32

We have here the parable of the prodigal son, the scope of which is the same with those before. But the circumstances of the parable do much more largely and fully set forth the riches of gospel grace, and it has been, and will be while the world stands, of unspeakable use to poor sinners.

I. The parable represents God as a common Father to all mankind. He is our Father, for he has the educating and portioning of us. Our Saviour hereby intimates to those proud Pharisees that these publicans and sinners, whom they thus despised, were their brethren, and therefore they ought to be glad of any kindness shown them.

II. It represents the children of men as of different characters. He had two sons, one of them a solid grave youth, reserved and austere, sober himself, but not at all good-humoured to those about him; such a one would adhere to his education, and not be easily drawn from it; but the other volatile and mercurial, and impatient of restraint, roving, and willing to try his fortune, and, if he fall into ill hands, likely to be a rake. Now this latter represents the publicans and sinners, and the Gentiles The former represents the Jews in general, and particularly the Pharisees.

The younger son is the prodigal.

1. His riot and ramble when he was a prodigal, and the extravagances and miseries he fell into.

(1) What his request to his father was (v. 12): He said to his father, "Father, give me"—he might have put a little more in his mouth, and have said, Pray give me, or, Sir, if you please, give me, but he makes an imperious demand—"give me the portion of goods that falleth to me; that which falls to me as my due." It is bad, and the beginning of worse, when men look upon God's gifts as debts. "Give it me all at present in possession, and I will never expect anything in reversion, anything hereafter." The great folly of sinners is being content to have their portion in hand, now in this lifetime to receive their good things. They look only at the things that are seen, and covet only a present gratification, but have no care for a future felicity. And why did he desire to have his portion in his own hands? [1] He was weary of his father's government, and was fond of liberty falsely so called. See the folly of many young men, who never think themselves their own masters till they have broken all God's bands in sunder, and, instead of them, bound themselves with the cords of their own lust. Here is the original of the apostasy of sinners from God; they will not be tied up to the rules of God's government; they will themselves be as gods, knowing no other good and evil than what themselves please. [2] He was willing to get from under his father's eye. A shyness of God, and a willingness to disbelieve his omniscience, are at the bottom of the wickedness of the wicked. [3] He was distrustful of his father's management. He would have his portion of goods himself, for he thought that his father would limit him in his present expenses, and that he did not like. [4] He was proud of himself, and had a great conceit of his own sufficiency. He thought that if he had put his portion in his own hands he could manage it better than his father did, and make a better figure with it. There are more young people ruined by pride than by any one lust whatsoever.

(2) How kind his father was to him: He divided unto them his living. He computed what he had to dispose of between his sons, and gave the younger son his share, and offered the elder his; but, it should seem, he desired his father to keep it in his own hands still, and we may see what he got by it (v. 31): All that I have is thine. He gave the younger son what he asked. He had as much as he expected, and perhaps more. [1] Thus he might now see his father's kindness, how willing he was to please him and make him easy. [2] Thus he would in a little time be made to see his own folly, and that he was not such a wise manager for himself.

(3) How he managed himself when he had got his portion in his own hands. He set himself to spend it as fast as he could, and, in a little time he made himself a beggar: not many days after, v. 13. That which the younger son determined was to be gone presently, and, in order to that, he gathered all together.

Now the condition of the prodigal in this ramble of his represents to us a sinful state, into which man has fallen.

[1] A sinful state is a state of departure and distance from God. It is the sinfulness of sin that it is an apostasy from God. He took his journey from his father's house. Sinners are fled from God. They get as far off him as they can. The world is the far country in which they take up their residence. It is the misery of sinners that they are afar off from God, and are going further and further from him. What is hell itself, but being afar off from God?

[2] A sinful state is a spending state: There he wasted his substance with riotous living (v. 13), devoured it with harlots (v. 30), and in a little time he had spent all, v. 14. He bought fine clothes, associated with those that helped him to make an end of what he had in a little time. But this is to be applied spiritually. Wilful sinners waste their patrimony; for they misemploy their thoughts and all the powers of their souls, do not only bury, but embezzle; the talents they are entrusted to trade with, and the gifts of Providence, which were intended to enable them to serve God and to do good with, are made the food and fuel of their lusts. The soul that is made a drudge, either to the world or to the flesh, wastes its substance, and lives riotously.

[3] A sinful state is a wanting state: When he had spent all there arose a mighty famine in that land, and he began to be in want, v. 14. Wilful waste brings woeful want. Riotous living in time, perhaps in a little time, brings men to a morsel of bread, especially when bad times hasten on the consequences of bad husbandry. This represents the misery of sinners, who have thrown away their own mercies. These they gave away for the pleasure of sense, and the wealth of the world, and then are ready to perish for want of them. Sinners want necessaries for their souls; they have neither food nor raiment for them, nor any provision for hereafter. A sinful state is like a land where famine reigns. Sinners are wretchedly and miserably poor, and, what aggravates it, they brought themselves into that condition.

[4] A sinful state is a vile servile state. When this young man's riot had brought him to want his want brought him to servitude. He went, and joined himself to a citizen of that country, v. 15. The same wicked life that before was represented by riotous living is here represented by servile living. How did this young gentleman debase and disparage himself, when he hired himself into such a service and under such a

that was brought home with joy, ver. 4–7. 2. Of the lost silver that was found with joy, ver. 8–10. 3. Of the lost son that had been a prodigal, but returned to his father's house, and was received with great joy, though his elder brother, like these scribes and Pharisees, was offended at it, ver. 11–32.

There are more young people ruined by pride than by any one lust whatsoever.

(2) How kind his father was to him: He divided unto them his living. He computed what he had to dispose of between his sons, and gave the younger son his share, and offered the elder his; but, it should seem, he desired his father to keep it in his own hands still, and we may see what he got by it (v. 31): All that I have is thine. He gave the younger son what he asked. He had as much as he expected, and perhaps more. [1] Thus he might now see his father's kindness, how willing he was to please him and make him easy. [2] Thus he would in a little time be made to see his own folly, and that he was not such a wise manager for himself.

(3) How he managed himself when he had got his portion in his own hands. He set himself to spend it as fast as he could, and, in a little time he made himself a beggar: not many days after, v. 13. That which the younger son determined was to be gone presently, and, in order to that, he gathered all together.

Now the condition of the prodigal in this ramble of his represents to us a sinful state, into which man has fallen.

[1] A sinful state is a state of departure and distance from God. It is the sinfulness of sin that it is an apostasy from God. He took his journey from his father's house. Sinners are fled from God. They get as far off him as they can. The world is the far country in which they take up their residence. It is the misery of sinners that they are afar off from God, and are going further and further from him. What is hell itself, but being afar off from God?

[2] A sinful state is a spending state: There he wasted his substance with riotous living (v. 13), devoured it with harlots (v. 30), and in a little time he had spent all, v. 14. He bought fine clothes, associated with those that helped him to make an end of what he had in a little time. But this is to be applied spiritually. Wilful sinners waste their patrimony; for they misemploy their thoughts and all the powers of their souls, do not only bury, but embezzle; the talents they are entrusted to trade with, and the gifts of Providence, which were intended to enable them to serve God and to do good with, are made the food and fuel of their lusts. The soul that is made a drudge, either to the world or to the flesh, wastes its substance, and lives riotously.

[3] A sinful state is a wanting state: When he had spent all there arose a mighty famine in that land, and he began to be in want, v. 14. Wilful waste brings woeful want. Riotous living in time, perhaps in a little time, brings men to a morsel of bread, especially when bad times hasten on the consequences of bad husbandry. This represents the misery of sinners, who have thrown away their own mercies. These they gave away for the pleasure of sense, and the wealth of the world, and then are ready to perish for want of them. Sinners want necessaries for their souls; they have neither food nor raiment for them, nor any provision for hereafter. A sinful state is like a land where famine reigns. Sinners are wretchedly and miserably poor, and, what aggravates it, they brought themselves into that condition.

[4] A sinful state is a vile servile state. When this young man's riot had brought him to want his want brought him to servitude. He went, and joined himself to a citizen of that country, v. 15. The same wicked life that before was represented by riotous living is here represented by servile living. How did this young gentleman debase and disparage himself, when he hired himself into such a service and under such a master as this! He sent him into the fields, not to feed sheep but to feed swine. The business of the devil's servants is to make provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof, and that is no better than feeding greedy, dirty, noisy swine; and how can rational immortal souls more disgrace themselves?

[5] A sinful state is a state of perpetual dissatisfaction. He would fain have filled his belly with the husks which the swine did eat, v. 16. A fine pass my young master had brought himself to, to be fellow-commoner with the swine! That which sinners, when they depart from God, promise themselves satisfaction in, will certainly disappoint them; they are labouring for that which satisfieth not, Isa. lv. 2. Husks are food for swine, but not for men. The wealth of the world and the entertainments of sense will serve for bodies; but what are these to precious souls? They neither suit their nature, nor satisfy their desires, nor supply their needs.

[6] A sinful state is a state which cannot expect relief from any creature. This prodigal, when he would not earn his bread by working, took to begging; but no man gave unto him. Those who depart from God cannot be helped by any creature. In vain do we cry to the world and the flesh; they have that which will poison a soul, but have nothing to give it which will feed and nourish it.

[7] A sinful state is a state of death: This my son was dead, v. 23, 32. A sinner is not only dead in law, as he is under a sentence of death, but dead in trespasses and sins, destitute of spiritual life; no union with Christ, no living to God, and therefore dead. The prodigal in the far country was dead to his father and his family, and it is his own doing.

[8] A sinful state is a lost state: This my son was lost—lost to everything that was good—lost to his father's house. Souls that are separated from God are lost souls; lost as a traveller that is out of his way, and, if infinite mercy prevent not, will soon be lost irrecoverably.

[9] A sinful state is a state of madness and frenzy. This is intimated in that expression (v. 17), when he came to himself, which intimates that he had been beside himself. Surely he was so when he left his father's house, and much more so when he joined himself to the citizen of that country. Sinners, like those that are mad, destroy themselves with foolish lusts, and yet at the same time deceive themselves with foolish hopes.

2. We have here his return from this ramble. Now observe here,

(1) What was the occasion of his return and repentance. It was his affliction; when he was in want, then he came to himself. Afflictions, when they are sanctified by divine grace, prove happy means of turning sinners from the error of their ways. When we find the insufficiency of creatures to make us happy, and have tried all other ways of relief for our poor souls in vain, then it is time to think of returning to God. When we see what miserable comforters, what physicians of no value, all but Christ are; no man gives unto us what we need, then surely we shall apply ourselves to Jesus Christ.

(2) What was the preparative for it; it was consideration. He said within himself when he recovered his right mind, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough! Consideration is the first step towards conversion. He considered how bad his condition was: I perish with hunger. Not only, "I am hungry," but, "I perish with hunger." Sinners will not come to the service of Christ till they are brought to see themselves just ready to perish in the service of sin. And though we be thus driven to Christ he will not think himself dishonoured by our being forced to him, but rather honoured by his being applied to in a desperate case.

He considered how much better it might be made if he would but return: How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough, and to spare, such a good house does he keep! In our Father's house there is bread for all his family. There is enough and to spare, enough for all, enough for each, enough and to spare for charity. There are crumbs that fall from his table, which many would be glad of, and thankful for. Even the hired servants in God's family are well provided for. The consideration of this should encourage sinners, that have gone astray from God, to think of returning to him.

(3) What was the purpose of it. His consideration issues, at length, in this conclusion: I will arise, and go to my father. Good purposes are good things, but still good performances are all in all. He determined what to do: I will arise and go to my father. Though he be in a far country, a great way off from his father's house, yet, far as it is, he will return; every step of backsliding from God must be a step back again in return to him. Observe with what resolution he speaks: "I will arise, and go to my father; I am resolved I will, whatever the issue be." He determined what to say. True repentance is a rising, and coming to God. But what words shall we take with us? In all our addresses to God, it is good to deliberate with ourselves beforehand what we shall say, that we may order our cause before him. Let us observe what he purposed to say.

First, He would confess his fault and folly: I have sinned. Forasmuch as we have all sinned, it behoves us to own that we have sinned. The confession of sin is required and insisted upon, as a necessary condition of peace and pardon. If we plead not guilty, we put ourselves upon a trial. If guilty, with a contrite, penitent, and obedient heart, we refer ourselves to the covenant of grace, which offers forgiveness to those that confess their sins.

Secondly, He would be so far from extenuating the matter that he would lay a load upon himself for it: I have sinned against Heaven, and before thee. Let those that are undutiful to their earthly parents think of this; they sin against Heaven, and before God. Offences against them are offences against God. Sin is committed in contempt of God's authority over us: We have sinned against Heaven. The malignity of sin aims high; it is against Heaven. Yet it is impotent malice, for we cannot hurt the heavens. Nay, it is foolish malice; what is shot against the heavens will return upon the head of him that shoots it. It is committed in contempt of God's eye upon us: "I have sinned against Heaven, and yet before thee."

Thirdly, He would acknowledge himself to have forfeited all the privileges of the family: I am no more worthy to be called thy son, v. 19. He does not deny the relation (for that was all he had to trust to), but he owns that his father might justly deny the relation. He had, at his own demand, the portion of goods that belonged to him, and had reason to expect no more. It becomes sinners to acknowledge themselves unworthy to receive any favour from God.

Fourthly, He would nevertheless sue for admission into the family, though it were into the meanest post there: "Make me as one of thy hired servants; that is good enough, and too good for me." If it be imposed on him as a mortification to sit with the servants, he will not only submit to it, but count it a preferment in comparison with his present state. "Make me as a hired servant, that I may show I love my father's house as much as ever I slighted it."

Fifthly, In all this he would have an eye to his father as a father: "I will arise, and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father. Eyeing God as a Father, and our Father, will be of great use in our repentance and return to him. It will make our sorrow for sin genuine, our resolutions against it strong, and encourage us to hope for pardon. God delights to be called Father both by penitents and petitioners.

(4) What was the performance of this purpose: He arose, and came to his father. His good resolve he put in execution without delay; he struck while the iron was hot. Have we said that we will arise and go? Let us immediately arise and come. He did not come halfway, and then pretend that he was tired and could get no further, but, weak and weary as he was, he made a thorough business of it.

3. We have here his reception and entertainment with his father: He came to his father; but was he welcome? Yes, heartily welcome. And, by the way, it is an example to parents whose children have been foolish and disobedient, if they repent, not to be harsh and severe with them, but to be governed by the wisdom that is from above, which is gentle and easy to be entreated. But it is chiefly designed to set forth the grace and mercy of God to poor sinners that repent and return to him, and his readiness to forgive them. Now here observe,

(1) The great love and affection wherewith the father received the son: When he was yet a great way off his father saw him, v. 20. He expressed his kindness before the son expressed his repentance. Even before we call he answers; for he knows what is in our hearts. How lively are the images presented here! [1] Here were eyes of mercy, and those eyes quick-sighted: When he was yet a great way off his father saw him, as if from the top of some high tower he had been looking that way which his son was gone, with such a thought as this, "O that I could see yonder wretched son of mine coming home!" This intimates God's desire of the conversion of sinners, and his readiness to meet them that are coming towards him. He is aware of the first inclination towards him. [2] Here were bowels of mercy, yearning at the sight of his son: He had compassion. Misery is the object of pity, even the misery of a sinner; though he has brought it upon himself, yet God compassionates. [3] Here were feet of mercy, and those feet quick-paced: He ran. The prodigal son came slowly, under a burden of shame and fear; but the tender father ran to meet him with his encouragements. [4] Here were arms of mercy, and those arms stretched out to embrace him: He fell on his neck. Though guilty and deserving to be beaten, though dirty and newly come from feeding swine, yet he thus takes him in his arms, and lays him in his bosom. Thus dear are true penitents to God, thus welcome to the Lord Jesus. [5] Here were lips of mercy. He kissed him. This kiss not only assured him of his welcome, but sealed his pardon; his former follies shall be all forgiven, nor is one word said by way of upbraiding.

(2) The penitent submission which the poor prodigal made to his father (v. 21): He said unto him, Father, I have sinned. As it commends the good father's kindness that he showed it before the prodigal expressed his repentance, so it commends the prodigal's repentance that he expressed it after his father had shown him so much kindness. When he had received the kiss which sealed his pardon, yet he said, Father, I have sinned. Even those that have received the pardon of their sins must have in their hearts a sincere contrition for it. The more we see of God's readiness to forgive us, the more difficult it should be to us to forgive ourselves.

(3) The splendid provision which this kind father made for the returning prodigal. One word we find in his purpose to say (v. 19) which we do not find that he did say (v. 21), and that was, Make me as one of thy hired servants. We cannot think that he forgot it, much less that he changed his mind, but his father interrupted him, prevented his saying it: "Hold, son, thou art heartily welcome, and, though not worthy to be called a son, shalt be treated as a dear son." He who is thus entertained at first needs not ask to be made as a hired servant, It is strange that here is not one word of rebuke: "You could never find the way home till beaten hither with your own rod." No, here is nothing like this; which intimates that, when God forgives the sins of true penitents, he forgets them, he remembers them no more. But this is not all; here is rich and royal provision made for him, far beyond what he did or could expect. He would have thought it sufficient if his father had but taken notice of him, and bid him go to the kitchen, and get his dinner with his servants; but God does for those who cast themselves upon his mercy, abundantly above what they are able to ask or think. The prodigal came home between hope and fear, fear of being rejected and hope of being received; but his father was not only better to him than his fears, but better to him than his hopes.

[1] He came home in rags, and his father not only clothed him, but adorned him. He said to the servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him. The worst old clothes in the house might have served; but the father calls not for a coat, but for a robe, the best robe. "That robe, that principal robe, you know which I mean. Bring hither that robe, and put it on him; he will be ashamed to wear it, and think that it ill becomes him who comes home in such a dirty pickle, but put it on him, and put a ring on his hand, a signet-ring, with the arms of the family, in token of his being owned as a branch of the family." He came home barefoot, his feet perhaps sore with travel, and therefore, "Put shoes on his feet." Thus does the grace of God provide for true penitents. First, The righteousness of Christ is the robe with which they are clothed; they put on the Lord Jesus Christ. A new nature is this best robe; true penitents are clothed with this. Secondly, The earnest of the Spirit is the ring on the hand. "Put a ring on his hand, to be before him a constant memorial of his father's kindness, that he may never forget it." Thirdly, The preparation of the gospel of peace is as shoes for our feet (Eph. vi. 15). It intimates that they shall go on cheerfully, and with resolution, in the way of religion, as a man does when he has shoes on his feet, above what he does when he is barefoot.

[2] He came home hungry, and his father not only fed him, but feasted him (v. 23): "Bring hither the fatted calf and kill it, that my son may be satisfied with the best we have." The fatted calf can never be better bestowed. It was a great change with the prodigal, who just before would fain have filled his belly with husks. How sweet will the supplies of the new covenant be, to those who have been labouring in vain for satisfaction in the creature! Now he found his own words made good, In my father's house there is bread enough and to spare.

(4) The great joy and rejoicing occasioned by his return. The bringing of the fatted calf was designed to be not only a feast for him, but a festival for the family: "Let us all eat, and be merry, for it is a good day; for this my son was dead; we thought that he was dead, but behold he lives; he was lost, we gave him up for lost, but he is found." The conversion of a soul from sin to God is the raising of that soul from death to life, and the finding of that which seemed to be lost: it is a great, and wonderful, and happy change. It is such a change as that upon the face of the earth when the spring returns. The conversion of sinners is greatly pleasing to the God of heaven, and all that belong to his family ought to rejoice in it; those in heaven do, and those on earth should. It was the father that began the joy, and set all the rest on rejoicing. The family complied with the master: They began to be merry. God's children and servants ought to be affected with things as he is.

4. We have here the repining and envying of the elder brother, which is described by way of reproof to the scribes and Pharisees. He represents it so as not to aggravate the matter, but as allowing them still the privileges of elder brethren. Christ, when he reproved them for their faults, yet accosted them mildly, to smooth them into a good temper towards the poor publicans. But by the elder brother here we may understand those who are really good, and never went astray, who comparatively need no repentance; and to such these words in the close, Son, thou art ever with me, are applicable without any difficulty, but not to the scribes and Pharisees. Now concerning the elder brother, observe,

(1) How foolish and fretful he was upon occasion of his brother's reception, and how he was disgusted at it. It seems he was abroad in the field when his brother came, and by the time he had returned home the mirth was begun: When he drew nigh to the house he heard music and dancing, v. 25. He enquired what these things meant (v. 26), and was informed that his brother was come, and his father had made him a feast for his welcome home, and great joy there was because he had received him safe and sound, v. 27. It is but one word in the original, he had received him ὑγιαίνοντα—in health, well both in body and mind. He received him not only well in body, but a penitent, returned to his right mind, cured of his vices, else he had not been received safe and sound. Now this offended him to the highest degree: He was angry, and would not go in (v. 28), because he would intimate to his father that he should have kept out his younger brother. This shows what is a common fault,

[1] In men's families. Those who have always been a comfort to their parents think they should have the monopoly of their parents' favours, and are apt to be too sharp upon those who have transgressed.

[2] In God's family. Those who are comparatively innocents seldom know how to be compassionate towards those who are manifestly penitents. The language of such we have here, in what the elder brother said (v. 29, 30). First, He boasted of himself and his own virtue and obedience. Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment. It is too common for those that are better than their neighbours to boast of it. I am apt to think that this elder brother said more than was true, that he had never transgressed his father's commands, for then I believe he would not have been so obstinate as now he was to his father's entreaties. Those that have long served God, and been kept from gross sins, have a great deal to be humbly thankful for, but nothing proudly to boast of. Secondly, He complained of his father: Thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends. He was out of humour now, else he would not have made this complaint; for, no question, if he had asked such a thing at any time, he might have had it at the first word. The killing of the fatted calf put him upon making this peevish reflection. When men are in a passion they are apt to reflect in a way they would not if they were in their right mind. He had many a time been merry with him and the family; but his father had never given him so much as a kid, which was but a small token of love compared with the fatted calf. Those that think highly of themselves and their services are apt to think hardly of their master and meanly of his favours. We ought to own ourselves utterly unworthy of those mercies which God has thought fit to give us, and therefore we must not complain. He would have had a kid, to make merry with his friends abroad, whereas the fatted calf was given to his brother, not to make merry with his friends abroad, but with the family at home: the mirth of God's children should be with their father and his family, and not with any other friends. Thirdly, He was very ill-humoured towards his younger brother. Some good people are apt to be overtaken in this fault, to look with disdain upon those who have not preserved their reputation so clean as they have done, though they have given very good evidence of their repentance and reformation. This is not the Spirit of Christ, but of the Pharisees. Let us observe the instances of it. 1. He would not go in; one house shall not hold him and his own brother, no, not his father's house. Though we are to shun the society of those sinners by whom we are in danger of being infected, yet we must not be shy of the company of penitent sinners, by whom we may get good. He saw that his father had taken him in, and yet he would not go in to him. We think too well of ourselves, if we cannot find in our hearts to receive those whom God hath received, and who are taken into friendship and fellowship with him. 2. He would not call him brother; but this thy son, which sounds arrogant, and not without reflection upon his father. Let us give our relations the titles that belong to them. Let the rich call the poor brethren, and let the innocents call the penitents so. 3. He aggravated his brother's faults, and made the worst of them: He is thy son, who hath devoured thy living with harlots. He had spent his own portion foolishly enough (whether upon harlots or no we are not told before, perhaps that was only the language of the elder brother's jealousy and ill will), but that he had devoured all his father's living was false; the father had still a good estate. Now this shows how apt we are to make the worst of everything, and to set it out in the blackest colours, which is not doing as we would be done by, nor as our heavenly Father does by us. 4. He grudged him the kindness that his father showed him: Thou hast killed for him the fatted calf. It is a wrong thing to envy penitents the grace of God. As we must not envy those that are the worst of sinners the gifts of common providence, so we must not envy those that have been the worst of sinners the gifts of covenant love upon their repentance; we must not envy them any extraordinary gift which God bestows upon them. Paul, before his conversion, had been a prodigal, yet when after his conversion he had greater measures of grace given him than the other apostles, they who were the elder brethren did not envy him his visions and revelations, nor his more extensive usefulness, but glorified God in him, which ought to be an example to us, as the reverse of this elder brother.

(2) Let us now see how favourable and friendly his father was in his carriage towards him when he was thus sour and ill-humoured. This is as surprising as the former. Methinks the mercy and grace of our God in Christ shine almost as brightly in his tender and gentle bearing with peevish saints, as before in his reception of prodigal sinners upon their repentance. The disciples of Christ themselves had many infirmities, and were men subject to like passions as others, yet Christ bore with them.

[1] When he would not come in, his father came out, and entreated him, accosted him mildly, gave him good words, and desired him to come in. He might justly have said, "If he will not come in, let him stay out. Is not the house my own? and may I not do what I please in it? Is not the fatted calf my own? and may I not do what I please with it?" No, as he went to meet the younger son, so now he goes to court the elder. This is designed to represent to us the goodness of God; how strangely gentle and winning he has been towards those that were strangely froward and provoking. It is to teach all superiors to be mild and gentle with their inferiors, even when they are in a fault and passionately justify themselves in it. Even in that case let fathers not provoke their children to more wrath, and let masters forbear threatening, and both show all meekness.

[2] His father assured him that the kind entertainment he gave his younger brother was neither any reflection upon him nor should be any prejudice to him (v. 31): "Son, thou art ever with me; the reception of him is no rejection of thee, nor what is laid out on him any sensible diminution of what I design for thee; all that I have is thine, by an indefeasible title." If he had not given him a kid to make merry with his friends, he had allowed him to eat bread at his table continually; and it is better to be happy with our Father in heaven than merry with any friend we have in this world. First, It is the unspeakable happiness of all the children of God, that they are, and shall be, ever with him. All that he has is theirs; for, if children, then heirs, Rom. viii. 17. Secondly, Therefore we ought not to envy others God's grace to them because we shall have never the less for their sharing in it. If we be true believers, all that God is, all that he has, is ours; and, if others come to be true believers, all that he is, and all that he has, is theirs too, and yet we have not the less, as they that walk in the light and warmth of the sun have all the benefit they can have by it, and yet not the less for others having as much.

[3] His father gave him a good reason, It was meet that we should make merry and be glad, v. 32. He might have insisted upon his own authority: "It was my will that the family should make merry and be glad." But it does not become even those that have authority to be vouching and appealing to it upon every occasion, which does but make it cheap and common; it is better to give a convincing reason, as the father does here: It was meet that we should make merry for the return of a prodigal son, more than for the perseverance of a dutiful son; for, though the latter is a greater blessing to a family, yet the former is a more sensible pleasure. Any family would be much more transported with joy at the raising of a dead child to life, than for the continued life and health of many children. We do not find that the elder brother made any reply to what his father said, which intimates that he was well reconciled to his prodigal brother; and his father put him in mind that he was his brother: This thy brother. A good man, though he have not such a command of himself at all times as to keep his temper, yet will, with the grace of God, recover his temper.

CHAP. XVI

The scope of Christ's discourse in this chapter is to awaken and quicken us all so to manage all our possessions and enjoyments here as that they may make for us, and may not make against us, in the other world. I. If we do good with them we shall reap the benefit of it in the world to come; and this he shows in the parable of the unjust steward. The parable itself we have, ver. 1–8; the explanation and application of it, ver. 9–13; and the contempt which the Pharisees put upon the doctrine Christ preached to them, for which he sharply reproved them, adding some other weighty sayings, ver. 14–18. II. If, instead of doing good with our worldly enjoyments, we make them the food and fuel of our luxury and sensuality, and deny relief to the poor, we shall certainly perish eternally. This he shows in the other parable of the rich man and Lazarus, ver. 19–31.

Verses 1–18

We mistake if we imagine that the design of Christ's doctrine and holy religion was either to amuse us with notions of divine mysteries or to entertain us with notions of divine mercies. No, the divine revelation of both these in the gospel is intended to engage and quicken us to the practice of Christian duties, to the duty of beneficence and doing good to those who stand in need of anything that either we have or can do for them. We are but stewards of the manifold grace of God. It is our wisdom to think how we may make what we have in the world turn to a good account. If we would act wisely, we must be as diligent and industrious to employ our riches in the acts of piety and charity, in order to promote our future and eternal welfare, as worldly men are in laying them out to the greatest temporal profit.

I. The parable itself, in which all the children of men are represented as stewards of what they have in this world. Whatever we have, the property of it is God's; we have only the use of it.

1. Here is the dishonesty of this steward. He wasted his lord's goods, and for this he was accused to his lord, v. 1. We are all liable to the same charge. We have not made a due improvement of what God has entrusted us with in this world. That we may not be for this judged of our Lord, it concerns us to judge ourselves.

2. His discharge out of his place. His lord called for him, and said, "How is it that I hear this of thee?" He speaks as one sorry to find himself disappointed in him: it troubles him to hear it; but the steward cannot deny it, and therefore there is no remedy, he must make up his accounts, and be gone in a little time, v. 2. Now this is designed to teach us, (1) That we must all of us shortly be discharged from our stewardship in this world. Death will come, and dismiss us from our stewardship, others will come in our places. (2) That our discharge from our stewardship at death is just, and what we have deserved, for we have wasted our Lord's goods. (3) That when our stewardship is taken from us we must give an account of it to our Lord.

3. His after-wisdom. Now he began to consider, What shall I do? v. 3. He would have done well to have considered this before, but it is better to consider late than never. He must live; which way shall he have a livelihood? (1) He knows that he has not such a degree of industry in him as to get his living by work: "I cannot dig." But why can he not dig? The truth is, he is lazy. His cannot is a will not; it is not a natural but a moral disability that he labours under. He cannot dig, for he was never used to it. (2) He knows that he has not such a degree of humility as to get his bread by begging: To beg I am ashamed. This was the language of his pride, as the former of his slothfulness. This steward had more reason to be ashamed of cheating his master than of begging his bread. (3) He therefore determines to make friends of his lord's debtors: "I am resolved what to do (v. 4). I am acquainted with my lord's tenants, have done them many a good turn, and now I will do them one more, which will so oblige them that they will bid me welcome to their houses. Till I can better dispose of myself, I will quarter upon them, and go from one good house to another." Accordingly, he sent for one, who owed his lord a hundred measures of oil: Take thy bill, said he, and sit down quickly, and write fifty (v. 6); so he reduced his debt to the one half. "Sit down quickly, and do it, lest we be taken treating, and suspected." He took another, who owed his lord a hundred measures of wheat, and bade him write fourscore (v. 7). See here what uncertain things our worldly possessions are; they are most so to those who have most of them, who devolve upon others all the care concerning them, and so put it into their power to cheat them. See also what treachery is to be found even among those in whom trust is reposed. Though this steward is turned out for dealing dishonestly, yet still he does so. So rare is it for men to mend of a fault, though they smart for it.

4. The approbation of this: The lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely, v. 8. It may be meant of his lord, the lord of that servant, who yet was pleased with his ingenuity and policy for himself; but, taking it so, the latter part of the verse must be the words of our Lord, and therefore I think the whole is meant of him. He does not commend him because he had done falsely to his master, but because he had done wisely for himself. Yet perhaps herein he did well for his master too, and but justly with the tenants. He knew what hard bargains he had set them, so that they could not pay their rent. He now, at going off, did as he ought to do both in justice and charity. He had been all for his lord, but now he begins to consider the tenants, that he might have their favour when he had lost his lord's. Now this forecast of his, for a comfortable subsistence in this world, shames our improvidence for another world: The children of this world are wiser for their generation, better consult their worldly interest and advantage, than the children of light, in their generation, that is, in the concerns of their souls and eternity. (1) The wisdom of worldly people in the concerns of this world is to be imitated by us in the concerns of our souls: it is their principle to improve their opportunities, to do that first which is most needful. O that we were thus wise in our spiritual affairs! (2) The children of light are commonly outdone by the children of this world. Not that the children of this world are truly wise; it is only in their generation. But in that they are wiser than the children of light in theirs. We live as if we were to be here always and as if there were not another life after this. Though as children of the light we cannot but see another world before us, yet we do not prepare for it, do not send our best effects and best affections thither, as we should.

II. The application of this parable, and the inferences drawn from it (v. 9): "I say unto you, you my disciples" (for to them this parable is directed, v. 1), "though you have but little in this world, consider how you may do good with that little." Observe,

1. What it is that our Lord Jesus here exhorts us to: "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness." It is the wisdom of the men of this world so to manage their money as that they may have the benefit of it hereafter, and not for this present only. Now we should learn of them to make use of our money so as that we may be the better for it hereafter in another world, as they do in hopes to be the better for it hereafter in this world. And in our case, though whatever we have are our Lord's goods, yet, as long as we dispose of them among our Lord's tenants and for their advantage, it is so far from being reckoned a wrong to our Lord, that it is a duty to him as well as policy for ourselves. (1) The things of this world are the mammon of unrighteousness, or the false mammon. Riches are perishing things, and will disappoint those that raise their expectations from them. (2) Though this mammon of unrighteousness is not to be trusted to for a happiness, yet it may and must be made use of in subserviency to our pursuit of that which is our happiness. Though we cannot find true satisfaction in it, yet we may make to ourselves friends with it. (3) At death we must all fail, ὅταν ἐκλίπητε—when ye suffer an eclipse. Death eclipses us. A tradesman is said to fail when he becomes a bankrupt. We must all thus fail shortly; death shuts up the shop, seals up the hand. (4) It ought to be our great concern to make it sure to ourselves, that when we fail at death we may be received into everlasting habitations in heaven. Christ is gone before, to prepare a place for those that are his, and is there ready to receive them. See 1 Tim. vi. 17–19, which explains this here.

2. With what arguments he presses this exhortation.

(1) If we do not make a right use of the gifts of God's providence, how can we expect from him the gifts of his spiritual grace? Our unfaithfulness in the use of them may be justly reckoned a forfeiture of that grace which is necessary to bring us to glory, v. 10–14. The riches of this world are the less; grace and glory are the greater. Now if we be unfaithful in the less, it may justly be feared that we should be so in the gifts of God's grace, and therefore they will be denied us: He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much, He that serves God, and does good, with his money, will serve God, and do good, with the more noble and valuable talents of wisdom and grace, but he that buries the one talent of this world's wealth will never improve the five talents of spiritual riches. The riches of this world are the unrighteous mammon, which is hastening from us apace, and, if we would make any advantage of it, we must bestir ourselves quickly; if we do not, how can we expect to be entrusted with spiritual riches, which are the only true riches? v. 11. Let us be convinced of this, that those are truly rich, and very rich, who are rich in faith, and rich towards God, rich in Christ, the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof. If other things be added to us, by using them well we may take the faster hold of the true riches, and may be qualified to receive yet more grace from God. To a man that is faithful in the unrighteous mammon, he gives the true riches. The riches of this world are another man's. They are not our own; for they are God's. They are another man's; we have them from others; we use them for others; and we must shortly leave them to others. But spiritual and eternal riches are our own inseparably; they are a good part that will never be taken away from us. If we make Christ our own, and the promises our own, and heaven our own, we have that which we may truly call our own. But how can we expect God should enrich us with these if we do not serve him with our worldly possessions, of which we are but stewards?

(2) We have no other way to prove ourselves the servants of God than by giving up ourselves so entirely to his service as to make all our worldly gain serviceable to us in his service (v. 13): No servant can serve two masters. If a man will love the world, and hold to that, it cannot be but he will hate God and despise him. But, on the other hand, if a man will love God, and adhere to him, he will comparatively hate the world, and the things of the world shall be made to help him in serving God and working out his salvation. The matter is here laid plainly before us: Ye cannot serve God and mammon. So divided are their interests that their services can never be compounded.

3. We are here told what entertainment this doctrine of Christ met with among the Pharisees.

(1) They wickedly ridiculed him, v. 14. The Pharisees, who were covetous, heard all these things, and could not contradict him, but they derided him. Let us consider this as their sin, and the fruit of their covetousness, which was their reigning sin. Many that make a great profession of religion and abound in the exercise of devotion, are yet ruined by the love of the world. These covetous Pharisees could not bear to have that touched, which was their Delilah, their darling lust; for this they derided him, they snuffled up their noses at him, or blew their noses on him. It is an expression of the utmost scorn and disdain imaginable. They laughed at him for going so contrary to the opinion and way of the world. It is common for those to make a jest of the word of God who are resolved that they will not be ruled by it. Our Lord Jesus endured not only the contradiction of sinners, but their contempt. He that spoke as never man spoke was bantered and ridiculed, that his faithful ministers, whose preaching is unjustly derided, may not be disheartened at it. It is no disgrace to a man to be laughed at, but to deserve to be laughed at.

(2) He justly reproved them for deceiving themselves with the shows and colours of piety, v. 15. Here is,

[1] Their specious outside. First, They justified themselves before men; they denied whatever ill was laid to their charge. They claimed to be looked upon as men of singular sanctity and devotion: "You are they that make it your business to court the opinion of men, and will justify yourselves before the world; you are notorious for this." Secondly, They were highly esteemed among men. Men did not only acquit them, but applauded them, not only as good men, but as the best of men.

[2] Their odious inside, which was under the eye of God: "He knows your heart, and it is in his sight an abomination." It is folly to justify ourselves before men, and to think this enough to bear us out, that men know no ill of us; for God, who knows our hearts, knows that ill of us which no one else can know. This ought to check our value for ourselves, that God knows our hearts, for we have reason to abase and distrust ourselves. It is folly to judge of persons and things by the opinion of men concerning them, and to go down with the stream of vulgar estimate; for that which is highly esteemed among men is perhaps an abomination in the sight of God, who sees things as they are. There are those whom men despise and condemn who yet are accepted and approved of God, 2 Cor. x. 18.

(3) He turned from them to the publicans and sinners, as more likely to be wrought upon by his gospel than those covetous conceited Pharisees (v. 16): "The law and the prophets were indeed until John; but since John Baptist appeared the kingdom of God is preached. Every man presses into the gospel kingdom, Gentiles as well as Jews. It is not as the Jewish economy was, when salvation was of the Jews; but it is made a particular personal concern, and therefore every man that is convinced he has a soul to save, thrusts to get in, lest he should come short." Some give this sense of it; they derided Christ for speaking in contempt of riches, for, thought they, were there not many promises of riches and other temporal good things in the law and the prophets? "It is true," saith Christ, "so it was, but now that the kingdom of God is begun to be preached, blessed are the poor, and the mourners, and the persecuted. Now that the gospel is preached the eyes of the people are opened, they press with a holy violence into the kingdom of God." Those that would go to heaven must take pains, must strive against the stream, must press against the crowd that are going the contrary way.

(4) Yet still he protests against any design to invalidate the law (v. 17): It is easier for heaven and earth to pass than for one tittle of the law to fail. The moral law is confirmed and ratified; the duties enjoined by it are duties still; the sins forbidden by it are sins still. The ceremonial law is perfected in the gospel, and its shades are filled up with the gospel colours; not one tittle of that fails, for it is found printed off in the gospel. There were some things which were connived at by the law, for the preventing of greater mischiefs, the permission of which the gospel has indeed taken away, but without any detriment or disparagement to the law, as in the case of divorce (v. 18), which we had before, Matt. v. 32; xix. 9. His gospel is intended to strike at the bitter root of men's corrupt appetites and passions, to kill them, and pluck them up; and therefore they must not be so far indulged as that permission did indulge them, for the more they are indulged the more impetuous and headstrong they grow.

Verses 19-31

As the parable of the prodigal son set before us the grace of the gospel, so this sets before us the wrath to come, and is designed for our awakening. The tendency of the gospel of Christ is both to reconcile us to poverty and affliction and to arm us against temptations to worldliness and sensuality. Now this parable goes very far in prosecuting those two great intentions. This parable is not like Christ's other parables, in which spiritual things are represented by similitudes borrowed from worldly things, as those of the sower and the seed. But here the spiritual things themselves are represented in a narrative or description of the different state of good and bad in this world and the other. It is matter of fact that is true every day, that poor godly people die away out of their miseries, and go to heavenly bliss and joy; and that rich epicures, who live in luxury, and are unmerciful to the poor, die, and go into a state of insupportable torment. Is this a parable? What similitude is there in this? Our Saviour came to bring us acquainted with another world, and here he does it. In this description (for so I shall choose to call it) we may observe,

I. The different condition of a wicked rich man, and a godly poor man, in this world. The Jews of old were ready to make prosperity one of the marks of a good man so that they could hardly have any favourable thoughts of a poor man. This mistake Christ, upon all occasions, set himself to correct, and here very fully, where we have,

1. A wicked man, and one that will be for ever miserable, in the height of prosperity (v. 19): There was a certain rich man. From the Latin we commonly call him Dives—a rich man; but he has no name given him, as the poor man has. Now we are told concerning this rich man,

(1) That he was clothed in purple and fine linen, and that was his adorning. He had fine linen for pleasure, and clean, no doubt, every day; night-linen, and day-linen. He had purple for state. He never appeared abroad but in great magnificence.

(2) He fared sumptuously every day. His table was furnished with all the varieties and dainties that nature and art could supply; his side-table richly adorned with plate; his servants, who waited at table, in rich liveries; and the guests at his table, no doubt, such as he thought graced it. Well, and what harm was there in all this? It is no sin to be rich, no sin to wear purple and fine linen, nor to keep a plentiful table, if a man's estate will afford it. Nor are we told that he got his estate by fraud, oppression, or extortion, no, nor that he was drunk, or made others drunk. [1] Christ would hereby show that a man may have a great deal of the wealth, and yet lie and perish for ever under God's wrath and curse. We cannot infer from men's living great either that God loves them in giving them so much, or that they love God for giving them so much. [2] That plenty and pleasure are very dangerous. This man might have been happy if he had not had great possessions and enjoyments. [3] That the indulgence of the body, and the ease and pleasure of that, are the ruin of many a soul. It is true, eating good meat and wearing good clothes are lawful; but they often become the food and fuel of pride and luxury, and so turn into sin to us. [4] That feasting ourselves and our friends, and, at the same time, forgetting the distresses of the poor and afflicted, are very provoking to God and damning to the soul.

2. Here is a godly man in the depth of adversity and distress (v. 20): There was a certain beggar, named Lazarus. This poor man was reduced to the last extremity, as miserable as you can suppose a man to be in this world.

(1) His body was full of sores, like Job. To be sick and weak in body is a great affliction; but sores are more painful to the patient, and more loathsome to those about him.

(2) He was forced to beg his bread. He was so sore and lame that he could not go himself, but was carried by some compassionate hand or other, and laid at the rich man's gate. Those that are not able to help the poor with their purses should help them with their pains; those that cannot lend them a penny should lend them a hand. Lazarus, in his distress, had nothing of his own to subsist on.

[1] His expectations from the rich man's table: He desired to be fed with the crumbs, v. 21. He did not look for a mess from off his table, though he ought to have had one, but would be thankful for the crumbs from under the table, nay, the leavings of his dogs. Now this is taken notice of to show, First, What was the distress, and what the disposition, of the poor man. He was poor, but he was poor in spirit, contentedly poor. He did not lie at the rich man's gate complaining, and bawling, but silently and modestly desiring to be fed with the crumbs. Here is a child of wrath and an heir of hell sitting in the house, faring sumptuously; and a child of love and an heir of heaven lying at the gate, perishing for hunger. And is men's spiritual state to be judged of then by their outward condition? Secondly, What was the temper of the rich man towards him. We are not told that he abused him, but it is intimated that he slighted him. Here was a real object of charity, and a very moving one, which spoke for itself; it was presented to him at his own gate. A little thing would be a great kindness to him, and yet he took no cognizance of his case, but let him lie there. It is not enough not to oppress and trample upon the poor; we shall be found unfaithful stewards of our Lord's goods if we do not succour and relieve them. The reason given for the most fearful doom is, I was hungry, and you gave me no meat. I wonder how those rich people who have read the gospel of Christ, and say that they believe it, can be so unconcerned as they often are in the necessities and miseries of the poor and afflicted.

[2] The usage he had from the dogs: The dogs came and licked his sores. The rich man kept a kennel of hounds, it may be, or other dogs, and these were fed to the full, when poor Lazarus could not get enough to keep him alive. Those will have a great deal to answer for hereafter that feed their dogs, but neglect the poor. Those offend God, nay, and they put a contempt upon human nature, that pamper their dogs and horses, and let the families of their poor neighbours starve. Now those dogs came and licked the sores of poor Lazarus, which may be taken, First, As an aggravation of his misery. His sores were bloody, which tempted the dogs to come and lick them. The dogs were like their master, and thought they fared sumptuously when they regaled themselves with human gore. Or, it may be taken, Secondly, as some relief to him in his misery; the master was hard-hearted towards him, but the dogs came and licked his sores, which mollified and eased them. The dogs were more kind to him that their master was.

II. The different condition of this godly poor man, and this wicked rich man, at and after death.

1. They both died (v. 22): The beggar died; the rich man also died. Death is the common lot of rich and poor, godly and ungodly; there they meet together. Saints die, that they may bring their sorrows to an end, and may enter upon their joys. Sinners die, that they may go to give up their account. It concerns both rich and poor to prepare for death, for it waits for them both.

2. The beggar died first. God often takes godly people out of the world, when he leaves the wicked to flourish still. Since he could find no other shelter or resting-place, he was hid in the grave.

3. The rich man died and was buried. Nothing is said of the interment of the poor man. They dug a hole anywhere, and tumbled his body in. But the rich man had a pompous funeral; probably he had a funeral oration in praise of him, and his generous way of living, and the good table he kept, which those would commend that had been feasted at it. How foreign is the ceremony of a funeral to the happiness of the man!

4. The beggar died and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom. How much did the honour done to his soul, by this convoy of it to its rest, exceed the honour done to the rich man, by the carrying of his body with so much magnificence to its grave! (1) His soul existed in a state of separation from the body. It did not die, or fall asleep, with the body. (2) His soul removed to another world, it returned to God who gave it, to its native country. The spirit of a man goes upward. (3) Angels took care of it; it was carried by angels. They are ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation, not only while they live, but when they die. The soul of man, if not chained to this earth and clogged by it as unsanctified souls are, has in itself an elastic virtue, by which it springs upward as soon as it gets clear of the body; but Christ will not trust those that are his to that, and therefore will send special messengers to fetch them to himself. Saints shall be brought home, not only safely, but honourably. What were the bearers at the rich man's funeral, though, probably, those of the first rank, compared with Lazarus's bearers? (4) It was carried into Abraham's bosom. Abraham was the father of the faithful; and whither should the souls of the faithful be gathered but to him. He was carried to his bosom, that is, to feast with him. The saints in heaven sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob. Abraham was a great and rich man, yet in heaven he does not disdain to lay poor Lazarus in his bosom. Rich saints and poor meet in heaven. He is laid in the bosom of Abraham, whom the rich glutton scorned to set with the dogs of his flock.

5. The next news you hear of the rich man is that in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment, v. 23.

(1) His state is very miserable. He is in hell, in hades, in the state of separate souls, and there he is in the utmost misery and anguish possible. As the souls of the faithful, immediately after they are delivered from the burden of the flesh, are in joy and felicity, so wicked and unsanctified souls, immediately after they are fetched from the pleasures of the flesh by death, are in misery and torment endless, useless, and remediless. This rich man had entirely devoted himself to the pleasures of the world of sense, and therefore was wholly unfit for the pleasures of the world of spirits; to such a carnal mind as his they would indeed be no pleasure, and therefore he is of course excluded from them.

(2) The misery of his state is aggravated by his knowledge of the happiness of Lazarus: He lifts up his eyes, and sees Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. He now began to consider what was become of Lazarus. He does not find him where he himself is, nay, he plainly sees him afar off in the bosom of Abraham. [1] He saw Abraham afar off. To see Abraham we should think a pleasing sight; but to see him afar off was a tormenting sight. [2] He saw Lazarus in his bosom. The sight of him brought to his mind his own cruel and barbarous conduct towards him; and the sight of him in that happiness made his own misery the more grievous.

III. An account of what passed between the rich man and Abraham in the separate state.

1. The request which the rich man made to Abraham for some mitigation of his present misery, v. 24. Seeing Abraham afar off, he cried to him. He that used to command aloud now begs aloud. The songs of his riot and revels are all turned into lamentations. Observe here,

(1) The title he gives to Abraham: Father Abraham. There are many in hell that can call Abraham father. Perhaps this rich man, in his carnal mirth, had ridiculed Abraham and the story of Abraham, as the scoffers of the latter days do; but now he gives him a title of respect, Father Abraham. The day is coming when wicked men will be glad to scrape acquaintance with the righteous, and to claim kindred to them, though now they slight them.

(2) The representation he makes to him of his present deplorable condition: I am tormented in this flame. It is the torment of his soul that he complains of, and therefore it is such a fire as will operate upon souls; and such a fire the wrath of God is, fastening upon a guilty conscience; such a fire horror of mind is, and the reproaches of a self-accusing self-condemning heart.

(3) His request to Abraham, in consideration of this misery: Have mercy on me. The day is coming when those that make light of divine mercy will beg hard for it. He that had no mercy on Lazarus, yet expects Lazarus should have mercy on him; "for," thinks he, "Lazarus is better natured than ever I was." The particular favour he begs is, Send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue. [1] Here he complains of the torment of his tongue particularly. The tongue is one of the organs of speech, and by the torment of that he is put in mind of all the wicked words that he had spoken against God and man, all his hard speeches, and filthy speeches; by his words he is condemned, and therefore in his tongue he is tormented. The tongue is also one of the organs of tasting, and therefore the torments of that will remind him of his inordinate relish of the delights of sense. [2] He desires a drop of water to cool his tongue. He asks as small a thing as could be asked, a drop of water to cool his tongue for one moment. [3] He desires that Lazarus might bring it. He names him, because he knows him, and thinks Lazarus will not be unwilling to do him this good office for old acquaintance' sake. There is a day coming when those that now hate and despise the people of God would gladly receive kindness from them.

2. The reply which Abraham gave to this request. In general, he did not grant it. See how justly this rich man is paid in his own coin. He that denied a crumb is denied a drop. Now it is said to us, Ask, and it shall be given you; but, if we let slip this accepted time, we may ask, and it shall not be given us.

(1) He calls him son, a kind and civil title. He had been a son, but a rebellious one, and now an abandoned disinherited one.

(2) He puts him in mind of what had been both his own condition and the condition of Lazarus, in their life-time: Son, remember; this is a cutting word. Now sinners are called upon to remember, but they do not, they will not. "Son, remember thy Creator, thy Redeemer, remember thy latter end"; but they can forget that for which they have their memories. "Son, remember the many warnings that were given thee, remember the fair offers made thee of eternal life and glory, which thou wouldest not accept!" But that which he is here put in mind of is, [1] That thou in thy life-time receivedst thy good things. He does not tell him that he had abused them, but that he had received them: "Remember what a bountiful benefactor God has been to thee; thou canst not therefore say he owes thee anything, no, not a drop of water. What he gave thee thou receivedst, and that was all. Thou hast been the grave of God's blessings, in which they were buried, not the field of them, in which they were sown. Thou receivedst thy good things. They were the things which thou didst choose for thy good things, which were in thine eye the best things. Thou wast for the good things of thy life-time, and hadst no thought of better things in another life. The day of thy good things is past and gone." [2] "What evil things Lazarus received. Think what a large share of miseries he had in his life-time. Thou hadst as much good as could be thought to fall to the lot of so bad a man, and he as much evil as could be thought to fall to the lot of so good a man. He received his evil things; he received them as physic appointed for the cure of his spiritual distempers, and the cure was effected." As wicked people have good things in this life only, godly people have evil things only in this life. Now Abraham awakens his conscience to remind him how he had behaved towards Lazarus; he cannot forget that then he would not help Lazarus, and how then could he expect that Lazarus should now help him?

(3) He puts him in mind of Lazarus's present bliss, and his own misery: Now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. Heaven is comfort, and hell is torment: heaven is joy, hell is weeping, and wailing. Heaven will be heaven indeed to those that go thither through many and great calamities in this world. When they are fallen asleep in Christ, you may truly say, "Now they are comforted; now all their tears are wiped away." In heaven there is everlasting consolation. And, on the other hand, hell will be hell indeed to those that go thither from the midst of the enjoyment of all the delights and pleasures of sense.

(4) He assures him that it was to no purpose to think of having any relief by the ministry of Lazarus; for (v. 26), Besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed, a great chasm. The kindest saint in heaven cannot make a visit to the congregation of the dead and damned, to comfort or relieve any there who once were their friends. "They that would pass hence to you cannot." The most daring sinner in hell cannot force his way out of that prison. They cannot pass to us that would come thence. In this world, blessed be God, there is no gulf fixed between a state of nature and grace, but we may pass from the one to the other, from sin to God. It might have been prevented in time, but it cannot now be remedied to eternity. A stone is rolled to the door of the pit, which cannot be rolled back.

3. The further request he had to make to his father Abraham. having an opportunity of speaking to Abraham, he will improve it for his relations whom he has left behind.

(1) He begs that Lazarus might be sent to his father's house. I pray thee therefore, father, v. 27. Again he calls upon Abraham. Surely thou wilt be so compassionate as not to deny this. Send him back to my father's house; he knows well enough where it is, has been there many a time. He knows I have five brethren there; they will know him, and will regard what he saith. Let him testify to them; let him tell them what condition I am in. Let him warn them not to tread in my steps lest they also come into this place of torment, v. 28. He does not say, "Give me leave to go to them, that I may testify to them"; his going would frighten them out of their wits; but, "Send Lazarus, whose address will be less terrible, and yet his testimony sufficient to frighten them out of their sins." Now he desired the preventing of their ruin, in tenderness to them, for whom he could not but retain a natural affection.

(2) Abraham denies him this favour too. There is no request granted in hell. Abraham leaves them to the testimony of Moses and the prophets. Here is their privilege: They have Moses and the prophets; and their duty: "Let them hear them, and mix faith with them, and, that will be sufficient to keep them from this place of torment."

(3) He urges his request yet further (v. 30): "Nay, father Abraham, they have Moses and the prophets, yet it may be hoped, if one went to them from the dead, they would repent, that would be a more sensible conviction to them. They are used to Moses and the prophets; but this would be a new thing, and more startling; surely this would bring them to repent." Foolish men are apt to think any method of conviction better than that which God has chosen and appointed.

(4) Abraham insists upon the denial of it (v. 31): "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." The same strength of corruption that breaks through the convictions of the written word would certainly triumph over those by a witness from the dead. The scripture is now the ordinary way of God's making known his mind to us, and it is sufficient.

CHAP. XVII

I. Christ teaches them to take heed of giving offence, and to forgive the injuries done them (ver. 1–4), encourages them to pray for the increase of their faith (ver. 5, 6), and then teaches them humility, ver. 7–10. II. His cleansing ten lepers, and the thanks he had from one of them only, and he a Samaritan, ver. 11–19. III. His discourse with his disciples when the kingdom of God should appear, ver. 20–37.

Verses 1–10

Note, I. That the giving of offences is a great sin, *v.*1, 2. We can expect no other than that offences will come. It is almost impossible but that offences will come, and therefore we are concerned to provide accordingly; but woe to him through whom they come, his doom will be heavy (v. 2). They perish under a load of guilt more ponderous than that of millstones. This includes a woe, 1. To persecutors who offer any injury to the least of Christ's little ones. 2. To seducers, who corrupt the truths of Christ, and so trouble the minds of the disciples. 3. To those who live scandalously, and thereby weaken the hands and sadden the hearts of God's people.

II. That the forgiving of offences is a great duty (v. 3): Take heed to yourselves. This may refer either to what goes before, or to what follows: Take heed that you offend not one of these little ones. Or, "When your brother trespasses against you, take heed to yourselves at such a time, lest you be put into a passion."

1. If you are permitted to rebuke him, you are advised to do so. Smother not the resentment, but give it vent. Tell him his faults; and, it may be, you will perceive that you mistook him, that it was not a trespass against you, but an oversight, and then you will beg his pardon for misunderstanding him.

2. You are commanded, upon his repentance, to forgive him: If he repent, forgive him; forget the injury, never think of it again. Though he do not repent, you must not therefore bear malice to him, nor meditate revenge.

3. You are to repeat this every time he repeats his trespass, v. 4. If he could be supposed to be either so negligent as to trespass against thee seven times in a day, and as often profess himself sorry for his fault, continue to forgive him. Christians should be of a forgiving spirit, willing to make the best of everybody, and they should contrive as much to show that they have forgiven an injury as others to show that they resent it.

III. That we have all need to get our faith strengthened, because, as that grace grows, all other graces grow. 1. The address which the disciples made to Christ, for the strengthening of their faith, v. 5. The apostles themselves yet acknowledged the weakness and deficiency of their faith, and saw their need of Christ's grace for the improvement of it; they said unto the Lord, "Increase our faith." The increase of our faith is what we should earnestly desire. They put up this prayer to Christ upon occasion of his pressing upon them the duty of forgiving injuries: "Lord, increase our faith, or we shall never be able to practise such a difficult duty as this." Faith in God's pardoning mercy will enable us to get over the greatest difficulties that lie in the way of our forgiving our brother. 2. The assurance Christ gave them of the wonderful efficacy of true faith (v. 6): "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, so small as mustard-seed, or so sharp as mustard-seed, so pungent, so exciting to all other graces, nothing would be too hard for you, that was fit to be done for the glory of God, yea, though it were the transplanting of a tree from the earth to the sea." As with God nothing is impossible, so are all things possible to him that can believe.

IV. That, whatever we do in the service of Christ, we must be very humble. Even the apostles themselves, who did so much more for Christ than others, must not think that they had thereby made him their debtor. 1. We are all God's servants. Our whole strength and our whole time are to be employed for him. 2. As God's servants, it becomes us to fill up our time with duty, we ought to make the end of one service the beginning of another. The servant that has been ploughing, or feeding cattle, in the field, when he comes home at night has work to do still; he must wait at table, v. 7, 8. When we have been working for God, still we must be waiting on God. 3. Our principal care here must be to do the duty of our relation, and leave it to our Master to give us the comfort of it. No servant expects that his master should say to him, Go and sit down to meat; it is time enough to do that when we have done our day's work. Let us be in care to finish our work, and then the reward will come in due time. 4. It is fit that Christ should be served before us: Make ready wherewith I may sup, and afterwards thou shalt eat and drink. 5. Christ's servants, when they are to wait upon him, must gird themselves, must free themselves from everything that is entangling and encumbering. We must then gird ourselves, to attend him. This is expected from servants, and Christ might require it from us, but he does not insist upon it. He was among his disciples as one that served, and came not to be ministered unto, but to minister; witness his washing his disciples' feet. 6. Christ's servants do not so much as merit his thanks for any service they do him: "Does he thank that servant?" No good works of ours can merit anything at the hand of God. 7. Whatever we do for Christ, it is no more than is our duty to do. Though we should do all things that are commanded us, and alas! in many things we come short of this, it is but what we are bound to by that first and great commandment of loving God with all our heart and soul. 8. The best servants of Christ must humbly acknowledge that they are unprofitable servants. God cannot be a gainer by our services, and therefore cannot be made a debtor by them. It becomes us therefore to call ourselves unprofitable servants, but to call his service a profitable service.

Verses 11–19

We have here an account of the cure of ten lepers, which we had not in any other of the evangelists. The leprosy was a disease which the Jews supposed to be, more than other diseases, a mark of God's displeasure; and therefore Christ, who came to take away sin, took particular care to cleanse the lepers that fell in his way. Christ was now in his way to Jerusalem, about the mid-way. He was now in the frontier-country, the marches that lay between Samaria and Galilee.

I. The address of these lepers to Christ. They were ten in a company; for, though they were shut out from society with others, yet those that were infected were at liberty to converse with one another. 1. They met Christ as he entered into a certain village. They did not stay till he had refreshed himself, but met him as he entered the town, weary as he was; and yet he did not put them off. 2. They stood afar off. A sense of our spiritual leprosy should make us very humble in all our approaches to Christ. Who are we, that we should draw near to him that is infinitely pure? 3. Their request was unanimous, and very importunate (v. 13): They lifted up their voices and cried, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. Those that expect help from Christ must take him for their Master. If he be Master, he will be Jesus, a Saviour. They ask not in particular to be cured of their leprosy, but, Have mercy on us; and it is enough to refer ourselves to the compassions of Christ, for they fail not.

II. Christ sent them to the priest, to be inspected by him. He did not tell them positively that they should be cured, but bade them go show themselves to the priests, v. 14. This was a trial of their obedience. Those that expect Christ's favours must take them in his way and method. They all went to the priest. As the ceremonial law was yet in force, Christ took care that it should be observed.

III. As they went, they were cleansed. Then, we may expect God to meet us with mercy when we are found in the way of duty. If we do what we can, God will not be wanting to do that for us which we cannot. Though the means will not heal thee of themselves, God will heal thee in the diligent use of those means.

IV. One of them, and but one, returned, to give thanks, v. 15. When he saw that he was healed he turned back towards him who was the Author of his cure, whom he wished to have the glory of it. He appears to have been very hearty and affectionate in his thanksgivings: With a loud voice he glorified God, v. 13. Those that have received mercy from God should publish it to others. But he also made a particular address of thanks to Christ (v. 16): He fell down at his feet, and gave him thanks. We ought to give thanks for the favours Christ bestows upon us, and particularly for recoveries from sickness. It becomes us also to be very humble in our thanksgivings, as well as in our prayers.

V. Christ took notice of this one that had thus distinguished himself; for, it seems, he was a Samaritan whereas the rest were Jews, v. 16. The Samaritans had not the pure knowledge and worship of God among them that the Jews had, and yet it was one of them that glorified God, when the Jews forgot.

1. The particular notice Christ took of him, and the ingratitude of those that were sharers with him in the mercy—that he who was a stranger was the only one that returned to give glory to God, v. 17, 18. (1) How rich Christ is in doing good: Were there not ten cleansed? Here was a cure by wholesale, a whole hospital healed with one word's speaking. We shall have never the less grace for others sharing it. (2) How poor we are in our returns: "Where are the nine?" Ingratitude is a very common sin. Of the many that receive mercy from God, there are but few, very few, that return to give thanks. (3) How those often prove most grateful from whom it was least expected. A Samaritan gives thanks, and a Jew does not. This serves here to aggravate the ingratitude of those Jews of whom Christ speaks.

2. The great encouragement Christ gave him, v. 19. The rest had their cure, and had it not revoked, but he had his cure confirmed particularly; Thy faith hath made thee whole. The rest were made whole by the power of Christ, in compassion to their distress; but he was made whole by his faith, by which Christ saw him distinguished from the rest.

Verses 20–37

I. Here is the demand of the Pharisees concerning it, which occasioned this discourse. They asked when the kingdom of God should come. They understood, perhaps, that Christ had taught his disciples to pray for the coming of it, and they had long preached that it was at hand. "Now," say the Pharisees, "when will that glorious view open?"

II. Christ's reply to this demand, directed to the Pharisees first, and afterwards to his own disciples (v. 22); what he said to both, he saith to us.

1. That the kingdom of the Messiah was to be a spiritual kingdom. They asked when it would come. "You know not what you ask," saith Christ; "it may come, and you not be aware of it." For it has not an external show, as other kingdoms have, the advancements and revolutions of which fill the newspapers. "No," saith Christ, "it will have a silent entrance; it cometh not with observation." They desired to have their curiosity satisfied concerning the time of it. Christ will have their mistakes rectified concerning the nature of it. When Messiah the Prince comes to set up his kingdom, they shall not say, Lo here, or Lo there, as when a prince goes in progress to visit his territories. Christ will not come with all this talk; it will not be set up in this or that particular place. Those who confine Christianity and the church to this place or that party, cry, Lo here, or Lo there; so do they who make prosperity and external pomp a mark of the true church. "It has a spiritual influence: The kingdom of God is within you." It is not of this world. Its glory does not strike men's fancies, but affects their spirits, and its power is over their souls and consciences. The kingdom of God will not change men's outward condition, but their hearts and lives. Then it comes when it makes those humble, and serious, and heavenly, that were proud, and vain; and therefore look for the kingdom of God in the revolutions of the heart. The kingdom of God is among you; so some read it. "You enquire when it will come, and are not aware that it is already begun to be set up in the midst of you. It is in your nation, though not in your hearts." It is the folly of many curious enquirers concerning the times to come that they look for that before them which is already among them.

2. That the setting up of this kingdom was a work that would meet with a great deal of opposition and interruption, v. 22. The disciples thought they should carry all before them, but Christ tells them it would be otherwise: "The days will come when you shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and shall not see it. At first, indeed, you will have wonderful success" (so they had, when thousands were added to the church in a day); "but do not think it will be always so; people will grow cool to it." This looks forward to his disciples in after-ages; they must expect much disappointment. Ministers and churches will sometimes be under outward restraints. Then they will wish to see such days of opportunity as they have formerly enjoyed. God teaches us to know the worth of such mercies by the want of them. Sometimes they will be under inward restraints. Then they shall wish to see such victorious triumphant days as they have sometimes seen. We must not think that Christ's church and cause are lost because not always alike visible and prevailing.

3. That Christ and his kingdom are not to be looked for in this or that particular place, but his appearance will be general in all places at once (v. 23, 24): "They will say to you, See here, or, See there. Go not after them, nor follow them. The kingdom of God was not designed to be the glory of one people only, but to give light to the Gentiles; for as the lightning that lightens out of one part under heaven, and shines all on a sudden irresistibly to the other part under heaven, so shall also the Son of man be in his day. The gospel that is to set up Christ's kingdom in the world shall fly like lightning through the nations. The kingdom of the Messiah is not to be a local thing, but is to be dispersed far and wide over the face of the whole earth." The design of the setting up of Christ's kingdom was not to make one nation great, but to make all nations good—some, at least, of all nations.

4. That the Messiah must suffer before he must reign (v. 25): "First must he suffer many things and be rejected of this generation; and, if he be thus treated, his disciples must expect no other than to suffer and be rejected too for his sake. We must go by the cross to the crown. The Son of man must suffer many things. Pain, and shame, and death, are those many things. He must be rejected by this generation of unbelieving Jews, before he be embraced by another generation of believing Gentiles."

5. That the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah would introduce the destruction of the Jewish nation. Observe,

(1) How it had been with sinners formerly. Think how it was with the men of Sodom, who were wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly. Now observe, [1] That they had fair warning given them. Noah was a preacher of righteousness to the old world; so was Lot to the Sodomites. [2] That they did not regard the warning given them. They were very secure. They were all very merry, and yet very busy too. When they should have been, as the men of Nineveh, fasting and praying, repenting and reforming, they were going on securely, eating flesh, and drinking wine. [3] That they continued in their security and sensuality, till the threatened judgment came. [4] That God took care for the preservation of those that were his. Noah entered into the ark, and there he was safe; Lot went out of Sodom, and so went out of harm's way. [5] That they were surprised with the ruin which they would not fear. The flood came, and destroyed all the sinners of the old world; fire and brimstone came, and destroyed all the sinners of Sodom. But that which is especially intended here is to show what a dreadful surprise destruction will be to those who are secure and sensual.

(2) How it will be with sinners still (v. 30): Thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed. They have warning given by Christ now, and will have it repeated to them by the apostles after him; but it will be all in vain. One would have thought that this discourse of our Saviour's, which was public, should have awakened them; but it did not.

6. That it ought to be the care of his disciples and followers to distinguish themselves from the unbelieving Jews in that day, and, leaving them, to flee at the signal given, according to the direction that should be given. This flight of theirs from Jerusalem must be expeditious, and must not be retarded by any concern about their worldly affairs (v. 31): "He that shall be on the house-top, let him not come down, to take his stuff away." It will be better to leave his stuff behind him than to stay to look after it, and perish with them that believe not. It will be their concern to do as Lot and his family were charged to do: Escape for thy life. Save yourselves from this untoward generation. When they have made their escape, they must not think of returning (v. 32): "Remember Lot's wife and do not look back, as she did; be not loth to leave a place marked for destruction." Let them not look back, lest they should be tempted to go back; nay, lest that be construed a going back in heart, or an evidence that the heart was left behind. There would be no other way of saving their lives (v. 33): "Whosoever shall seek to save his life, he shall lose it; but whosoever is willing to venture his life, he shall preserve his life, for he shall make sure of eternal life."

7. That all good Christians should certainly escape, but many of them very narrowly, v. 34–36. When God's judgments are laying all waste, he will take an effectual course to preserve those that are his: two in a bed, one taken and the other left. Sooner or later it shall be made to appear that the Lord knows them that are his and them that are not.

8. That this distinguishing, dividing, discriminating work shall be done in all places, as far as the kingdom of God shall extend, v. 37. Where, Lord? They had enquired concerning the time, and he would not gratify their curiosity, they therefore tried him with another question: "Where, Lord?" The answer is proverbial: Wheresoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together. (1) Wherever the wicked are, they shall be found out by the judgments of God; as wherever a dead carcase is, the birds make a prey of it. The judgments of God shall fasten upon them, as the eagles do upon the prey. (2) Wherever the godly are, who are marked for preservation, they shall be found happy in the enjoyment of Christ. Wherever Christ is, believers will flock to him, and meet in him, as eagles about the prey, by the instinct of the new nature. Wherever the body is, wherever the gospel is preached, thither will pious souls resort, there they will find Christ. Wherever Christ records his name he will meet his people, and bless them.

CHAP. XVIII

I. The parable of the importunate widow, ver. 1–8. II. The parable of the Pharisee and publican, designed to teach us humiliation for sin, in prayer, ver 9–14. III. Christ's favour to little children that were brought to him, ver. 15–17. IV. The trial of a rich man that had a mind to follow Christ, whether he loved better Christ or his riches, ver. 18–30. V. Christ's foretelling his own death and sufferings, ver. 31–34. VI. His restoring sight to a blind man, ver. 35–43.

Verses 1–8

This parable has its key hanging at the door. Christ spoke it to teach us that men ought always to pray and not to faint, v. 1. It supposes that all God's people are praying people; all God's children send to him statedly, and upon every emergency. It is our privilege and honour that we may pray. It is our duty; we ought to pray. It is to be our constant work; we ought always to pray. We must pray, and never grow weary of praying, till it comes to be swallowed up in everlasting praise. But that which seems particularly designed here is to teach us constancy and perseverance in our requests for some spiritual mercies that we are in pursuit of, relating either to ourselves or to the church of God. When we are praying for strength against our spiritual enemies, our lusts and corruptions, we must continue instant in prayer, must pray and not faint, for we shall not seek God's face in vain.

I. Christ shows, by a parable, the power of importunity among men. He gives you an instance of an honest cause that succeeded before an unjust judge, not by the equity or compassionableness of it, but purely by dint of importunity. 1. The bad character of the judge that was in a certain city. He neither feared God nor regarded man; he took no care to do his duty either to God or man; he was a perfect stranger both to godliness and honour. It is not strange if those that have cast off the fear of their Creator be altogether regardless of their fellow-creatures; where no fear of God is no good is to be expected. Such a prevalency of irreligion and inhumanity is bad in any, but very bad in a judge. Instead of doing good with his power he will be in danger of doing hurt. 2. The distressed case of a poor widow. She had manifestly right on her side; but, it should seem, she tied not herself to the formalities of the law, but made personal application to the judge from day to day, still crying, Avenge me of mine adversary, that is, Do me justice against mine adversary. Magistrates are particularly charged, not only not to do violence to the widow (Jer. xxii. 3), but to judge the fatherless, and plead for the widow (Isa. i. 17). 3. The difficulty and discouragement she met with in her cause: He would not for awhile. According to his usual practice, he took no notice of her cause; for she had no bribe to give him, so that he did not at all incline to redress her grievances. 4. The gaining of her point by continually dunning this unjust judge (v. 5): "Because this widow troubleth me I will hear her cause, and do her justice, lest by her clamour to me she weary me; for she is resolved that she will give me no rest till it is done, and therefore I will do it, to save myself further trouble; as good at first as at last." Thus she got justice done her by continual craving.

II. He applies this for the encouragement of God's praying people.

1. He assures them that God will at length be gracious to them (v. 6): Hear what the unjust judge saith, and shall not God avenge his own elect? Observe,

(1) What it is that they desire and expect: that God would avenge his own elect. There are a people in the world that are God's people, his own elect. And this he has an eye to in all he does for them. God's own elect meet with a great deal of trouble and opposition in this world; there are many adversaries. That which is wanted and waited for is God's preserving and protecting them.

(2) What it is that is required of God's people: they must cry day and night to him. This he has made their duty, and to this he has promised mercy. We ought to be particular in praying against our spiritual enemies, like this importunate widow. Lord, mortify this corruption. Lord, arm me against this temptation. We ought to concern ourselves for the persecuted and oppressed churches, and to pray that God would do them justice. We must cry with earnestness; we must cry day and night; we must wrestle with God. God's praying people are told to give him no rest, Isa. lxii. 6, 7.

(3) What discouragements they may perhaps meet with in their prayers. He may bear long with them. He exercises patience towards the adversaries of his people, and he exercises the patience of his people.

(4) What assurance they have that mercy will come at last, though it be delayed. If this widow prevail by being importunate, much more shall God's elect prevail. [1] This widow was a stranger, but God's praying people are his own elect, whom he knows, and loves. [2] She was but one, but the praying people of God are many. Saints on earth besiege the throne of grace with their united prayers. [3] She came to a judge that bade her keep her distance; we come to a Father that bids us come boldly to him. [4] She came to an unjust judge; we come to a righteous Father. [5] She came to this judge purely upon her own account; but God is himself engaged in the cause which we are soliciting. [6] She had no friend to speak for her, but we have an Advocate with the Father, his own Son, who ever lives to make intercession for us. [7] She had no encouragement given her to ask; but we have a promise that it shall be given to us. [8] She could have access to the judge only at some certain times; but we may cry to God day and night, at all hours. [9] Her importunity was provoking to the judge, but our importunity is pleasing to God, and therefore we may hope, shall avail much, if it be an effectual fervent prayer.

2. He intimates to them that, notwithstanding this, they will begin to be weary of waiting for him (v. 8): "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Now, when he comes, will he find faith on the earth? The question implies a strong negation: No, he will not; he himself foresees it.

(1) It supposes that faith is the great thing that Jesus Christ looks for. He does not ask, Is there innocency? but, Is there faith?

(2) It supposes that if there were faith, though ever so little, he would find it out.

(3) It is foretold that, when Christ comes he will find but little faith. [1] In general, he will find but few good people. Many that have the form and fashion of godliness, but few that have faith, that are sincere and honest. [2] In particular, he will find few that have faith concerning his coming. It intimates that Christ may, and will, delay his coming so long as that, First, Wicked people will begin to defy it, and his delay will harden them in their wickedness. Secondly, Even his own people will begin to despair of it. But this is our comfort, that, when the time appointed comes, it will appear that the unbelief of man has not made the promise of God of no effect.

Verses 9–14

The scope of this parable likewise is prefixed to it. He designed it for the conviction of some who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others. 1. They were such as had a great conceit of themselves; they thought themselves as holy as they needed to be, and holier than all their neighbours. 2. They had a confidence in themselves before God. They trusted in themselves as being righteous; they thought they had made God their debtor. 3. They despised others. This is called a parable, though there be nothing of similitude in it. It is matter of fact every day.

I. Here are both these addressing themselves to the duty of prayer at the same place and time (v. 10): Two men went up into the temple to pray. It was not the hour of public prayer, but they went thither to offer up their personal devotions. The Pharisee and the publican both went to the temple to pray. Among the worshippers of God there is a mixture of good and bad. The Pharisee, proud as he was, could not think himself above prayer; nor could the publican, humble as he was, think himself shut out from the benefit of it. The Pharisee went to the temple to pray because it was a public place, and therefore he should have many eyes upon him. The character Christ gave of the Pharisees, that all their works they did to be seen of men, gives us occasion for this suspicion. There are many whom we see every day at the temple, whom, it is to be feared, we shall not see in the great day at Christ's right hand. The Pharisee came to the temple upon a compliment, the publican upon business; the Pharisee to make his appearance, the publican to make his request. God sees with what disposition and design we come to wait upon him.

II. Here is the Pharisee's address to God (for a prayer I cannot call it): He stood and prayed thus with himself (v. 11, 12); standing by himself, he prayed thus, so some read it; he was wholly intent upon himself, had nothing in his eye but self, not God's glory. That which he is here supposed to say is that which shows,

1. That he trusted to himself that he was righteous. A great many good things he said of himself, which we will suppose to be true. He was not an extortioner. He was not unjust in any of his dealings; he did no man any wrong; he was no adulterer. Yet this was not all: he fasted twice in the week. Thus he glorified God with his body: yet that was not all; he gave tithes of all that he possessed, and so glorified God with his worldly estate. Yet he was not accepted; and why was he not? (1) His giving God thanks for this seems to be a mere formality. He does not say,

By the grace of God I am what I am, as Paul did, but turns it off with a slight, God, I thank thee. (2) He makes his boast of this as if all his business to the temple was to tell God Almighty how very good he was. (3) He trusted to it as a righteousness. (4) Here is not one word of prayer in all he saith. He went up to the temple to pray, but forgot his errand. He thought he had need of nothing, no, not of the favour and grace of God, which, it would seem, he did not think worth asking.

2. That he despised others. (1) He thought meanly of all mankind but himself: I thank thee that I am not as other men are. We may have reason to thank God that we are not as some men are, but to speak as if we only were good, is to judge by wholesale. (2) He thought meanly in a particular manner of this publican. He knew that he was a publican, and therefore very uncharitably concluded that he was an extortioner, unjust, and all that is naught. Suppose it had been so, what business had he to take notice of it? Could not he say his prayers without reproaching his neighbours? And was he as much pleased with the publican's badness as with his own goodness?

III. Here is the publican's address to God, which was the reverse of the Pharisee's, as full of humility and humiliation as his was of pride and ostentation; as full of repentance for sin, and desire towards God, as his was of confidence in himself.

1. He expressed his repentance and humility in what he did. (1) He stood afar off. The publican kept at a distance under a sense of unworthiness to draw near to God. Hereby he owned that God might justly behold him afar off, and that it was a great favour that God was pleased to admit him thus nigh. (2) He would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven. He did lift up his heart to God in the heavens, in holy desires, but, through prevailing shame and humiliation, he did not lift up his eyes in holy confidence and courage. The dejection of his looks is an indication of the dejection of his mind at the thought of sin. (3) He smote upon his breast. The sinner's heart first smites him in a penitent rebuke. Sinner, what hast thou done? And then he smites his heart with penitent remorse: O wretched man that I am!

2. He expressed it in what he said. His prayer was short. Sighs and groans swallowed up his words; but what he said was to the purpose: God, be merciful to me a sinner. And blessed be God that we have this prayer upon record as an answered prayer. (1) He owns himself a sinner by nature, by practice, guilty before God. The Pharisee denies himself to be a sinner. But the publican gives himself no other character than that of a sinner. (2) He has no dependence but upon the mercy of God. The Pharisee had insisted upon the merit of his fastings and tithes; but the poor publican disclaims all thought of merit, and flies to mercy as his city of refuge. "Justice condemns me; nothing will save me but mercy, mercy." (3) He earnestly prays for the benefit of that mercy: "O God, be merciful, be propitious, to me." He comes as a beggar for an alms, when he is ready to perish for hunger. Probably he repeated this prayer with renewed affections, but still this was the burden of the song: God, be merciful to me a sinner.

IV. Here is the publican's acceptance with God. There were those who would cry up the Pharisee, and who would look with contempt upon this sneaking whining publican. But our Lord Jesus assures us that this poor, penitent, broken-hearted publican went to his house justified, rather than the other. The Pharisee thought that if one of them must be justified, and not the other, certainly it must be he rather than the publican. "No," saith Christ, "I tell you it is the publican rather than the Pharisee." The proud Pharisee goes away rejected of God; he is not justified. He is not accepted as righteous in God's sight, because he is so righteous in his own sight; but the publican obtains the remission of his sins, and he whom the Pharisee would not set with the dogs of his flock God sets with the children of his family. Proud men, who exalt themselves, are rivals with God, and therefore they shall certainly be abased. Humble men, who abase themselves, are subject to God, and they shall be exalted. See how the punishment answers the sin: He that exalteth himself shall be abased. See how the recompense answers the duty: He that humbles himself shall be exalted. See also the power of God's grace in bringing good out of evil; the publican had been a great sinner, and out of the greatness of his sin was brought the greatness of his repentance. It was good that the Pharisee was no extortioner, nor unjust; but the devil made him proud of this, to his ruin.

Verses 15–17

1. Those who are themselves blessed in Christ should desire to have their children also blessed in him. They brought to him infants, very young, not able to go, sucking children, as some think. None are too little, too young, to bring to Christ. 2. One gracious touch of Christ's will make our children happy. They brought infants to him, that he might touch them. 3. It is no strange thing for those who make their application to Jesus Christ, for themselves or for their children, to meet with discouragement: When the disciples saw it they rebuked them. 4. Many whom the disciples rebuke the Master invites: Jesus called them unto him. 5. It is the mind of Christ that little children should be brought to him: "Suffer little children to come to me, and forbid them not; let nothing be done to hinder them, for they shall be as welcome as any." 6. The children of those who belong to the kingdom of God do likewise belong to that kingdom, as the children of freemen are freemen. 7. Those grown people are most welcome to him who have in them most of the disposition of children (v. 17): Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, that is, receive the benefits of it with humility and thankfulness, gladly owning himself indebted to free grace for them; unless a man be brought to this self-denying frame he shall in no wise enter into that kingdom.

Verses 18–30

I. Christ's discourse with a ruler, that had a good mind to be directed by him in the way to heaven.

1. Luke takes notice of it that he was a ruler. Few of the rulers had any esteem for Christ, but here was one that had.

2. The great thing we are everyone of us concerned to enquire after is, what we shall do to inherit eternal life.

3. Those who would inherit eternal life must apply themselves to Jesus Christ as their Master, their teaching Master, and their ruling Master. There is no learning the way to heaven but in the school of Christ.

4. Those who come to Christ as their Master must believe him to have not only a divine mission, but a divine goodness. "Why callest thou me good? Thou knowest there is none good but one, that is, God."

5. Our Master, Christ himself, has not altered the way to heaven from what it was before his coming, but has only made it more plain, and easy, and comfortable. Thou knowest the commandments. Wouldest thou inherit eternal life? Govern thyself by the commandments.

6. The duties of the second table must be conscientiously observed. Nor is it enough to keep ourselves free from the gross violations of these commandments, but we must know these commandments in their extent and spiritual nature.

7. Men think themselves innocent because they are ignorant; so this ruler did. He said, All these have I kept from my youth up, v. 21. He boasts that he began early in a course of virtue, that he had continued in it to this day, and that he had not in any instance transgressed. Had he been acquainted with the nature of the divine law, and with the workings of his own heart,—had he been but Christ's disciple awhile, he would have said quite the contrary: "All these have I broken from my youth up."

8. The great things are how we stand affected to Christ and to our brethren, to this world and to the other. If he have a true affection to Christ, he will come and follow him whatever it cost him. None shall inherit eternal life who are not willing to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes. If he have a true affection to his brethren, he will distribute to the poor. If he think meanly of this world he will not stick at selling what he has for the relief of God's poor. If he think highly of the other world, he will desire no more than to have treasure in heaven.

9. There are many that have a great deal in them that is very commendable, and yet they perish for lack of some one thing; so this ruler here; he broke with Christ upon this, which would part between him and his estate.

10. Many that are loth to leave Christ, yet do leave him. Their corruptions carry the day at last. If one must be quitted, it shall be their God, not their worldly gain.

II. Christ's discourse with his disciples upon this occasion, in which we may observe, 1. Riches are a great hindrance to many in the way to heaven. He saw that he was very sorrowful, and was sorry for him; but thence he infers, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! v. 24. Having a great estate, it had a great influence upon him, and he chose rather to take his leave of Christ than to lay himself under an obligation to dispose of his estate in charitable uses. Christ asserts the difficulty of the salvation of rich people very emphatically: It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God, v. 25. 2. It is really very hard for any to get to heaven. If we must sell all, or break with Christ, who then can be saved? v. 26. They do not find fault with what Christ required as hard and unreasonable. But they know how closely the hearts of most men cleave to this world, and are ready to despair of their being ever brought to this. 3. There are such difficulties in the way of our salvation as could never be got over but by that grace of God which is almighty. The things which are impossible with men, these things are possible with God. His grace can work upon the soul, so as to alter the bent and bias of it, and give it a contrary ply. 4. There is an aptness in us to speak too much of what we have left and lost for Christ. This appears in Peter: Lo we have left all, and followed thee, v. 28. When it came in his way, he could not forbear magnifying his own and his brethren's affection to Christ, in quitting all to follow him. 5. Whatever we have left for Christ, it shall without fail be abundantly made up to us in this world and that to come (v. 29, 30): No man has left the comfort of his estate or relations for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, in the pleasures of communion with God and of a good conscience, advantages which will abundantly countervail all their losses. In the world to come they shall receive life everlasting, which is the thing that the ruler seemed to have his eye and heart upon.

Verses 31–34

I. The notice Christ gave to his disciples of his sufferings and death approaching, and of the glorious issue of them. Two things are here which we had not in the other evangelists:—1. The sufferings of Christ are here spoken of as the fulfilling of the scriptures. All things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished. This proves that the scriptures are the word of God, for they had their exact and full accomplishment; and that Jesus Christ was sent of God, for they had their accomplishment in him. This makes the offence of the cross to cease, and puts an honour upon it. Thus it was written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer. 2. The ignominy and disgrace done to Christ in his sufferings are here most insisted upon. The other evangelists had said that he should be mocked; but here it is added, He shall be spitefully treated, shall have all possible reproach put upon him. But here, as always, when Christ spoke of his sufferings and death, he foretold his resurrection as that which took off both the terror and reproach of his sufferings: The third day he shall rise again.

II. The confusion that the disciples were hereby put into. This was so contrary to the notions they had had of the Messiah and his kingdom that they understood none of these things, v. 34. Their prejudices were so strong that they would not understand them literally, and they could not understand them otherwise, so that they did not understand them at all. This saying was hidden from them, they could not receive it. They were so intent upon those prophecies that spoke of his glory that they overlooked those that spoke of his sufferings. Therefore it is that people run into mistakes, because they read their Bibles by the halves, and are as partial in the prophets as they are in the law. Thus now we are too apt, in reading, the prophecies that are yet to be fulfilled, to have our expectations raised of the glorious state of the church in the latter days. But we overlook its wilderness sackcloth state, and are willing to fancy that is over.

Christ came not only to bring light to a dark world, and so to set before us the objects we are to have in view, but also to give sight to blind souls, to enable them to view those objects. We have now an account of one to whom he gave sight near Jericho. Mark gives us an account of one, and names him, whom he cured as he went out of Jericho, Mark x. 46. Matthew speaks of two whom he cured as they departed from Jericho, Matt. xx. 30. Luke says it was when he was near to Jericho.

I. This poor blind man sat by the wayside, begging, v. 35. It seems, he was not only blind, but poor; the fitter emblem of the world of mankind which Christ came to heal and save. He sat begging, for he was blind, and could not work for his living. Such objects of charity by the wayside ought not to be overlooked by us. Christ here cast a favourable eye upon a common beggar.

II. Hearing the noise of a multitude passing by, he asked what it meant, v. 36. This we had not before. It teaches us that it is good to be inquisitive, and that those who are so some time or other find the benefit of it. Those who want their sight should make so much the better use of their hearing, and, when they cannot see with their own eyes, should, by asking questions, make use of other people's eyes. So this blind man did, and by that means came to understand that Jesus of Nazareth passed by, v. 37.

III. His prayer has in it a great deal both of faith and fervency: Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me, v. 38. He believes he is able to help and succour him, and earnestly begs his favour: "Have mercy on me." Have mercy on us; for Christ's mercy includes all.

IV. Those who are in good earnest for Christ's favours and blessings will not be put by from the pursuit of them, though they meet with opposition and rebuke. They who went along chid him as troublesome to the Master, noisy and impertinent, and bade him hold his peace. The check given him was but as a dam to a full stream, which makes it swell so much the more: he cried the louder, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me.

V. Christ encourages poor beggars and invites them to come to him: He commanded him to be brought to him. Christ has more tenderness and compassion for distressed supplicants than any of his followers have. Those who had checked him must now lend him their hands to lead him to Christ.

VI. Though Christ knows all our wants, he will know them from us (v. 41): What wilt thou that I shall do unto thee? This man poured out his soul before Christ, when he said, Lord, that I may receive my sight.

VII. The prayer of faith shall not be in vain (v. 42); Christ said, Receive thy sight, thy faith hath saved thee. True faith will produce fervency in prayer, and both together will fetch in abundance of the fruits of Christ's favour.

VIII. The grace of Christ ought to be thankfully acknowledged, v. 43. 1. The poor beggar himself, that had his sight restored, followed Christ, glorifying God. Those whom he healed pleased him best when they praised God, as those shall please God best who praise Christ and do him honour. 2. The people that saw it could not forbear giving praise to God. We must give praise to God for his mercies to others as well as for mercies to ourselves.

CHAP. XIX

I. The conversion of Zaccheus the publican at Jericho, ver. 1–10. II. The parable of the pounds which the king entrusted with his servants, and of his rebellious citizens, ver. 11–27. III. Christ's riding in triumph into Jerusalem; and his lamentation in prospect of the ruin of that city, ver. 28–44. IV. His teaching in the temple, and casting the buyers and sellers out of it, ver. 45–48.

Verses 1–10

Many, no doubt, were converted to the faith of Christ of whom no account is kept in the gospels; but the conversion of some, whose case had something in it extraordinary, is recorded, as this of Zaccheus. Christ passed through Jericho, v. 1. This city was built under a curse, yet Christ honoured it with his presence, for the gospel takes away the curse.

I. Who, and what, this Zaccheus was. His name bespeaks him a Jew. 1. His calling, and the post he was in: He was the chief among the publicans. Here was one that was chief of the publicans, that enquired after him. God has his remnant among all sorts. Christ came to save even the chief of sinners, and therefore even the chief of publicans. 2. His circumstances in the world were very considerable: He was rich. Christ had lately shown how hard it is for rich people to enter into the kingdom of God, yet presently produces an instance of one rich man that had been lost, and was found, and that not as the prodigal by being reduced to want.

II. How he came in Christ's way. 1. He had a great curiosity to see Jesus, v. 3. It is natural to us to come in sight, if we can, of those whose fame has filled our ears; at least, we shall be able to say hereafter that we have seen such and such great men. We should now seek to see Jesus with an eye of faith, to see who he is; We would see Jesus. 2. He could not get his curiosity gratified in this matter because he was little, and the crowd was great. Christ did not study to show himself. As one of us, he was lost in a crowd. Many that are little of stature have large souls, and are lively in spirit. 3. Because he would not disappoint his curiosity he forgot his gravity, and ran before, like a boy, and climbed up into a sycamore-tree, to see him. Those that sincerely desire a sight of Christ will use the proper means for gaining a sight of him. Those that find themselves little must take all the advantages they can get to raise themselves to a sight of Christ. Let not dwarfs despair, with good help, by aiming high to reach high.

III. The notice Christ took of him, the call he gave him to a further acquaintance (v. 5), and the efficacy of that call, v. 6. 1. Christ invited himself to Zaccheus's house. Christ looked up into the tree, and saw Zaccheus. He came to look upon Christ, but little thought of being taken notice of by Christ. See how Christ prevented him with the blessings of his goodness, and outdid his expectations; and see how he encouraged very weak beginnings. He that had a mind to know Christ shall be known of him; he that only courted to see him shall be admitted to converse with him. And sometimes those that come to hear the word of Christ, as Zaccheus did, only for curiosity, have their consciences awakened, and their hearts changed. Christ called him by name, Zaccheus. He bade him make haste, and come down. Zaccheus must not hesitate, but hasten. He must come down, for Christ intends this day to bait at his house, and stay an hour or two with him. 2. Zaccheus was overjoyed to have such an honour put upon his house (v. 6): He made haste, and came down, and received him joyfully; and his receiving him into his house was an indication and token of his receiving him into his heart. How often has Christ said to us, Open to me, when we have made excuses! Zaccheus's forwardness to receive Christ will shame us.

IV. The offence which the people took. Those narrow-souled censorious Jews murmured, saying that he was gone to be a guest with a man that is a sinner; and were not they themselves sinful men? Was it not Christ's errand to seek and save men that are sinners? Now this was very unjust to blame Christ for going to his house: 1. Though he was a publican, and many of the publicans were bad men, it did not therefore follow that they were all so. We must take heed of condemning men in the lump, for at God's bar every man will be judged as he is. 2. Though he had been a sinner, it did not therefore follow that he was now as bad as he had been. God allows room for repentance, and so must we. 3. Though he was now a sinner, they ought not to blame Christ for going to him. Whither should the physician go but to the sick?

V. The proofs which Zaccheus gave publicly that he was now a penitent, v. 8. By his good works he will evidence the sincerity of his faith and repentance. He stood, which denotes his saying it deliberately and with solemnity, in the nature of a vow to God. He addressed himself to Christ in it, not to the people, but to the Lord. He makes it appear that there is a change in his heart (and that is repentance), for there is a change in his way.

1. Zaccheus had a good estate. He resolves that for the future he will be all towards God, and do good to others with it: Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor. "I do give it now," saith Zaccheus; "though hitherto I have been uncharitable to the poor, now I will relieve them, and give so much the more for having neglected the duty so long, even the half of my goods." Zaccheus would give one moiety to the poor, which would oblige him to retrench all his extravagant expenses. This he mentions here as a fruit of his repentance.

2. Zaccheus was conscious to himself that he had not gotten all he had honestly and fairly. He promises to make restitution: "If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, exacting more than was appointed, I promise to restore him four-fold." (1) He seems plainly to own that he had done wrong. True penitents will own themselves not only in general guilty before God, but will particularly reflect upon that which, by reason of their business and employment in the world, has most easily beset them. (2) He admits that he had done wrong by false accusation. They had the ear of the government, which gave them an opportunity of gratifying their revenge if they bore a man an ill will. (3) He promises to restore four-fold. He does not say, "If I be sued, and compelled to it, I will make restitution" (some are honest when they cannot help it); but he will do it voluntarily. Those who are convinced of having done wrong cannot evidence the sincerity of their repentance but by making restitution. He does not think that his giving half his estate to the poor will atone for the wrong he has done. It is no charity, but hypocrisy, to give that which is none of our own; and we are not to reckon that our own which we have not come honestly by.

VI. Christ's approbation and acceptance of Zaccheus's conversion, v. 9, 10.

1. Zaccheus is declared to be now a happy man. This day is salvation come to this house. Now that he is converted he is in effect saved. Christ is come to his house, and, where Christ comes, he brings salvation along with him. Yet this is not all. Salvation this day comes to his house. (1) When Zaccheus becomes a convert, he will be, more than he had been, a blessing to his house. He will bring the means of grace and salvation to his house. He that is charitable to the poor does a kindness to his own house, and brings a blessing upon it. (2) When Zaccheus is brought to Christ himself his family also become related to Christ, and so salvation comes to his house, for that he is a son of Abraham, that blessing of Abraham which comes upon the publicans, upon the Gentiles, through faith, that God will be a God to them and to their children. Zaccheus is by birth a son of Abraham, but, being a publican, he was deemed a heathen. Being a true penitent, he is become as good a son of Abraham as if he had never been a publican.

2. What Christ had done was consonant to the great design and intention of his coming into the world, v. 10. With the same argument he had before justified his conversing with publicans, Matt. ix. 13. There he pleaded that he came to call sinners to repentance; now that he came to seek and save that which was lost. (1) The deplorable case of the sons of men: they were lost. The whole world of mankind, by the fall, is become a lost world: as a traveller is lost when he has missed his way in a wilderness, as a sick man is lost when his disease is incurable. (2) The gracious design of the Son of God: he came to seek and save, to seek in order to saving. He came from heaven to earth (a long journey), to seek that which was lost (which had wandered and gone astray), and to bring it back (Matt. xviii. 11, 12), and to save that which was lost, which was perishing. Christ undertook the cause when it was given up for lost. Christ came into this lost world to seek and save it. His design was to save. In prosecution of that design, he sought, took all probable means to effect that salvation. He seeks those that sought him not, and asked not for him, as Zaccheus here.

Verses 11–27

Our Lord Jesus is now upon his way to Jerusalem, to his last passover.

I. How the expectations of his friends were raised upon this occasion: They thought that the kingdom of God would immediately appear, v. 11. The Pharisees expected it about this time (ch. xvii. 20), and, it seems, so did Christ's own disciples. The disciples thought that their Master would introduce it, but with temporal pomp and power. Jerusalem, they concluded, must be the seat of his kingdom, and therefore, now that he is going directly thither, they doubt not but in a little time to see him upon the throne there. Even good men are subject to mistakes concerning the kingdom of Christ.

II. How their expectations were checked, and the mistakes rectified; and this he does in three things:—

1. They expected that he should appear in his glory now presently, but he tells them that he must not be publicly installed in his kingdom for a great while yet. He is like a certain nobleman, he goes into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom. He must receive the kingdom, and then return. Christ returned when the Spirit was poured out, when Jerusalem was destroyed. But his chief return here meant is that at the great day, of which we are yet in expectation.

2. They expected that his apostles and immediate attendants should be advanced to dignity and honour, that they should all be made princes and peers, privy-counsellors and judges, and have all the pomp and preferments of the court and of the town. But Christ here tells them that, instead of this, he designed them to be men of business; they must expect no other preferment in this world than that of the trading end of the town; he would set them up with a stock under their hands, that they might employ it themselves, in serving him and the interest of his kingdom among men. That is the true honour of a Christian and a minister which will enable us to look upon all temporal honours with a holy contempt. The apostles had dreamed of sitting on his right hand and on his left in his kingdom, and were pleasing themselves with this dream; but Christ tells them that which would fill them with serious thoughts, instead of those aspiring ones.

(1) They have a great work to do now. Their Master leaves them, and, at parting, he gives each of them a pound. This signifies the same thing with the talents in the parable that is parallel to this (Matt. xxv). But perhaps it is in the parable thus represented to make them the more humble; their honour in this world is only that of traders, and that not of first-rate merchants. He gave these pounds to his servants, with this charge: Occupy till I come. Or, as it might much better be translated, Trade till I come—Be busy. So the word properly signifies. "Now," saith he, "mind your business, and make a business of it; set about it in good earnest, and stick to it." All Christians have business to do for Christ in this world, and ministers especially; the former were not baptized, nor the latter ordained, to be idle. Those that are called to business for Christ he furnishes with gifts necessary for their business; and, on the other hand, from those to whom he gives power he expects service. He delivers the pounds with this charge, Go work, go trade. We must continue to mind our business till our Master comes.

(2) They have a great account to make shortly. These servants are called to him that he might know what every man had gained by trading. They that trade diligently and faithfully in the service of Christ shall be gainers. Many a labouring tradesman has been a loser; but those that trade for Christ shall be gainers. The conversion of souls is the winning of them; every true convert is clear gain to Jesus Christ. Ministers are but factors for him, and to him they must give account what fish they have enclosed in the gospel-net, that is, what they have gained by trading.

First, The good account which was given by some of the servants, and the master's approbation of them. Two such are instanced, v. 16, 19. 1. They had both made considerable improvements, but not both alike; one had gained ten pounds by his trading, and another five. All that are alike faithful are not alike successful. And perhaps, though they were both faithful, one of them took more pains, and applied himself more closely to his business, than the other, and sped accordingly. 2. They both acknowledged their obligations to their Master: Lord, it is not my industry, but thy pound, that has gained ten pounds. God must have all the glory of all our gains. 3. They were both commended for their fidelity and industry: Well done, thou good servant, v. 17. And to the other he said likewise, v. 19. If he says Well done, the matter is not great who says otherwise. 4. They were preferred in proportion to the improvement they had made: "Because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities." Those are in a fair way to rise who are content to begin low. Two things are hereby promised the apostles: (1) That when they have taken pains to plant many churches they shall have great respect paid them, and have a great interest in the love and esteem of good Christians. (2) That, when they have served their generation, according to the will of Christ, in the other world they shall reign as kings with Christ. The happiness of heaven will be a much greater advancement to a good minister or Christian than it would be to a poor tradesman to be made governor of ten cities. He that had gained but five pounds had dominion over five cities. There are degrees of glory in heaven; every vessel will be alike full, but not alike large. And the degrees of glory there will be according to the degrees of usefulness here.

Secondly, The bad account that was given by one of them, and the sentence passed upon him, v. 20, &c. 1. He owned that he had not traded with the pound with which he had been entrusted (v. 20): "Lord, behold, here is thy pound; it is true, I have not made it more, but withal I have not made it less; I have kept it safely laid up in a napkin." This represents the carelessness of those who have gifts, but never lay out themselves to do good with them. It is all one to them whether the interests of Christ's kingdom sink or swim, go backward or forward; for their parts, they will take no care about it. Those are the servants that lay up their pound in a napkin who think it enough to say that they have done no hurt in the world, but did no good. 2. He justified himself with a plea that made the matter worse and not better (v. 21): I feared thee, because thou art an austere man. Austere is the Greek word itself: a sharp man: Thou takest up that which thou laidst not down. He thought that it was reaping where he did not sow; whereas really it was reaping where he had sown. He had no reason to fear his master's austerity. This was a mere sham, a frivolous groundless excuse for his idleness. 3. His excuse is turned upon him: Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant, v. 22. He will be condemned by his crime, but self-condemned by his plea. If thou hadst had any regard to my interest, thou mightest have put my money into the bank, that I might have had, not only my own, but my own with usury. If he durst not trade for fear of losing the principal, yet that would be no excuse for his not setting it out to interest, where it would be sure. Whatever may be the pretences of slothful professors, the true reason of it is a reigning indifference to the interests of Christ and his kingdom. They care not whether religion gets ground or loses ground, so long as they can but live at ease. 4. His pound is taken from him, v. 34. It is fit that those should lose their gifts who will not use them. Take from him the pound. 5. It is given to him that had the ten pounds. When this was objected against because he had so much already (Lord, he has ten pounds, v. 25), it is answered (v. 26), Unto everyone that hath shall be given. It is the rule of justice, (1) That those should be most encouraged who have been most industrious. To him that hath gotten shall more be given, that he may be in a capacity to get more. (2) That those who have their gifts, as if they had them not, should be deprived of them. To those who endeavour to increase the grace they have, God will impart more; those who neglect it, and suffer it to decline, can expect no other than that God should do so too.

3. Another thing they expected was, that, when the kingdom of God should appear, the body of the Jewish nation would immediately fall in with it. Christ tells them that, after his departure, the generality of them would persist in their obstinacy and rebellion. This is shown here,

(1) In the message which his citizens sent after him, v. 14. When he was gone to be invested in his kingdom, then they continued their enmity to him, and said, We will not have this man to reign over us. This was fulfilled in the prevailing infidelity of the Jews after the ascension of Christ. They would not submit their necks to his yoke. It speaks the language of all unbelievers; they could be content that Christ should save them, but they will not have him to reign over them.

(2) In the sentence passed upon them at his return: Those mine enemies bring hither, v. 27. When his faithful subjects are preferred and rewarded, then he will take vengeance on his enemies. When the kingdom of God appeared then vengeance was taken on those irreconcilable enemies to Christ and his government; they were brought forth and slain before him. But this is applicable to all others who persist in their infidelity. Utter ruin will certainly be the portion of all Christ's enemies. Bring them hither, to have their frivolous pleas overruled, and to receive sentence according to their merits. Those that will not have Christ to reign over them shall be reputed and dealt with as his enemies. Those will be accounted so that will not submit to Christ's yoke, but will be their own masters. Whoever will not be ruled by the grace of Christ will inevitably be ruined by the wrath of Christ.

We have here the same account of Christ's riding in some sort of triumph (such as it was) into Jerusalem which we had before in Matthew and Mark.

I. Jesus Christ was forward and willing to suffer and die for us. He went forward to Jerusalem knowing very well the things that should befall him there, and yet he went before, ascending up to Jerusalem, v. 28. He was the foremost of the company. Was he so forward to suffer and die for us, and shall we draw back from any service we are capable of doing for him?

II. It was no ways inconsistent either with Christ's humility or with this present state of humiliation to make a public entry into Jerusalem a little before he died. The ignominy of his death might appear the greater.

III. Christ is entitled to a dominion over all the creatures. Christ sent to fetch an ass and her colt from their owner's and master's crib, when he had occasion for their service.

IV. Christ has all men's hearts both under his eye and in his hand. He could influence those to whom the ass and the colt belonged to consent to their taking them away, as soon as they were told that the Lord had occasion for them.

V. Those that go on Christ's errands are sure to speed (v. 32). It is a comfort to Christ's messengers that they shall bring what they are sent for, if indeed the Lord has occasion for it.

VI. The disciples of Christ, who fetch that for him from others which he has occasion for, should not think that enough, but, whatever they have themselves wherewith he may be served, they should be ready to serve him with it. Those disciples not only fetched the ass's colt for him, but cast their own garments upon the colt.

VII. Christ's triumphs are the matter of his disciples' praises. When Christ came nigh to Jerusalem, God put it of a sudden into the hearts of the whole multitude of the disciples, not of the twelve only, to rejoice and praise God (v. 37), and the spreading of their clothes in the way (v. 36) was a common expression of joy. Observe, What was the matter or occasion of their joy and praise. They praised God for all the mighty works they had seen, especially the raising of Lazarus, which is particularly mentioned, John xii. 17, 18. See how they expressed their joy and praise (v. 38): Blessed be the king that cometh in the name of the Lord. Christ is the king; he comes in the name of the Lord. Blessed be he. Let us praise him, let God prosper him. Peace in heaven. Let the God of heaven send peace and success to his undertaking, and then there will be glory in the highest. Compare this song of the saints on earth with that of the angels, ch. ii. 14. They both agree to give glory to God in the highest. The angels say, On earth peace. The saints say, Peace in heaven. Such is the communion we have with the holy angels that, as they rejoice in the peace on earth, so we rejoice in the peace in heaven.

VIII. Christ's triumphs, and his disciples' joyful praises of them, are the vexation of proud Pharisees. There were some Pharisees among the multitude who were enraged at them. They thought that he would not admit such acclamations as these, and therefore expected that he should rebuke his disciples, v. 39. As he despises the contempt of the proud, so he accepts the praises of the humble.

IX. Whether men praise Christ or no he will, and shall, and must be praised (v. 40): If these should hold their peace the stones would immediately cry out, rather than that Christ should not be praised. Pharisees would silence the praises of Christ, but they cannot gain their point; for as God can out of stones raise up children unto Abraham, so he can out of the mouths of those children perfect praise.

Verses 41-48

The great Ambassador from heaven is here making his public entry into Jerusalem, not to be respected there, but to be rejected. See here two instances of his love to that place and his concern for it.

I. The tears he shed for the approaching ruin of the city (v. 41): When he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it. Probably, it was when he was coming down the descent of the hill from the mount of Olives, where he had a full view of the city, and his eye affected his heart, and his heart his eye again. See here,

1. What a tender spirit Christ was of; we never read that he laughed, but we often find him in tears.

2. That Jesus Christ wept when all about him were rejoicing, to show how little he was elevated with the applause and acclamation of the people.

3. That he wept over Jerusalem. There are cities to be wept over, and none to be more lamented than Jerusalem. But why did Christ weep at the sight of Jerusalem? He himself gives us the reason of his tears.

(1) Jerusalem has not improved the day of her opportunities. He wept, and said, If thou hadst known, even thou at least in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace—but thou dost not know the day of thy visitation, v. 44. The manner of speaking is abrupt: If thou hadst known! O that thou hadst, so some take it. Or, If thou hadst known, well; like that of the fig-tree, ch. xiii. 9. How happy had it been for thee! What he says lays all the blame of Jerusalem's impending ruin upon herself. [1] There are things which belong to our peace, which we are all concerned to know and understand. The things that belong to our peace are those things that relate to our present and future welfare; these we must know with application. [2] There is a time of visitation when those things which belong to our peace may be known by us. When we enjoy the means of grace in great plenty, and have the word of God powerfully preached to us—then is the time of visitation. [3] With those that have long neglected the time of their visitation, if at last their eyes be opened, and they bethink themselves, all will be well yet. Those shall not be refused that come into the vineyard at the eleventh hour. [4] It is the amazing folly of multitudes that enjoy the means of grace, that they do not improve the day of their opportunities. The things of their peace are revealed to them, but are not minded or regarded by them; they hide their eyes from them. They are not aware of the accepted time and the day of salvation, and so let it slip and perish through mere carelessness. None are so blind as those that will not see. [5] The sin and folly of those that persist in a contempt of gospel grace are a great grief to the Lord Jesus, and should be so to us. He looks with weeping eyes upon lost souls, that continue impenitent. He had rather that they would turn and live than go on and die, for he is not willing that any should perish.

(2) Jerusalem cannot escape the day of her desolation. The things of her peace are now in a manner hidden from her eyes. Not but that after this the gospel was preached to them by the apostles, and multitudes were convinced and converted. But as to the body of the nation, and the leading part of it, they were sealed up under unbelief. They were justly given up to judicial blindness and hardness. Neglecting the great salvation often brings temporal judgments upon a people; it did so upon Jerusalem. [1] The Romans besieged the city, cast a trench about it, compassed it round, and kept their inhabitants in on every side. [2] They laid it even with the ground. Titus commanded his soldiers to dig up the city, and the whole compass of it was levelled, except three towers. Not only the city, but the citizens were laid even with the ground (thy children within thee), by the cruel slaughters that were made of them: and there was scarcely one stone left upon another. This was because they knew not the day of their visitation.

II. The zeal he showed for the present purification of the temple.

1. Christ cleared it of those who profaned it. He went straight to the temple, and began to cast out the buyers and sellers, v. 45. Its purity was more its glory than its wealth was. Christ gave a reason for his dislodging the temple-merchants, v. 46. The temple is a house of prayer, set apart for communion with God: the buyers and sellers made it a den of thieves by the fraudulent bargains they made there. It would be a distraction to those who came there to pray.

2. He put it to the best use that ever it was put to, for he taught daily in the temple, v. 47. Now, when Christ preached in the temple, observe here, (1) How spiteful the church-rulers were against him (v. 47): The chief priests and scribes, and the chief of the people, sought to destroy him. (2) How respectful the common people were to him. They were very attentive to hear him. The people paid him great respect, attended on his preaching with diligence. Some read it, All the people, as they heard him, took his part; and so his enemies could not find what they might do against him. Till his hour was come his interest in the common people protected him; but, when his hour was come, the chief priests' influence upon the common people delivered him up.

CHAP. XX

I. Christ's answer to the chief priests' question concerning his authority, ver. 1–8. II. The parable of the vineyard, let out to unjust and rebellious husbandmen, ver. 9–19. III. Christ's answer to the question proposed to him concerning the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar, ver. 20–26. IV. His vindication of that great fundamental doctrine—the resurrection of the dead and the future state, ver. 27–39. V. His puzzling the scribes with a question concerning the Messiah's being the Son of David, ver. 39–44. VI. The caution he gave his disciples to take heed of the scribes, ver. 46–47.

Verses 1–8

Nothing is added here to what we had in the other evangelists; but only in the first verse, where we are told,

I. That he was now teaching the people in the temple, and preaching the gospel. Christ was a preacher of his own gospel. He not only purchased the salvation for us, but published it to us. This likewise puts an honour upon the preachers of the gospel. It puts an honour upon the popular preachers of the gospel; Christ condescended to the capacities of the people in preaching the gospel, and taught them.

II. That his enemies are here said to come upon him. The word is used only here, and it intimates,

1. That they thought to surprise him with this question; they came upon him suddenly.

2. That they thought to frighten him with this question. From this story itself we may learn, (1) That it is not to be thought strange, if even that which is evident be disputed and called in question by those that shut their eyes against the light. Christ's miracles plainly showed by what authority he did these things. (2) Those that question Christ's authority will have their folly made manifest unto all men. Christ answered these priests and scribes with a question concerning the baptism of John: Was it from heaven or of men? They all knew it was from heaven. And this question gravelled them, and ran them aground, and served to shame them before the people. (3) It is not strange if those that are governed by reputation and secular interest imprison the plainest truths, as these priests and scribes did who would not own that John's baptism was from heaven, and had no other reason why they did not say it was of men but because they feared the people. What good can be expected from men of such a spirit? (4) Those that bury the knowledge they have are justly denied further knowledge, v. 7, 8.

Verses 9–19

Christ spoke this parable against those who were resolved not to own his authority.

I. The parable has nothing added here to what we had before in Matthew and Mark. The scope of it is to show that the Jewish nation had provoked God to abandon them to ruin. It teaches us, 1. That those who enjoy the privileges of the visible church are as tenants and farmers that have a vineyard to look after, and rent to pay for it. God, by setting up revealed religion, hath planted a vineyard, which he lets out, v. 9. And they have vineyard work to do, needful and constant work, but pleasant and profitable. They have also vineyard-fruits to present to the Lord of the vineyard. There are rents to be paid and services to be done. 2. That the work of God's ministers is to call upon those who enjoy the privileges of the church to bring forth fruit accordingly. They are God's rent-gatherers, v. 10. 3. That it has often been the lot of God's faithful servants to be wretchedly abused by his own tenants. They that are resolved not to do their duty to God cannot bear to be called upon to do it. 4. That God sent his Son into the world to gather the fruits of the vineyard. The prophets spoke as servants, but Christ as a Son; to send him, one would have thought, should have won upon them. 5. That those who reject Christ's ministers would reject Christ himself. They said, This is the heir, come let us kill him. When they slew the servants, there were other servants sent. "But, if we can but be the death of the son, there is never another son to be sent; we may have a quiet possession of the vineyard for ourselves." Therefore they took the bold step, they cast him out of the vineyard, and killed him. 6. That the putting of Christ to death filled up the measure of the Jewish iniquity. No other could be expected than that God should destroy those wicked husbandmen. Those that live in the neglect of their duty to God know not what degrees of sin and destruction they are running themselves into.

II. To the application of the parable is added here, which we had not before, their deprecation of the doom included in it (v. 16): When they heard it, they said, God forbid—Let not this be done, so it should be read. And see what a cheat they put upon themselves, to think to avoid it by a cold God forbid, when they do nothing towards the preventing of it. Now observe what Christ said. 1. He beheld them. This is taken notice of only by this evangelist, v. 17. He looked upon them with pity and compassion. He beheld them, to see if they would blush at their own folly. 2. He referred them to the scripture: "What is this then that is written? The stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner." The Lord Jesus will be exalted to the Father's right hand. Even those that stumble at him shall be broken—it will be their ruin; but as to those that not only reject him, but hate and persecute him, he will fall upon them and crush them to pieces—will grind them to powder.

Lastly, We are told how the chief priests and scribes were exasperated by this parable (v. 19): They perceived that he had spoken this parable against them. They fall into a rage at him and sought to lay hands on him. And it was only because they feared the people, that they did not now fly in his face, and take him by the throat. They were just ready to make his words good: This is the heir, come let us kill him. Christ tells them that instead of kissing the Son of God they would kill him. They do, in effect, say this: "And so we will; have at him now." And, though they deprecate the punishment of the sin, in the next breath they are projecting the commission of it.

We have here Christ's evading a snare which his enemies laid for him, by proposing a question to him about tribute.

I. The mischief designed him. The plot was to deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor, v. 20. They could not themselves put him to death by course of law, nor otherwise than by a popular tumult. They hoped to gain their point, if they could but incense the governor against him. Thus Christ's word must be fulfilled that he should be delivered into the hands of the Gentiles.

II. The persons they employed. They were spies, who should feign themselves just men. It is no new thing for bad men to feign themselves just men. A spy must go in disguise. These spies must take on them to have a value for Christ's judgment, and therefore must desire his advice in a case of conscience.

III. The question they proposed. Their preface is very courtly: Master, we know that thou sayest and teachest rightly, v. 21. Thus they thought to flatter him into an incautious freedom and openness with them. They were much mistaken who thought thus to impose upon the humble Jesus. He accepts not the person of any, but it is as true that he knows the hearts of all, and knew theirs, though they spoke fair. It was certain that he taught the way of God truly; but he knew that they were unworthy to be taught by him, who came to take hold of his words, not to be taken hold of by them. Their case is very nice: "Is it lawful for us" (this is added here in Luke), "to give tribute to Caesar?" Their pride and covetousness made them loth to pay taxes, and then they would have it a question whether it was lawful or no. Now if Christ should say that it was lawful the people would take it ill. But if he should say that it was not lawful as they expected he would, then they should have something to accuse him of to the governor.

IV. His evading the snare which they laid for him: He perceived their craftiness, v. 23. He did not give them a direct answer, but reproved them for offering to impose upon him—Why tempt ye me? Show me a penny; he asked them whose money it was, whose stamp it bore, who coined it. They owned, "It is Caesar's money." "Why then," saith Christ, "you should first have asked whether it was lawful to pay and receive Caesar's money among yourselves, and to admit that to be the instrument of your commerce. You must therefore render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's. But in sacred things God only is your King. You must render to God the things that are God's."

V. The confusion they were hereby put into, v. 26. The snare is broken: They could not take hold of his words before the people. They marvelled at his answer, it was so discreet and unexceptionable. Their mouths are stopped; they held their peace. They durst ask him nothing else, lest he should shame and expose them.

Verses 27–38

I. In every age there have been men of corrupt minds, that have endeavoured to subvert the fundamental principles of revealed religion. The Sadducees deny that there is any resurrection, any future state, no world of spirits, no state of recompense and retribution for what was done in the body. Take away this, and all religion falls to the ground.

II. It is common for those that design to undermine any truth of God to perplex it. So these Sadducees did when they would weaken people's faith in the doctrine of the resurrection. The case perhaps was matter of fact of a woman that had seven husbands. Now in the resurrection whose wife shall she be?

III. There is a great deal of difference between the state of the children of men on earth and that of the children of God in heaven.

1. The children of men in this world marry, and are given in marriage. Much of our business in this world is to raise and build up families, and to provide for them. Much of our pleasure in this world is in our relations, our wives and children; nature inclines to it. Marriage is instituted for the comfort of human life.

2. The world to come is quite another thing; it is called that world, by way of emphasis and eminency.

(1) Who shall be the inhabitants of that world: They that shall be accounted worthy to obtain it. They have not a legal worthiness, but an evangelical worthiness. It is a worthiness imputed by which we are glorified, as well as a righteousness imputed by which we are justified. They are by grace made and counted worthy to obtain that world; it intimates some difficulty in reaching after it, and danger of coming short. We must so run as that we may obtain. They shall obtain the resurrection from the dead, that is, the blessed resurrection.

(2) What shall be the happy state of the inhabitants of that world we cannot express or conceive, 1. Cor. ii. 9. See what Christ here says of it. [1] They neither marry nor are given in marriage. Those that have entered into the joy of their Lord are entirely taken up with that. Into that new Jerusalem there enters nothing that defiles. [2] They cannot die any more; and this comes in as a reason why they do not marry. Where there are no burials, there is no need of weddings. This crowns the comfort of that world that there is no more death there. Here death reigns, but thence it is for ever excluded. [3] They are equal unto the angels. In the other evangelists it was said, They are as the angels, but here they are said to be equal to the angels—angels' peers; they have a glory and bliss no way inferior to that of the holy angels. Saints, when they come to heaven, shall be naturalised. They have in all respects equal privileges with them that were free-born, the angels that are the natives and aborigines of that country. [4] They are the children of God, and so they are as the angels. We have the nature and disposition of sons, but that will not be perfected till we come to heaven. [5] They are the children of the resurrection, that is, they are made capable of the employments and enjoyments of the future state. They are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.

IV. It is an undoubted truth that there is another life after this (v. 37, 38): Moses showed this, as it was shown to Moses at the bush, when he calleth the Lord, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were then dead as to our world; they had departed out of it many years before; how then could God say, not I was, but I am the God of Abraham? We must therefore conclude that they were then in being in another world; for God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Luke here adds, For all live unto him, that is, all who, like them, are true believers; though they are dead, yet they do live. But there is more in it yet; when God called himself the God of these patriarchs, he meant that he was their felicity and portion, their exceeding great reward, Gen. xv. 1. Therefore there must be another life after this, in which he will do that for them that will amount to a discharge in full of that promise.

The scribes were students in the law, and expositors of it to the people, men in reputation for wisdom and honour, but the generality of them were enemies to Christ and his gospel.

I. We have them here commending the reply which Christ made to the Sadducees: Certain of the scribes said, Master, thou hast well said, v. 39. Even the scribes commended his performance, and owned that he said well. Many that call themselves Christians come short even of this spirit.

II. We have them here struck with an awe of Christ, and of his wisdom and authority (v. 40): They durst not ask him any questions at all. His own disciples, being willing to receive his doctrine, durst ask him any question; but the Sadducees durst ask him none.

III. We have them here puzzled and run aground with a question concerning the Messiah, v. 41. It was plain by many scriptures that Christ was to be the Son of David; even the blind man knew this (ch. xviii. 39); and yet it was plain that David called the Messiah his Lord (v. 42, 44): The Lord said to my Lord, Ps. cx. 1. Now if he be his Son, why doth he call him his Lord? If he be his Lord, why do we call him his Son? They could not reconcile this seeming contradiction; thanks be to God, we can; that Christ, as God, was David's Lord, but Christ, as man, was David's Son.

IV. We have them here described in their black characters, v. 45–47. Christ bids his disciples beware of the scribes, that is,

1. "Take heed of being drawn into sin by them; beware of such a spirit as they are governed by."

2. "Take heed of being brought into trouble by them," in the same sense that he had said (Matt. x.

17), "Beware of men, for they will deliver you up to the councils; beware of the scribes, for they will do so. Beware of them, they are proud and haughty. They desire to walk about the streets in long robes, as those that are above business, and as those that take state, and take place." They loved in their hearts to have people make their obeisance to them in the markets. They loved the highest seats in the synagogues and the chief rooms at feasts, and looked upon themselves with great conceit and upon all about them with great contempt. "They are covetous and oppressive, and make their religion a cloak and cover for crime. They devour widows' houses. For a show they make long prayers."

Christ reads them their doom in a few words: These shall receive a more abundant judgment, a double damnation. Dissembled piety is double iniquity.

CHAP. XXI

I. The notice Christ took of a poor widow that cast two mites into the treasury, ver. 1–4. II. A prediction of future events, ver. 5–7. 1. Of what should happen between that and the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 8–19. 2. Of that destruction itself, ver. 20–24 3. Of the second coming of Jesus Christ to judge the world, ver. 25–33. III. A practical application of this (ver 34–36), and an account of Christ's preaching and the people's attendance on it, ver. 37, 38.

Verses 1–4

This short passage of story we had before in Mark. It is thus recorded twice, to teach us, 1. That charity to the poor is a main matter in religion. Our Lord Jesus took all occasions to commend it and recommend it. 2. That Jesus Christ has his eye upon us, to observe what we give to the poor. Christ, though intent upon his preaching, looked up, to see what gifts were cast into the treasury, v. 1. He observes whether we give largely and liberally, in proportion to what we have, or whether we be sneaking and paltry in it. He observes whether we give charitably and with a willing mind, or grudgingly and with reluctance. And this should encourage us to be abundant in it. He sees in secret, and will reward openly. 3. That Christ observes and accepts the charity of the poor in a particular manner. Those that have nothing to give may yet do a great deal in charity by ministering to the poor, and helping them. But here was one that was herself poor and yet gave what little she had to the treasury. It was but two mites, which make a farthing; but Christ magnified it as a piece of charity exceeding all the rest: She has cast in more than they all. Christ does not blame her for indiscretion; but commended her liberality, which proceeded from a belief of and dependence upon God's providence to take care of her. 4. That, whatever may be called the offerings of God, we ought to have a respect for, and to our power, yea, and beyond our power, to contribute cheerfully to.

Verses 5–19

See here, I. With what admiration some spoke of the external pomp and magnificence of the temple. They took notice of it to him how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts, v. 5. They thought their Master should be as much affected with those things as they were. When we speak of the temple, it should be of the presence of God in it.

II. Christ spoke of their being all made desolate very shortly (v. 6): "As for those things which you behold, the days will come in which there shall not be left one stone upon another. This building shall yet be utterly ruined."

III. With what curiosity those about him enquire concerning the time when this great desolation should be: Master, when shall these things be? v. 7. It is natural to us to covet to know future things, when we are more concerned to ask what is our duty in the prospect of these things, and how we may prepare for them. They enquire what sign there shall be when these things shall come to pass. They ask not for a present sign, to confirm the prediction itself, but what the future signs will be of the approaching accomplishment of the prediction.

IV. With what clearness and fulness Christ answers their enquiries.

1. They must expect to hear of false Christs and false prophets appearing (v. 8): Many shall come in my name, usurping the title and character of the Messiah. They shall say, I am he. To encourage people to follow them, they added, "The time draws near when the kingdom shall be restored to Israel." When they asked solicitously and eagerly, Master, when shall these things be? the first word Christ said was, Take heed that you be not deceived. Those that are most inquisitive in the things of God (though it is very good to be so) are in most danger of being imposed upon. "Go you not after them." If we are sure that Jesus is the Christ, and his doctrine is the gospel of God, we must be deaf to all intimations of another Christ and another gospel.

2. They must expect to hear of great commotions in the nations. There shall be bloody wars (v. 10): Nation shall rise against nation. There shall be earthquakes, in divers places. There shall be famines and pestilences. God has various ways of punishing a provoking people. Though spiritual judgments are more commonly inflicted in gospel times, yet God makes use of temporal judgments also. There shall be fearful sights and great signs from heaven. "Be not terrified. Others will be frightened at them, but be not you frightened, v. 2. As to the fearful sights, let them not be fearful to you. You fall into the hands of God. Trust therefore in him, and be not afraid. It is your interest to make the best of that which is, for all your fears cannot alter it: these things must first come to pass. There is worse behind. The end is not by and by, not suddenly. Be not terrified, for, if you begin so quickly to be discouraged, how will you bear up under what is yet before you?"

3. They must expect to be themselves for signs and wonders in Israel. "Before all these, they shall lay their hands on you. This must be considered not only as the suffering of the persecuted, but as the sin of the persecutors." The ruin of a people is always introduced by their sin.

(1) Christ tells them what hard things they should suffer for his name's sake. They should sit down and count the cost. The Christians, having themselves been originally Jews, might expect fair quarter with them; but Christ bids them not expect it: They shall deliver you up to the synagogues to be scourged there. They shall deliver you into prisons, that you may be brought before kings and rulers for my name's sake. "Your own relations will betray you (v. 16), your parents, brethren, and kinsfolks, and friends. You will be called to resist unto blood. Some of you shall they cause to be put to death. You shall be hated of all men for my name's sake." This is worse than death itself. They were hated of all men, that is, of all bad men, who could not bear the light of the gospel (because it discovered their evil deeds). The wicked world, which hated to be reformed, hated Christ, the great Redeemer, and all that were his, for his sake.

(2) He encourages them to bear up under their trials, and to go on in their work. God will bring glory both to himself and them out of their sufferings: "It shall turn to you for a testimony, v. 13. Your being set up thus for a mark, and publicly persecuted, will make you the more taken notice of. Your being brought before kings and rulers will give you an opportunity of preaching the gospel to them. Your suffering such severe things, and being so hated by the worst of men, will be a testimony that you are good. Your courage, and cheerfulness, and constancy under your sufferings will be a testimony for you, that you believe what you preach, that you are supported by a divine power. God will stand by you, and own you, and assist you, and you shall be well furnished with instructions, v. 14, 15. Settle it in your hearts, not to meditate before what you shall answer; do not depend upon your own wit and ingenuity, and do not distrust or despair of the immediate and extraordinary aids of the divine grace. I promise you the special assistance of divine grace: I will give you a mouth and wisdom." A mouth and wisdom together completely fit a man both for services and sufferings; wisdom to know what to say, and a mouth wherewith to say it. Those that plead Christ's cause may depend upon him to give them a mouth and wisdom to enable them to answer for themselves. They are enabled to say that both for him and themselves which all their adversaries are not able to gainsay or resist, Acts iv, v and vi. "You shall suffer no real damage by all the hardships they shall put upon you (v. 18): There shall not a hair of your head perish." Shall some of them lose their heads, and yet not lose a hair? Take it figuratively in the same sense that Christ saith, He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it. To this end he had said (Matt. x. 30), The hairs of your head are all numbered. We do not reckon that lost or perishing which is laid out for good purposes. If we drop the body itself for Christ's name's sake, it does not perish, but is well bestowed. "It shall be abundantly recompensed." Though we may be losers for Christ, we shall not, we cannot, be losers by him in the end. "It is therefore your duty and interest to maintain a holy sincerity and serenity of mind, which will keep you always easy (v. 19): In your patience possess ye your souls." It is our duty and interest at all times, especially in perilous times, to secure the possession of our own souls, that they be not distempered now, nor our possession of them disturbed and interrupted. "Possess your souls, be your own men. Keep under the tumults of passion, that neither grief nor fear may tyrannise over you." It is by patience, Christian patience, that we keep possession of our own souls. "Set patience upon the guard, and keep out all those impressions which would ruffle you and put you out of temper."

Verses 20–28

He here comes to show them what all those things would issue in at last, namely, the destruction of Jerusalem, which would be a little day of judgment, a type and figure of Christ's second coming.

I. He tells them that they should see Jerusalem besieged, compassed with armies (v. 20), and, when they saw this, they might conclude that its desolation was nigh.

II. He warns them, upon this signal given, to shift for their own safety (v. 21): "Then let them that are in Judæa flee to the mountains; let them that are in the midst of it depart out, and let not them that are in the countries and villages about enter into the city. Do you abandon a city and country which you see God has abandoned and given up to ruin."

III. He foretells the terrible havoc that should be made of the Jewish nation (v. 22): Those are the days of vengeance so often spoken of by the Old Testament prophets. All their predictions must now be fulfilled. All things that are written must be fulfilled at length. Reprieves are not pardons. The greatness of that destruction is set forth. It is wrath upon this people, the wrath of God. Of particular terror it would be to women with child, and poor mothers that are nurses. There should be general confusion all the nation over.

IV. He describes the issue of the struggles between the Jews and the Romans. Multitudes of them shall fall by the edge of the sword. The siege of Jerusalem was, in effect, a military execution. The rest shall be led away captive; not into one nation, but into all nations. Jerusalem itself was trodden down of the Gentiles. The Romans laid it quite waste.

V. He describes the great frights that people should generally be in. Many frightful sights shall be in the sun, moon, and stars, and here in this lower world, the sea and the waves roaring. The effect of this shall be universal confusion and consternation upon the earth, distress of nations with perplexity, v. 25. Men's hearts shall fail them for fear (v. 26), dying away for fear, still trembling for fear of worse, and looking after those things which are coming upon the world. The powers of heaven shall be shaken, and then the pillars of the earth cannot but tremble. As that day was all terror and destruction to the unbelieving Jews, so the great day will be to all unbelievers.

VI. He makes this to be a kind of appearing of the Son of man: Then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory, v. 27. The destruction of Jerusalem was in a particular manner an act of Christ's judgment, so that it might justly be looked upon as a coming of the Son of man, in power and great glory, but in the clouds. Now this was, 1. An evidence of the first coming of the Messiah. Those that would not have him to reign over them shall have him to triumph over them. 2. It was an earnest of his second coming.

VII. He encourages all the faithful disciples (v. 28) "When these things begin to come to pass, then do you look up, look heavenward, in faith, hope, and prayer, and lift up your heads for your redemption draws nigh." When Christ came he came to redeem the Christians that were persecuted and oppressed. When he comes to judge the world at the last day, he will redeem all that are his, from all their grievances. When they see that day approaching, they can lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption draws nigh.

VIII. Here is one word of prediction that looks further than the destruction of the Jewish nation, which is not easily understood; we have it in v. 24: Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. 1. Some understand it of what is past. The Gentiles shall keep possession of it, and it shall be purely Gentile, till a great part of the Gentile world shall have become Christian. 2. Others understand it of what is yet to come. Jerusalem shall be possessed by the Gentiles, till the time come when the kingdoms of this world shall become Christ's kingdoms, and then all the Jews shall be converted.

Verses 29–38

I. Christ appoints his disciples to observe the signs of the times, which they might judge by, as they could judge of the approach of summer by the budding forth of the trees, v. 29–31. As in the kingdom of nature there is a chain of causes, so in the kingdom of providence there is a consequence of one event upon another. When we see the ruin of persecuting powers hastening on, we may thence infer that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand.

II. He charges them to look upon those things as sure and very near. The destruction of the Jewish nation, 1. Was near (v. 32): This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled. There were some now alive that should see it. 2. It was sure; the decree was gone forth (v. 33): "Heaven and earth shall pass away sooner than any word of mine: but my words shall not."

III. He cautions them against security and sensuality (v. 34, 35): Take heed to yourselves. This is the word of command given to all Christ's disciples. We cannot be safe if we be secure. It concerns us at all times, but especially at some times, to be very cautious. 1. What our danger is: that the day of death and judgment should come upon us unawares, when we do not expect it, and are not prepared for it, lest it come upon us as a snare. 2. What our duty is: we must take heed lest our hearts be overcharged. Two things we must watch against, lest our hearts be overcharged with them: (1) The indulging of the appetites of the body: Take heed lest you be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, the immodcrate use of meat and drink. They stupefy the conscience, and cause the mind to be unaffected with those things that are most affecting. (2) The inordinate pursuit of the good things of this world. The heart is overcharged with the cares of this life. This is the snare of the men of business, that will be rich.

IV. He counsels them to prepare and get ready for this great day, v. 36. Here see, 1. What should be our aim: that we may be accounted worthy to escape all these things. Yet we must aim not only to escape that, but to stand before the Son of man; not only to stand acquitted before him as our Judge, but to stand before him, to attend on him as our Master, and serve him day and night, always to behold his face. The saints are here said to be accounted worthy, as before, ch. xx. 35. God, by the goodwill of his grace towards them, accounts them worthy of it. A great part of our worthiness lies in an acknowledgment of our own unworthiness. 2. What should be our actings in these aims: Watch therefore, and pray always. Watching and praying must go together. Those that would make sure of the joys to come, must watch and pray. (1) To keep a guard upon themselves. "Watch against sin, watch to every duty. Be awake, and keep awake." (2) To keep up their communion with God: "Pray always." Those shall be accounted worthy to live a life of praise in the other world that live a life of prayer in this world.

V. In the last two verses we have an account how Christ disposed of himself during those three or four days between his riding in triumph into Jerusalem and the night in which he was betrayed. 1. He was all day teaching in the temple. He was an indefatigable preacher; he preached in the face of opposition, and in the midst of those that he knew sought occasion against him. 2. At night he went out to lodge at a friend's house, in the mount of Olives. 3. Early in the morning he was in the temple again, and the people were forward to hear one that they saw forward to preach (v. 38): They all came early in the morning to hear him. Sometimes the taste and relish which serious, honest, plain people have of good preaching are more to be valued and judged by than the opinion of the witty and learned.

CHAP. XXII

All the evangelists give us a particular account of the death and resurrection of Christ, this evangelist as fully as any, and with many circumstances and passages added which we had not before. I. The plot to take Jesus, and Judas's coming into it, ver. 1–6. II. Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, ver. 7–18. III. The instituting of the Lord's supper, ver. 19, 20. IV. Christ's discourse with his disciples after supper, ver. 21–38. V. His agony in the garden, ver. 39–46. VI. The apprehending of him, ver. 47–53. VII. Peter's denying him, ver. 54–62. VIII. The indignities done to Christ, and his trial and condemnation in the ecclesiastical court, ver. 63–71.

Verses 1–6

Christ is here delivered up, when the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, v. 1. Here we have,

I. His sworn enemies contriving it (v. 2), the chief priests, and the scribes, seeking how they might kill him. Could they have had their will, it had been soon done, but they feared the people.

II. A treacherous disciple joining in with them, Judas surnamed Iscariot. He is here said to be of the number of the twelve. One would wonder that one of that number, who could not but know Christ, should be so base as to betray him. How he who knew Christ so well yet came to betray him we are here told: Satan entered into Judas, v. 3. It was the devil's work. Whoever betrays Christ, or his truths or ways, it is Satan that puts them upon it. Judas knew how desirous the chief priests were to get Christ into their hands. He therefore went himself, and made the motion to them, v. 4. When you see Judas communing with the chief priests, be sure some mischief is hatching.

III. The issue of the treaty between them. 1. Judas must betray Christ to them, and this they would be glad of. 2. They must give him a sum of money for doing it, and this he would be glad of (v. 5): They covenanted to give him money. Judas sought opportunity to betray him. He gained the advantage he sought, and fixed the time and place where it might be done, in the absence of the multitude, and without tumult.

I. The preparation that was made for Christ's eating the passover with his disciples, upon the very day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed according to the law, v. 7. He sent Peter and John to prepare the passover. He directed those whom he employed whither they should go (v. 9, 10): they must follow a man bearing a pitcher of water, and he must be their guide to the house. He directed them thus, to teach them to depend upon the conduct of Providence, and to follow that, step by step. Being come to the house, they must desire the master of the house to show them a room (v. 11), and he will readily do it, v. 12. The disciples found their guide, and the house, and the room, just as he had said to them (v. 13). They got everything in readiness for the passover, v. 11.

II. The solemnizing of the passover. When the hour was come he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him, Judas not excepted. Though Judas has already been guilty of an overt act of treason, yet, it not being publicly known, Christ admits him to sit down with the rest at the passover. Now observe.

1. How Christ bids this passover welcome (v. 15): "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer." He knew it was to be the prologue to his sufferings, and therefore he desired it, because it was in order to his Father's glory and man's redemption. Shall we be backward to any service for him who was so forward in the work of our salvation? See the love he had to his disciples; he desired to eat it with them, that he and they might have a little time together for private conversation. He was now about to leave them, but was very desirous to eat this passover with them before he suffered, as if the comfort of that would carry him the more cheerfully through his sufferings.

2. How Christ in it takes his leave of all passovers (v. 16): "I will not any more eat thereof until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God." (1) It was fulfilled when Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us. (2) It was fulfilled in the Lord's supper, an ordinance of the gospel kingdom, in which the passover had its accomplishment. They ate of it, and Christ might be said to eat with them, because of the spiritual communion they had with him in that ordinance.

(3) The complete accomplishment of that commemoration of liberty will be in the kingdom of glory. What he had said of his eating of the paschal lamb, he repeats concerning his drinking of the passover wine, the cup of blessing, or of thanksgiving. This cup he took, according to the custom, and gave thanks and then said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves, v. 17. This is not said afterwards of the sacramental cup, which, being the New Testament in his blood, he might give into everyone's hand, to teach them to make a particular application of it to their own souls; but, as for the paschal cup, it is enough to say, "Take it, and divide it among yourselves, v. 18. I will not drink of the fruit of the vine any more, till the kingdom of God shall come." Christ dying next day was its fulfilment.

III. The institution of the Lord's supper, v. 19, 20. The passover and the deliverance out of Egypt were typical and prophetic signs of a Christ to come, who should by dying deliver us from sin and death, and the tyranny of Satan. Therefore the Lord's supper is instituted to be a commemorative sign or memorial of a Christ already come, that has by dying delivered us.

1. The breaking of Christ's body as a sacrifice for us is here commemorated by the breaking of bread: This is my body which is given for you. This bread that was given for us is given to us to be food for our souls, this bread that was broken and given for us, to satisfy for the guilt of our sins, is broken and given to us, to satisfy the desire of our souls. And this we do in remembrance of what he did for us, when he died for us, and for a memorial of what we do, in making ourselves partakers of him, and joining ourselves to him in an everlasting covenant.

2. The shedding of Christ's blood, by which the atonement was made, as represented by the wine in the cup. It commemorates the purchase of the covenant by the blood of Christ, and confirms the promises of the covenant. In all our commemorations of the shedding of Christ's blood, we must have an eye to it as shed for us; who loved me, and gave himself for me.

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples after supper, much of which is new here; and in St. John's gospel we shall find other additions.

I. He discoursed with them concerning him that should betray him. 1. He signifies to them that the traitor was now among them, and one of them, v. 21. By placing this after the institution of the Lord's supper, though in Matthew and Mark it is placed before it, it seems plain that Judas did receive the Lord's supper, did eat of that bread and drink of that cup; for, after the solemnity was over, Christ said, Behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table. 2. He foretells that the treason would take effect (v. 22): Truly the Son of man goes as it was determined; for he is delivered up by the counsel and foreknowledge of God. Christ was not driven to his sufferings, but cheerfully went to them. 3. He threatens the traitor: Woe to that man by whom he is betrayed. Though God has determined that Christ shall be betrayed, and he himself has cheerfully submitted to it, yet Judas's sin or punishment is not at all the less. 4. He frightens the rest of the disciples into a suspicion of themselves, by saying that it was one of them (v. 23): They began to enquire among themselves who it was that should do this thing.

II. Concerning the strife that was among them for precedency or supremacy.

1. See what the dispute was: Which of them should be accounted the greatest. How inconsistent is this with that in the verse before! There they were enquiring which would be the traitor, and here which should be the prince. What a self-contradiction is the deceitful heart of man!

2. See what Christ said to this dispute. He was not sharp upon them but mildly showed them the sin and folly of it.

(1) This was to make themselves like the kings of the Gentiles, v. 25. They exercise lordship over their subjects. The exercising of lordship better becomes the kings of the Gentiles than the ministers of Christ. They that exercise authority, they are called Benefactors, they call themselves so, and so their flatterers call them. However they may really serve themselves, they would be thought to serve their country. One of the Ptolemies was surnamed The Benefactor. Now our Saviour, by taking notice of this, intimates, [1] That to do good is much more honourable than to look great. By their own confession, a benefactor to his country is much more valued than a ruler of his country. [2] That to do good is the surest way to be great. He would have his disciples believe, that their greatest honour would be to do all the good they could in the world. If they have that which is confessedly the greater honour, of being benefactors, let them despise the less, of being rulers.

(2) It was to make themselves unlike Christ himself: "You shall not be so," v. 26, 27. "It was never intended that you should rule any otherwise than by the power of truth and grace, but that you should serve." Here is the rule Christ gave to his disciples: He that is greater among you, that is senior, let him be as the younger. Their age and honour, instead of warranting them to take their ease, bind them to double work. And he that is chief, let him be as he that serves. Here is the example which he himself gave to this rule: Whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat or he that serveth? He was ready to do any office of kindness and service for them; witness his washing their feet.

(3) They ought not to strive for worldly honour and grandeur, because he had better honours in reserve for them, a kingdom, a feast, a throne, wherein they should all share alike, v. 28–30.

[1] Christ's commendation of his disciples for their faithfulness to him. It is spoken with an air of encomium and applause: "You are they who have continued with me in my temptations, you are they who have stood by me and stuck to me." His disciples continued with him, and were afflicted in all his afflictions. It was but little help that they could give him; nevertheless, he took it kindly that they continued with him, and he here owns their kindness. Christ's disciples had been very defective in their duty. We find them guilty of many mistakes and weaknesses: yet their Master passes all by and forgets it. You are they who have continued with me. Thus does he praise at parting, to show how willing he is to make the best of those whose hearts he knows to be upright with him.

[2] The recompence he designed them for their fidelity: I appoint unto you a kingdom. Understand it, First, Of what should be done for them in this world. God gave his Son a kingdom among men, the gospel church. This kingdom he appointed to his apostles and their successors in the ministry of the gospel. This is the honour reserved for you. Or, Secondly, Of what should be done for them in the other world. God will give them the kingdom. They shall eat and drink at Christ's table in his kingdom, of which he had spoken, v. 16, 18. They shall partake of those joys and pleasures which were the recompence of his services and sufferings. The highest dignities: "You shall sit down with me on my throne," Rev. iii. 21.

III. Concerning Peter's denying him.

1. The general notice Christ gives to Peter of the devil's design upon him and the rest of the apostles (v. 31): The Lord said, Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat. Peter, who used to be the mouth of the rest in speaking to Christ, is here made the ear of the rest; and what is designed for warning to them all (all you shall be offended, because of me) is directed to Peter, being in a particular manner struck at by the tempter: Satan has desired to have you. "Give me leave to try them," saith Satan, "and Peter particularly." He desired to have them, that he might sift them, that he might show them to be chaff, and not wheat. Satan could not sift them unless God gave him leave: He desired to have them, "He has challenged you to prove you a company of hypocrites, and Peter especially, the forwardest of you."

2. The particular encouragement he gave to Peter: "I have prayed for thee: thou wilt be most violently assaulted, but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." Though there may be many failings in the faith of true believers, yet there shall not be a total and final failure of their faith. It is owing to the mediation and intercession of Jesus Christ that the faith of his disciples, though sometimes sadly shaken, yet is not sunk. They are kept by the power of God and the prayer of Christ.

3. The charge he gives to Peter to help others: "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren; when thou hast found thy faith kept from failing, labour to confirm the faith of others; when thou hast found mercy with God thyself, encourage others to hope that they also shall find mercy." Those that have fallen into sin must be converted from it. Those that through grace are converted from sin must do what they can to strengthen their brethren that stand, and to prevent their falling; see Ps. li. 11–13.

4. Peter's declared resolution to cleave to Christ, whatever it cost him (v. 33): Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison and to death. This was a great word, and yet I believe no more than he meant at this time, and thought he should make good too. All the true disciples of Christ sincerely desire and design to follow him, withersoever he goes.

5. Christ's express prediction of his denying him thrice (v. 34): "I tell thee, Peter, the cock shall not crow this day before thou even deny that thou knowest me." Christ knows us better than we know ourselves. It is well for us that Christ knows where we are weak better than we do, and therefore where to come in with grace sufficient.

IV. Concerning the condition of all the disciples.

1. He appeals to them concerning what had been, v. 35. He had owned that they had been faithful servants to him, v. 28. When I sent you without purse, lacked you anything? He owns that he had sent them out in a very poor and bare condition. If God thus send us out into the world, let us remember that better than us have thus begun low. Notwithstanding this, they had lacked nothing; and they readily acknowledged it: "Nothing, Lord." It is good for us often to review the providences of God, and to observe how we have got through the straits and difficulties we have met with. Christ is a good Master, and his service a good service; for though his servants may sometimes be brought low, yet he will help them. We must reckon ourselves well done by if we have had the necessary supports of life, though we have lived from hand to mouth. They had wanted nothing.

2. He gives them notice of a very great change of their circumstances now approaching. He that was their Master was now entering upon his sufferings, which he had often foretold (v. 37): "Now that which is written must be fulfilled in me. He was numbered among the transgressors. This is yet to be accomplished, and then the things concerning me will have an end; then I shall say, It is finished." It may be the comfort of suffering Christians, as it was of a suffering Christ, that their sufferings were foretold. They will have an end, and will end well, everlastingly well. They must now in some degree suffer with their Master; and, when he is gone, they must expect to suffer like him. They must not now expect that their friends would be so kind and generous to them as they had been; and therefore, He that has a purse, let him take it. They must now expect that their enemies would be more fierce upon them than they had been, and they would need magazines as well as stores: He that has no sword will find a great want of it, and will be ready to wish that he had sold his garment and bought one. But the sword of the Spirit is the sword which the disciples of Christ must furnish themselves with. Christ having suffered for us, we must arm ourselves with the same mind, with a holy resignation to the will of God, and then we are better prepared than if we had sold a coat to buy a sword. The disciples hereupon enquire what strength they had, and find they had among them two swords (v. 38), of which one was Peter's. But he intimates how little he would have them depend upon this when he saith, It is enough. Two swords are sufficient for those who need more, having God himself to be the shield of their help and the sword of their excellency.

We have here the awful story of Christ's agony in the garden. In it Christ entered the lists with the powers of darkness, and yet conquered them.

I. What we have in this passage which we had before is, 1. That when Christ went out, his disciples (eleven of them, for Judas had given them the slip) followed him. Having continued with him hitherto in his temptations, they would not leave him now. 2. That he went to the place where he was wont to be private, which intimates that Christ was often alone, to teach us to be so. 3. That he exhorted his disciples to pray that, though the approaching trial could not be avoided, yet they might not in it enter into temptation to sin. 4. That he withdrew from them, and prayed himself. He withdrew about a stone's cast, and there he kneeled down (so it is here); but the other evangelists say that afterwards he fell on his face, and there prayed that, if it were the will of God, this cup of suffering might be removed from him. 5. That he, knowing it to be his Father's will that he should suffer and die, withdrew that petition, resigned himself to his heavenly Father's will: "Nevertheless not my will be done, not the will of my human nature, but the will of God, let that be done." 6. That his disciples were asleep when he was at prayer, and when they should have been themselves praying, v. 45. When he rose from prayer, he found them sleeping. See what a favourable construction is here put upon it, which we had not in the other evangelists—they were sleeping for sorrow. This teaches us to make the best of our brethren's infirmities, and, if there be one cause better than another, charitably impute them to that. 7. That when he awoke them, then he exhorted them to pray (v. 46): "Why sleep ye? Rise and pray." When we find ourselves entering into temptation, it concerns us to rise and pray, Lord, help me in this time of need.

II. There are three things in this passage which we had not in the other evangelists:

1. That when Christ was in his agony, there appeared to him an angel from heaven, strengthening him, v. 43. When he was not delivered from his sufferings, yet he was strengthened and supported under them, and that was equivalent. If God proportion the shoulders to the burden, we shall have no reason to complain, whatever he is pleased to lay upon us. The angels ministered to the Lord Jesus in his sufferings. He could have had legions of them to rescue him; but he made use of his ministration only to strengthen him.

2. That, being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly, v. 44. As his sorrow and trouble grew upon him, he grew more importunate in prayer. Prayer, though never out of season, is in a special manner seasonable when we are in an agony; and the stronger our agonies are the more lively and frequent our prayers should be.

3. That, in this agony, his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground. There is some dispute among the critics whether this sweat is only compared to drops of blood, or whether real blood mingled with it, so that it was in colour like blood, and might truly be called a bloody sweat; the matter is not great. Every pore was as it were a bleeding wound, and his blood stained all his raiment. This showed the travail of his soul.

I. The marking of him by Judas. Here a numerous party appears, and Judas at the head of them, for he was guide to them that took Jesus; they knew not where to find him, but he brought them to the place: when they were there, they knew not which was he, but Judas told them that whomsoever he should kiss, that same was he; so he drew near to him to kiss him. Luke takes notice of the question Christ asked him, which we have not in the other evangelists: Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? v. 48. Must one of his own disciples betray him? Must he be betrayed with a kiss? Was ever a love-token so desecrated and abused?

II. The effort which his disciples made for his protection (v. 49): When they saw what would follow, they said, "Lord, shall we smite with the sword? Thou didst allow us to have two swords, shall we now make use of them?" But they were in too much haste and too much heat to stay for an answer. Peter, aiming at the head of one of the servants of the high priest, missed his blow, and cut off his right ear. The other evangelists tell us what was the check Christ gave to Peter for it. Luke here tells us, 1. How Christ excused the blow: Suffer ye thus far, v. 51. He said this to his enemies who came to take him, to pacify them, that they might not be provoked by it to fall upon the disciples. He speaks them fair, and, as it were, begs their pardon for an assault made upon them by one of his followers, to teach us to give good words even to our enemies. 2. How he cured the wound: He touched his ear, and healed him; fastened his ear on again. Christ hereby gave them a proof, (1) Of his power. He that could heal could destroy if he pleased. (2) Of his mercy and goodness. Christ here gave an illustrious example to his own rule of doing good to them that hate us, as afterwards he did of praying for them that despitefully use us. Those who render good for evil do as Christ did.

III. Christ's expostulation with the officers to show what an absurd thing it was for them to make all this rout and noise, v. 52, 53. Luke tells us that it was said to the chief priests and captains of the temple, so that they were all ecclesiastics, retainers to the temple, who were employed in this odious piece of service.

1. How Christ reasons with them concerning their proceedings. What occasion was there for them to come out in the dead of the night, and with swords and staves? They knew that he was one that would not resist. Why then are ye come out as against a thief? They knew he was one that would not abscond, for he was daily with them in the temple, in the midst of them.

2. How he reconciles himself to their proceedings; and this we had not before: "But this is your hour, and the power of darkness. How hard soever it may seem that I should be thus exposed, I submit, for so it is determined. Now the power of darkness, Satan, the ruler of the darkness of this world, is permitted to do his worst. Let him do his worst." It is the power of darkness that rides master, and darkness must give way to light, and the power of darkness be made to truckle to the prince of light.

We have here the melancholy story of Peter's denying his Master. Notice is not taken here, as was in the other evangelists of Christ's being now upon his examination before the high priest, only of his being brought into the high priest's house, v. 54. But the manner of expression is observable. They took him, and led him, and brought him, which methinks intimates that they were in confusion. Struck with inward terror upon what they had seen and heard, they took him the furthest way about, such a hurry were they in in their own bosoms.

I. Peter's falling. It began in sneaking. He followed Christ; this was well. But he followed afar off. He thought to trim the matter, to follow Christ, and so to satisfy his conscience, but to follow afar off, and so to save his reputation, and sleep in a whole skin. It proceeded in associating himself with the high priest's servants. The servants kindled a fire in the midst of the hall and sat down together. Peter sat down among them, as if he had been one of them. His fall itself was disclaiming all acquaintance with Christ, because he was now in distress and danger. He was charged by a sorry simple maid with being retainer to this Jesus. She looked wistfully upon him as he sat by the fire; and this man was with him, saith she. And Peter, as he had not the courage to own the charge, so he had not the wit and presence of mind to turn it off, and therefore flatly and plainly denies it: Woman, I know him not. His fall was repeated a second time (v. 58): After a little while another saw him, and said, "Even thou art one of them." Not I, saith Peter; Man, I am not. And a third time, about the space of an hour after another confidently affirms, strenuously asserts it. "Of a truth this fellow also was with him, let him deny it if he can, for you may all perceive he is a Galilean." Peter now not only denies that he is a disciple of Christ, but that he knows anything of him (v. 60): "Man, I know not what thou sayest."

II. Peter's getting up again. See how happily he recovered himself.

1. The cock crew, and this startled him and put him upon thinking. Small accidents may involve great consequences.

2. The Lord turned and looked upon him. This circumstance we had not in the other evangelists, but it is a very remarkable one. Though Christ had now his back upon Peter, and was upon his trial, yet he knew all that Peter said. Christ takes more notice of what we say and do than we think he does. When Peter disowned Christ, yet Christ did not disown him. It is well for us that Christ does not deal with us as we deal with him. Christ looked upon Peter, for he knew that, though he had denied him with his lips, yet his eye would still be towards him. He only gave him a look, which none but Peter would understand the meaning of. (1) It was a convincing look. Peter said that he did not know Christ. Christ turned, and looked upon him, as if should say, "Dost thou not know me, Peter?" (2) It was a chiding look. (3) It was an expostulating upbraiding look: "What Peter, art thou he that disownest me now? Thou that wast the most forward to confess me to be the Son of God, and didst solemnly promise thou wouldest never disown me?" (4) It was a compassionate look; he looked upon him with tenderness. "Poor Peter! How art thou fallen and undone if I do not help thee!" (5) It was a directing look. Christ guided him with his eye to retire, and bethink himself a little. (6) It was a significant look: it signified the conveying of grace to Peter's heart. The crowing of the cock would not have brought him to repentance without this look. Power went along with this look to change the heart of Peter.

3. Peter remembered the words of the Lord.

4. Then Peter went out, and wept bitterly. One look from Christ melted him into tears of godly sorrow for sin.

Verses 63–71

I. How our Lord Jesus was abused by the servants of the high priest. They that held Jesus mocked him, and smote him (v. 63). They made sport with him: this sorrowful night to him shall be a merry night to them. They hood-winked him and then, they struck him on the face, and continued to do so till he named the person that smote him (v. 64), intending hereby an affront to his prophetical office. Many other things blasphemously spoke they against him, v. 65.

II. How he was accused and condemned by the great sanhedrim, consisting of the elders of the people, the chief priests, and the scribes, who were all up betimes, and got together as soon as it was day, to prosecute this matter. They would not have been up so early for any good work.

1. They ask him, Art thou the Christ? They could not prove it upon him that he had ever said so in so many words, and therefore urged him to own it to them, v. 67. If they had asked him this question with a willingness to admit that he was the Christ, it had been well; but they asked it with a resolution not to believe him, but a design to ensnare him.

2. He justly complained of their unfair and unjust usage of him, v. 67, 68. "But," saith he, "If I tell you that I am the Christ, you will not believe. Why should the cause be brought on before you who have already prejudged it? If I ask you what you have to object against the proofs I produce, you will not answer me. You will neither answer me nor let me go; if I be not the Christ, you ought to answer the arguments with which I prove that I am; if I be, you ought to let me go; but you will do neither."

3. He referred them to his second coming, for the full proof of his being the Christ (v. 69): "Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God, and then you will not need to ask whether he be the Christ or no."

4. Hence they inferred that he set up himself as the Son of God, and asked him whether he were so or no (v. 70): Art thou then the Son of God? He called himself the Son of man, referring to Daniel's vision of the Son of man, Dan. vii. 13, 14. But they understood so much as to know that if he was that Son of man, he was also the Son of God.

5. He owns himself to be the Son of God: Ye say that I am; that is, "I am, as ye say."

6. Upon this they ground his condemnation (v. 71): What need we any further witness? It was true, they needed not any further witness to prove that he said he was the Son of God, they had it from his own mouth. They cannot think it possible that he should be the Messiah, if he appear not, as they expect, in worldly pomp and grandeur.

CHAP. XXIII

This chapter carries on and concludes the history of Christ's sufferings and death. I. His arraignment before Pilate the Roman governor, ver. 1–5. II. His examination before Herod, ver. 6–12. III. Pilate's struggle with the people to release Jesus, but his yielding at length, and condemning him to be crucified, ver. 13–25. IV. An account of what passed as they led him to be crucified, and his discourse to the people that followed, ver. 26–31. V. An account of what passed at the place of execution, ver. 32–38. VI. The conversion of one of the thieves, as Christ was hanging on the cross, ver. 39–43. VII. The death of Christ, ver. 44–49. VIII. His burial, ver. 50–56.

Verses 1–12

Our Lord Jesus was condemned as a blasphemer in the spiritual court. When they had condemned him, they knew they could not put him to death, and therefore took another course.

I. They accused him before Pilate. The whole multitude of them arose, led him unto Pilate, and they demanded justice against him, not as a blasphemer (that was no crime that he took cognizance of), but as one disaffected to the Roman government, which they in their hearts did not look upon as any crime at all.

1. Here is the indictment drawn up against him (v. 2). They misrepresented him, (1) As making the people rebel against Caesar. It was true, and Pilate knew it, that there was a general uneasiness in the people under the Roman yoke. They would have Pilate believe that this Jesus was active to foment that general discontent: We have found him perverting the nation. Christ had particularly taught that they ought to give tribute to Caesar, and yet he is here falsely accused as forbidding to give tribute to Caesar. Innocency is no fence against calumny. (2) As making himself a rival with Caesar, though the very reason why they rejected him was because he did not offer to do anything against Caesar; yet this is what they charged him with, that he said, he himself is Christ a king.

2. His pleading to the indictment: Pilate asked him, Art thou the king of the Jews? v. 3. To which he answered, Thou sayest it; that is, "It is as thou sayest." Christ's kingdom is wholly spiritual, and will not interfere with Caesar's jurisdiction. All that knew him knew that he never pretended to be the king of the Jews, in opposition to Caesar as supreme.

3. Pilate's declaration of his innocency (v. 4): He said to the chief priests, and the people, "I find no fault in this man."

4. The continued fury and outrage of the prosecutors, v. 5. Instead of being moderated by Pilate's declaration of his innocency they were the more exasperated, more exceedingly fierce. We do not find that they have any particular fact to produce, but they resolve to carry it with noise and confidence: He stirs up the people, teaching throughout all Judæa, beginning from Galilee to this place. He did stir up the people, but it was to everything that was virtuous and praiseworthy. He did teach, but they could not charge him with teaching any doctrine that tended to disturb the public peace.

II. They accused him before Herod. 1. Pilate removed him and his cause to Herod's court. The accusers mentioned Galilee. "Why," said Pilate, "is he of that country? Is he a Galilean?" v. 6. "Yes," said they. "Let us send him to Herod then," said Pilate, "since he belongs to Herod's jurisdiction." Pilate was already sick of the cause, and desirous to rid his hands of it. 2. Herod was very willing to have the examining of him (v. 8): When he saw Jesus he was exceedingly glad. He had heard many things of him in Galilee, and he longed to see him, but purely out of curiosity; and it was only to gratify this that he hoped to have seen some miracle done by him. In order to this, he questioned with him in many things. But Jesus answered him nothing; nor would he gratify him so much as with the performance of one miracle. The poorest beggar, that asked a miracle for the relief of his necessity, was never denied; but this proud prince, is denied. He might have seen Christ and his wondrous works many a time in Galilee, and would not. Now he would see them, and shall not; because he knew not the day of his visitation. Miracles must not be made cheap, nor Omnipotence be at the beck of the greatest potentate. 3. His prosecutors appeared against him before Herod. They stood, and vehemently accused him (v. 10), impudently and boldly, so the word signifies. 4. Herod was very abusive to him: He, with his men of war, set him at nought. They made nothing of him; so the word is. They laughed at him as one that had lost his power, and was become weak as other men. Herod was more abusive to Christ than Pilate was. Herod arrayed Christ in a gorgeous robe, as a mock-king; and so he taught Pilate's soldiers afterwards to do him the same indignity. 5. Herod sent him back to Pilate, and it proved an occasion of the making of them friends. Herod would not condemn him as a malefactor, and therefore sent him again to Pilate (v. 11), and so returned Pilate's civility and respect; and this mutual obligation brought them to a better understanding one of another, v. 12. They had been at enmity between themselves. Observe how those that quarrelled with one another yet could unite against Christ. Christ is the great peacemaker; both Pilate and Herod owned his innocency, and their agreeing in this cured their disagreeing in other things.

We have here the blessed Jesus run down by the mob, and hurried to the cross in the storm of a popular noise and tumult.

I. Pilate solemnly protests that he believes he has done nothing worthy of death or of bonds. And, if he did believe so, he ought immediately to have discharged him. But, being himself a bad man, he had no kindness for Christ, and was afraid of displeasing the people; and therefore, for want of integrity, he called together the chief priests, and rulers, and people, and will hear what they have to say (v. 14): "You have brought," said he, "this man to me, and I have examined him before you, and have heard all you have to allege against him, and I can make nothing of it: I find no fault in him."

II. He appeals to Herod concerning him (v. 15): "I sent you to him, and he has sent him back; in his opinion, his crimes are not capital. He has laughed at him as a weak man, but has not stigmatized him as a dangerous man." He thought Bedlam a fitter place for him than Tyburn.

III. He proposes to release him, if they will but consent to it. He ought to have done it without asking leave of them. But the fear of man brings many into this snare, that, they will do an unjust thing rather than pull an old house about their ears. To please the people, 1. He will release him under the notion of a malefactor, because of necessity he must release one (v. 17). 2. He will chastise him, and release him. If no fault is to be found in him, why should he be chastised?

IV. The people choose rather to have Barabbas released. He was imprisoned for a sedition made in the city, and for murder, yet this was the criminal that was preferred before Christ: Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas, v. 18, 19.

V. When Pilate urged the second time that Christ should be released, they cried out, Crucify him, crucify him, v. 20, 21. Nothing less will serve but he must be crucified: Crucify him, crucify him.

VI. When Pilate the third time reasoned with them they were the more peremptory and outrageous (v. 22): "Why? What evil hath he done? Name his crime. I have found no cause of death, I will chastise him and let him go." But they were instant with loud voices, not requesting, but requiring, that he might be crucified; as if they had as much right to demand the crucifying of one that was innocent as the release of one that was guilty.

VII. Pilate's yielding, at length. The voice of the people and of the chief priests prevailed. He gave sentence that it should be as they required, v. 24. This is repeated, in v. 25, with the aggravating circumstance of the release of Barabbas: He released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, because him they had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will, and he could not deal more barbarously with him than to deliver him to their will.

Verses 26-31

It is strange with what expedition they went through his trial. He was brought before the chief priests at break of day (ch. xxii. 66), after that to Pilate, then to Herod, then to Pilate again; and there seems to have been a long struggle between Pilate and the people about him. He was scourged, and crowned with thorns, and contumeliously used, and all this was done in four or five hours' time, or six at most, for he was crucified between nine o'clock and twelve. Never anyone was so chased out of the world as Christ was. Now as they led him away to death we find,

I. One that was a bearer, that carried his cross, Simon by name, a Cyrenian. They laid Christ's cross upon him, that he might bear it after Jesus (v. 26), lest Jesus should faint under it. It was pity, but a cruel pity, that gave him this ease.

II. Many that were mourners. The common people, were moved with compassion towards him, because they had reason to think he suffered unjustly. This drew a great crowd after him, as is usual at executions. A great company of people followed him, especially of women (v. 27); they also bewailed and lamented him. Though there were many that reproached and reviled him, yet there were some that valued him, and pitied him. Many bewail Christ that do not believe in him, and lament him that do not love him above all. He found time and heart to take cognizance of their tears. Christ died lamented. He turned to them, and bade them not weep for him, but for themselves, v. 28.

1. He gives them a general direction concerning their lamentations: Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me. They must not weep for him only, but rather let them weep for themselves and for their children. When with an eye of faith we behold Christ crucified we ought to weep, not for him, but for ourselves. The death of Christ was a thing peculiar; it was his victory and triumph over his enemies; it was our deliverance, and the purchase of eternal life for us. And therefore let us weep, not for him, but for our own sins, and the sins of our children, that were the cause of his death.

2. He gives them a particular reason why they should weep for themselves and for their children: "For behold sad times are coming upon your city." He had lately wept over Jerusalem himself, and now he bids them weep over it. Christ's tears should set us weeping. Now the destruction of Jerusalem is here foretold by two proverbial sayings, which both bespeak it very terrible, that what people commonly dread they would then desire, to be written childless and to be buried alive. (1) They would wish to be written childless. They will envy those that have none, and say, Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare. (2) They would wish to be buried alive: They shall begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us, and to the hills, Cover us, v. 30. They shall wish to be hid in the darkest caves, that they may be out of the noise of these calamities. They will be willing to be sheltered upon any terms, though with the hazard of being crushed to pieces.

3. He shows how natural it was for them to infer this desolation from his sufferings. If they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry? v. 31. Christ was a green tree, fruitful and flourishing; now, if such things were done to him, we may thence infer what would have been done to the whole race of mankind if he had not interposed, and what shall be done to those that continue dry trees, notwithstanding all that is done to make them fruitful. The consideration of the bitter sufferings of our Lord Jesus should engage us to stand in awe of the justice of God. The best saints, compared with Christ, are dry trees; if he suffer, why may not they expect to suffer?

Verses 32–43

I. Divers passages which we had before in Matthew and Mark concerning Christ's sufferings. 1. That there were two others, malefactors, led with him to the place of execution. 2. That he was crucified at a place called Calvary—the place of a skull. He was crucified. This was a painful and shameful death above any other. 3. That he was crucified in the midst between two thieves. Thus he was not only treated as a transgressor, but numbered with them. 4. That the soldiers who were employed in the execution seized his garments as their fee, and divided them among themselves by lot: They parted his raiment and cast lots. 5. That he was reviled and reproached: The people stood beholding, and the rulers stood among the rabble, and derided him, and they said, He saved others, let him save himself. They challenged him to save himself from the cross, when he was saving others by the cross: If he be the Christ, the chosen of God, let him save himself. They mocked him (v. 36, 37); they made sport with him, and made a jest of his sufferings. And they said, If thou be the king of the Jews, save thyself. 6. That the superscription over his head, setting forth his crime, was, This is the King of the Jews, v. 38. He is put to death for pretending to be the king of the Jews; but God intended it to be a declaration of what he really was: he is the king of the Jews, and his cross is the way to his crown. This was written in those that were called the three learned languages, Greek, and Latin, and Hebrew. It was written in these three languages that it might be known and read of all men. In these three languages is Jesus Christ proclaimed king.

II. Here are two passages which we had not before, and they are very remarkable ones.

1. Christ's prayer for his enemies (v. 34): Father, forgive them. Seven remarkable words Christ spoke after he was nailed to the cross, and before he died, and this is the first. As soon as ever he was fastened to the cross, or while they were nailing him, he prayed this prayer, in which observe,

(1) The petition: Father, forgive them. The sin they were now guilty of might justly have been made unpardonable. No, these are particularly prayed for. Now he made intercession for transgressors. Now the sayings of Christ upon the cross as well as his sufferings had a further intention than they seemed to have. This was explicatory of the intent and meaning of his death: "Father, forgive them, not only these, but all that shall repent, and believe the gospel." The great thing which Christ died to purchase and procure for us is the forgiveness of sin. His blood speaks this: Father, forgive them. Though they were his persecutors and murderers, he prayed, Father, forgive them.

(2) The plea: For they know not what they do; for, if they had known, they would not have crucified him. The crucifiers of Christ know not what they do. There is a kind of ignorance that does in part excuse sin: ignorance through want of the means of knowledge or of a capacity to receive instruction. The crucifiers of Christ were kept in ignorance by their rulers, and had prejudices against him instilled into them, so that in what they did against Christ and his doctrine they thought they did God service. Such are to be pitied and prayed for. We must in prayer call God Father. The great thing we must beg of God, both for ourselves and others, is the forgiveness of sins. We must pray for our enemies, and those that hate and persecute us; and we must be earnest with God in prayer for the forgiveness of their sins, their sins against us. This is Christ's example to his own rule (Matt. v. 44, 45, Love your enemies). If Christ loved and prayed for such enemies, what enemies can we have that we are not obliged to love and pray for?

2. The conversion of the thief upon the cross. Christ was crucified between two thieves, and in them were represented the different effects which the cross of Christ would have upon the children of men. Now the cross of Christ is to some a savour of life unto life, to others of death unto death.

(1) Here was one of these malefactors that was hardened to the last. Near to the cross of Christ, he railed on him, as others did (v. 39): he said, If thou be the Christ save thyself and us. Though he was now in pain and agony, yet this did not humble his proud spirit, nor teach him to give good language, no, not to his fellow-sufferer. He challenges Christ to save both himself and them. There are some that have the impudence to rail at Christ, and yet the confidence to expect to be saved by him.

(2) Here was the other of them that was softened at the last. This malefactor was snatched as a brand out of the burning, and made a monument of divine mercy and grace. This gives no encouragement to any to put off their repentance, for, though it is certain that true repentance is never too late, it is as certain that late repentance is seldom true. He never had any offer of Christ, nor day or grace, before now: he was designed to be made a singular instance of the power of Christ's grace. Christ, having conquered Satan in the destruction of Judas and the preservation of Peter, erects this further trophy of his victory over him. We shall see the case to be extraordinary if we observe,

[1] The extraordinary operations of God's grace upon him, which appeared in what he said.

First, See what he said to the other malefactor, v. 40, 41. 1. He reproved him for railing at Christ, as destitute of the fear of God: Dost not thou fear God? This implies that it was the fear of God which restrained him from following the multitude to do this evil. "If thou hadst any humanity in thee, thou wouldest not insult over one that is thy fellow-sufferer; thou art in the same condition; thou art a dying man too." 2. He owns that he deserves what was done to him: We indeed justly. We received the due reward of our deeds. True penitents acknowledge the justice of God in all the punishments of their sin. God has done right, but we have done wickedly. 3. He believes Christ to have suffered wrongfully. This penitent thief is convinced, by his conduct in his sufferings, that he has done nothing amiss. The chief priests would have him crucified between the malefactors, as one of them; but this thief has more sense than they.

Secondly, See what he said to our Lord Jesus: Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom, v. 42. This is the prayer of a dying sinner to a dying Saviour. It was the honour of Christ to be thus prayed to. It was the happiness of the thief thus to pray; perhaps he never prayed before, and yet now was heard, and saved at the last gasp. Observe his faith in this prayer. In his confession of sin (v. 41) he discovered repentance towards God. In this petition he discovered faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. He owns him to be Lord, and to have a kingdom, and that he was going to that kingdom, and that those should be happy whom he favoured; and to believe and confess all this was a great thing at this time of day. He believed another life after this, and desired to be happy in that life, not as the other thief, to be saved from the cross, but to be well provided for when the cross had done its worst. Observe his humility in this prayer. All he begs is, Lord, remember me, referring himself to Christ in what way to remember him. Christ remembered this thief. There is an air of importunity and fervency in this prayer. He does, as it were, breathe out his soul in it: "Lord, remember me; I desire no more; into thy hands I commit my case." To be remembered by Christ, now that he is in his kingdom, is what we should earnestly desire and pray for, and it will be enough to secure our welfare living and dying.

[2] The extraordinary grants of Christ's favour to him: Jesus said unto him: "Verily I say unto thee, I say Amen to this prayer: nay, thou shalt have more than thou didst ask, This day thou shalt be with me in paradise," v. 43.

First, To whom this was spoken: to the penitent thief. Though Christ himself was now in the greatest struggle and agony, yet he had a word of comfort to speak to a poor penitent. Even great sinners, if they be true penitents, shall, through Christ, obtain not only the pardon of their sins, but a place in the paradise of God.

Secondly, By whom this was spoken. This was another mediatorial word which Christ spoke to explain the true intent and meaning of his sufferings; as he died to purchase the forgiveness of sins for us (v. 34), so also to purchase eternal life for us. By this word we are given to understand that Jesus Christ died to open the kingdom of heaven to all penitent obedient believers. 1. Christ here lets us know that he was going to paradise himself. He went by the cross to the crown, and we must not think of going any other way. 2. He lets all penitent believers know that when they die they shall go to be with him there. See here how the happiness of heaven is set forth to us. (1) It is paradise, a garden of pleasure, the paradise of God (Rev. ii. 7). (2) It is being with Christ there. That is the happiness of heaven. (3) It is immediate upon death: This day shalt thou be with me, tonight, before tomorrow.

I. Christ's dying magnified by the prodigies that attended it. 1. The darkening of the sun at noon-day. It was now about the sixth hour, that is, twelve o'clock at noon; and there was a darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour. 2. The rending of the veil of the temple. The former prodigy was in the heavens, this in the temple; for both these are the houses of God. By this rending of the veil was signified the taking away of the ceremonial law, and of all other difficulties and discouragements in our approaches to God, so that now we may come boldly to the throne of grace.

II. Christ's dying explained (v. 46) by the words with which he breathed out his soul. Jesus had cried with a loud voice when he said, Why hast thou forsaken me? So we are told in Matthew and Mark, and, it should seem, it was with a loud voice that he said this too. He said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit. He borrowed these words from his father David (Ps. xxxi. 5). Christ died with scripture in his mouth. In this address to God he calls him Father. When he complained of being forsaken, he cried, Eli, Eli, My God, my God; but, to show that that dreadful agony of his soul was now over, he here calls God Father. Christ made use of these words in a sense peculiar to himself as Mediator. He was now to make his soul an offering for our sin (Isa. liii. 10), to give his life a ransom for many (Matt. xx. 28). Now by these words he offered up the sacrifice, did, as it were, lay his hand upon the head of it, and surrender it. "I deposit it, I pay it down into thy hands. Father, accept of my life and soul instead of the lives and souls of the sinners I die for." The goodwill of the offerer was requisite to the acceptance of the offering. He commends his spirit into his Father's hand, to be received into paradise, and returned the third day. Christ has fitted those words of David to the purpose of dying saints, and hath, as it were, sanctified them for their use. We must show that we are freely willing to die, that we firmly believe in another life after this, by saying, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.

III. Christ's dying improved by the impressions it made upon those that attended him.

1. The centurion that had command of the guard was much affected with what he saw, v. 47. He was a Roman, a Gentile, and yet he glorified God. And he bore a testimony to the patient sufferer: "Certainly this was a righteous man." His testimony in Matthew and Mark goes further: Truly this was the Son of God.

2. The disinterested spectators could not but be concerned. This is taken notice of only here, v. 48. All the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, could not but go away very serious. They smote their breasts, and returned. They laid the thing very much to heart for the present. Probably these very people were of those that had cried, Crucify him, crucify him, and, when he was nailed to the cross, reviled and blasphemed him; but now they had not only their mouths stopped, but their consciences startled. Yet, it should seem, the impression soon wore off: They smote their breasts, and returned. They did not show any further token of respect to Christ, but went home; and we have reason to fear that in a little time they quite forgot it. Thus many that see Christ evidently set forth crucified among them in the word and sacraments are a little affected for the present, but it does not continue. They see Christ's face and admire him; but they go away, and straightway forget what manner of man he is, and what reason they have to love him.

3. His own friends and followers were obliged to keep their distance, and yet got as near as they could and durst, to see what was done (v. 49): All his acquaintance stood afar off; this was part of his sufferings. And the women that followed him from Galilee were beholding these things. Now was Christ set for a sign that should be spoken against, as Simeon foretold, that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed ch. ii. 34, 35.

Verses 50–56

We have here an account of Christ's burial.

I. Who buried him. His acquaintance stood afar off; but God raised up a man named Joseph, v. 50. His character is that he was a good man and a just, a man of unspotted reputation for virtue and piety, not only just to all, but good to all that needed him; he was a person of quality, a counsellor, a member of the sanhedrim, one of the elders of the Jewish church. Though he was of that body of men who had put Christ to death, yet he had not consented to their counsel and deed (v. 51). Nay, he not only dissented openly from those that were enemies to Christ, but he consented secretly with those that were his friends: He himself waited for the kingdom of God. There are many who, though they do not make any show in their outward profession, yet will be more ready to do him a piece of real service, than others who make a greater figure and noise.

II. What he did towards the burying of him. 1. He went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus. 2. He took it down, it should seem, with his own hands, and wrapped it in linen. It was the manner of the Jews to roll the bodies of the dead, as we do little children in their swaddling-clothes, so that the piece of fine linen, which he bought whole, he cut into many pieces for this purpose.

III. Where he was buried. In a sepulchre that was hewn in stone. But it was a sepulchre in which never man before was laid.

IV. When he was buried. On the day of the preparation, when the sabbath drew on, v. 54. This is given as a reason why they made such haste with the funeral, because the sabbath drew on. Weeping must not hinder sowing. Though they were in tears for the death of Christ, yet they must apply themselves to the sanctifying of the sabbath.

V. Who attended the funeral; not any of the disciples, but only the women that came with him from Galilee (v. 55), who, as they stayed by him while he hung on the cross, so they followed him, and beheld the sepulchre, and how his body was laid in it. They were led to this, not by their curiosity, but by their affection to the Lord Jesus.

VI. What preparation was made for the embalming of his body after he was buried (v. 56): They returned, and prepared spices and ointments, which was more an evidence of their love than of their faith; for had they remembered and believed that he should rise again the third day, they would have spared their cost and pains herein. But, busy as they were in this preparation, they rested on the sabbath day.

CHAP. XXIV

Our Lord Jesus went gloriously down to death, but he rose again more gloriously, and the proofs and evidences of Christ's resurrection are more fully related by this evangelist than they were by Matthew and Mark. I. Assurance given by two angels, to the women who visited the sepulchre (ver. 1–7), and the report of this to the apostles, ver. 8–11. II. The visit which Peter made to the sepulchre, ver. 12. III. Christ's conference with the two disciples that were going to Emmaus, ver. 13–35. IV. His appearing to the eleven disciples themselves, the same day at evening, ver. 36–49. V. The farewell he gave them, his ascension into heaven, and the joy and praise of his disciples whom he left behind, ver. 50–53.

Verses 1–12

The infallible proofs of his resurrection are things revealed which belong to us and to our children. Some of them we have here in these verses.

I. We have here the affection and respect which the good women that had followed Christ showed to him, after he was dead and buried, v. 1. As soon as ever they could, after the sabbath was over, they came to the sepulchre, to embalm his body, to anoint the head and face, and perhaps the wounded hands and feet, and to scatter sweet spices upon and about the body as it is usual with us to strew flowers about the dead bodies and graves of our friends. The zeal of these good women for Christ did continue. The spices they had prepared the evening before the sabbath, they brought to the sepulchre on the morning after the sabbath, early, very early. What is prepared for Christ, let it be used for him. Notice is taken of the names of these women, Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the Mother of James. Notice is also taken of certain others with them, v. 1, and again, v. 10. These, who had not joined in preparing the spices, would yet go along with them to the sepulchre; as if the number of Christ's friends increased when he was dead.

II. The surprise they were in, when they found the stone rolled away and the grave empty (v. 2, 3); they were much perplexed at that (v. 4), that the stone was rolled away from the sepulchre, and that they found not the body of the Lord Jesus. Good Christians often perplex themselves about that with which they should comfort and encourage themselves.

III. The plain account which they had of Christ's resurrection from two angels, who appeared to them in shining garments. The women, when they saw the angels, were afraid, they bowed down their faces to the earth, to look for their dear Master in the grave. They would rather find him in his grave-clothes than angels themselves in their shining-garments. They upbraid the women with the absurdity of the search they were making: Why seek ye the living among the dead? v. 5. Witness is hereby given to Christ that he is living, and it is the comfort of all the saints, I know that my Redeemer liveth; for because he lives we shall live also. But a reproof is given to those that look for him among the dead. They assure them that he is risen from the dead (v. 6): "He is not here, but is risen; he has quitted his grave." They refer them to his own words: Remember what he spoke to you, when he was yet in Galilee. If they had duly believed and observed the prediction of it, they would easily have believed the thing itself when it came to pass. The angels repeat to them what Christ had often said in their hearing, The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men. He told them that he must be crucified. Would not this bring to their mind that which always followed, The third day he shall rise again? These angels from heaven bring not any new gospel, but put them in mind of the sayings of Christ, and teach them how to improve and apply them.

IV. Their satisfaction in this account, v. 8. They remembered his words, when they were thus put in mind of them, and thence concluded that if he was risen it was no more than they had reason to expect. A seasonable remembrance of the words of Christ will help us to a right understanding of his providence.

V. The report they brought of this to the apostles: They returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things to the eleven, and to all the rest of Christ's disciples, v. 9. In a little time, that morning, they all had notice of it. But we are told (v. 11) how the report was received: Their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not. They thought it was only the fancy of the women, and imputed it to the power of imagination; for they also had forgotten Christ's words. One cannot but be amazed at the stupidity of these disciples,—who had themselves so often professed that they believed Christ to be the Son of God, had been so often told that he must die and rise again, and then enter into his glory, had seen him more than once raise the dead,—that they should be so backward to believe.

VI. The enquiry which Peter made hereupon, v. 12. It was Mary Magdalene that brought the report to him, as appears, John xx. 1, 2, where this story of his running to the sepulchre is more particularly related. 1. Peter hastened to the sepulchre upon the report. Perhaps, he had not been so ready to go thither now if the women had not told him that the watch was fled. Many that are swift-footed enough when there is no danger are but cow-hearted when there is. 2. He looked into the sepulchre, and took notice how orderly the linen clothes in which Christ was wrapped were taken off, and folded up, and laid by themselves, but the body gone. He was very particular in making his observations, as if he would rather credit his own eyes than the testimony of the angels. 3. He went away wondering in himself; at that which was come to pass. He is only amazed with the thing, and knows not what to make of it. There is many a thing puzzling and perplexing to us which would be both plain and profitable if we did but rightly understand the words of Christ.

Verses 13–35

This appearance of Christ to the two disciples going to Emmaus was mentioned, and but just mentioned, before (Mark xvi. 12); here it is largely related. It happened the same day that Christ rose, the first day of the new world that rose with him. One of these two disciples was Cleopas; who the other was is not certain. It was one of those that were associated with the eleven, mentioned v. 9.

I. The walk and talk of these two disciples: They went to a village called Emmaus, which is reckoned to be about two hours' walk from Jerusalem, v. 13. The accounts brought them that morning of their Master's resurrection seemed to them as idle tales. But as they travelled they talked together of all those things which had happened, v. 14. They talked over these things, reasoning with themselves concerning the probabilities of Christ's resurrection.

II. The good company they met with upon the road, when Jesus himself came, and joined himself to them (v. 15): They communed together, and reasoned. Jesus himself drew near, as a stranger who, seeing them travel the same way that he went, told them that he should be glad of their company. Where but two together are well employed in work of that kind Christ will come to them, and make a third. Two thus twisted in faith and love become a threefold cord, not easily broken. They in their communings and reasonings together were searching for Christ, and now Christ comes to them. They who seek Christ shall find him. But, though they had Christ with them, they were not at first aware of it (v. 16): Their eyes were held, that they should not know him. No matter how it was, but so it was they did not know him, Christ so ordering it that they might the more freely discourse with him and he with them.

III. The conference that was between Christ and them, when he knew them, and they knew not him. Now Christ and his disciples, as is usual when friends meet incognito, or in a disguise, are here crossing questions.

1. Christ's first question to them is concerning their present sadness: What manner of communications are these that you have one with another as you walk, and are sad? v. 17.

(1) They were sad. They had lost their dear Master, and were, in their own apprehensions, quite disappointed in their expectations from him. They had given up the cause, and knew not what course to take to retrieve it. Though he was risen from the dead, yet either they did not know it or did not believe it, and so they were still in sorrow. Christ's disciples are often sad and sorrowful even when they have reason to rejoice. They had communications one with another concerning Christ. It becomes Christians to talk of Christ, not only of God and his providence, but of Christ and his grace and love. Good company and good converse are an excellent antidote against prevailing melancholy. Giving vent to the grief may perhaps give ease to the grieved. Joint mourners should be mutual comforters; comforts sometimes come best from such.

(2) Christ came up to them, and enquired into the matter of their talk: What manner of communications are these? Though Christ had now entered into his state of exaltation, yet he continued tender of his disciples. Our Lord Jesus takes notice of the sorrow and sadness of his disciples, and is afflicted in their afflictions. Christ has thereby taught us to be conversable. It does not become Christians to be morose and shy, but to take pleasure in good society. We are hereby taught to be compassionate. When we see our friends in sorrow and sadness, we should, like Christ here, take cognizance of their grief.

2. In answer to this, they put a question to him concerning his strangeness. Art thou only a stranger in Jerusalem, and hast not known the things that are come to pass there in these days? Cleopas gave him a civil answer. We ought to be civil to those who are civil to us. It was a dangerous time now with Christ's disciples; yet he was not jealous of this stranger, that he had any design upon them, to inform against them. He is full of Christ himself and of his death and sufferings, and wonders that everybody else is not so too: "What! art thou such a stranger in Jerusalem as not to know what has been done to our Master there?" He is very willing to inform this stranger concerning Christ. He would not have anyone that had the face of a man to be ignorant of Christ. And it is observable that these disciples, who were so forward to instruct the stranger, were instructed by him; for to him that has, and uses what he has, shall be given. It appears, by what Cleopas says, that the death of Christ made a great noise in Jerusalem, so that it could not be imagined that any man should be such a stranger in the city as not to know of it.

3. Christ, by way of reply, asked concerning their knowledge (v. 19): He said unto them, What things? thus making himself yet more a stranger. Jesus Christ made light of his own sufferings, in comparison with the joy set before him. See with what unconcernedness he looks back upon his sufferings. He had reason to know what things; for to him they were bitter things, and heavy things, and yet he asks, What things? They must tell him what things they know, and then he will tell them what was the meaning of these things, and lead them into the mystery of them.

4. They, hereupon, gave him a particular account concerning Christ. Observe the story they tell, v. 19, &c.

(1) Here is a summary of Christ's life and character. The things they are full of are concerning Jesus of Nazareth, who was a prophet, a teacher come from God. He confirmed it by many glorious miracles, miracles of mercy, so that he was mighty in deed and word before God and all the people. He had great acceptance with God, and a great reputation in the country. Many are great before all the people, who are not so before God, but Christ was mighty before God and all the people. Those were strangers in Jerusalem that did not know this.

(2) Here is a modest narrative of his sufferings and death, v. 20. "The chief priests and our rulers delivered him to be condemned to death, and they have crucified him." It is strange that they did not lay a greater load upon those that had been guilty of crucifying Christ.

(3) Here is an intimation of their disappointment in him, as the reason of their sadness: "We trusted that it had been he who should have redeemed Israel," v. 21; great things expected from him, by them that looked for redemption, and in it for the consolation of Israel. Now, if hope deferred makes the heart sick, hope disappointed, especially such a hope, kills the heart. We trusted (say they) that it had been he that should have redeemed Israel. And is it not he that doth redeem Israel? Nay, is he not by his death paying the price of their redemption? So that now, since that most difficult part of his undertaking was got over, they had more reason than ever to trust that this was he that should deliver Israel.

(4) Here is an account of their present amazement. "This is the third day since he was crucified and died, and that was the day when it was expected, if ever, that he should rise again and show himself as publicly in honour as he had been shown three days before in disgrace, but all is silent." They own that there was a report among them that he was risen, but they seem to speak of it very slightly (v. 22, 23): "Certain women also of our company made us astonished, who were early at the sepulchre, and found the body gone, and they said that they had seen a vision of angels, who said that he was alive; but we are ready to think it was only their fancy. Women are easily imposed upon." They acknowledge that some of the apostles had visited the sepulchre, and found it empty, v. 24. "But him they saw not, and therefore we have reason to fear that he is not risen, for, if he be, surely he would have shown himself to them; so that we have no great reason to think that he is risen. Our hopes were all nailed to his cross, and buried in his grave."

(5) Our Lord Jesus, though not known by face to them, makes himself known to them by his word.

[1] He reproves them for the weakness of their faith in the scriptures of the Old Testament: O fools, and slow of heart to believe, v. 25. Christ called them fools, not as it signifies wicked men, but as it signifies weak men. That which is condemned in them as their foolishness is, First, Their slowness to believe. Christ tells us that those are fools who are slow of heart to believe, and are kept from it by prejudices never impartially examined. Secondly, Their slowness to believe the writings of the prophets. Were we but more conversant with the scripture, and the divine counsels as far as they are made known in the scripture, we should not be subject to such perplexities as we often entangle ourselves in.

[2] He shows them that the sufferings of Christ were really the appointed way to his glory, and he could not go to it any other way (v. 26): "Ought not the Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" The cross of Christ was that to which they could not reconcile themselves; now here he shows them two things which take off the offence of the cross: First, That the Messiah ought to suffer these things; and therefore his sufferings were not only no objection against his being the Messiah, but really a proof of it. He could not have been a Saviour, if he had not been a sufferer. Secondly, That, when he had suffered these things, he should enter into his glory, which he did at his resurrection. It is called his glory, and it was the glory he had before the world was. He ought to suffer first, and then to enter into his glory. We are directed to expect the crown of thorns and then that of glory.

[3] He expounded to them the scriptures of the Old Testament, and showed them how they were fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth (v. 27): Beginning at Moses he went in order through all the prophets, and expounded to them the things concerning himself, showing that the sufferings he had now gone through were the accomplishment of them. There are things dispersed throughout all the scriptures concerning Christ. You cannot go far in any part of scripture but you meet with something that has reference to Christ, some prophecy, some promise, some prayer, some type or other. A golden thread of gospel grace runs through the whole web of the Old Testament. The things concerning Christ need to be expounded. They were delivered darkly, according to that dispensation: but now that the veil is taken away the New Testament expounds the Old. Jesus Christ is himself the best expositor of scripture, particularly the scriptures concerning himself. In studying the scriptures, it is good to be methodical, for the Old Testament light shone gradually to the perfect day, and it is good to observe how at sundry times, and in divers manners, God spoke to the fathers concerning his Son, by whom he has now spoken to us. Some begin their bible at the wrong end, who study the Revelation first.

IV. Here is the discovery which Christ at length made of himself to them. One would have given a great deal for a copy of the sermon Christ preached to them by the way, of that exposition of the bible which he gave them. The disciples are so charmed with it, that they think they are come too soon to their journey's end; but so it is: They drew nigh to the village whither they went (v. 28). And now,

1. They courted his stay with them: He made as though he would have gone further; he did not say that he would but he seemed to them to be going further. He would have gone further if they had not courted his stay. Those that would have Christ dwell with them must invite him, and be importunate with him. If he seem to draw off from us, it is but to draw out our importunity; as here, they constrained him; with a kind and friendly violence, saying, Abide with us. Those that have experienced the pleasure and profit of communion with Christ cannot but covet more of his company, and beg of him, not only to walk with them all day, but to abide with them at night. Christ yielded to their importunity: He went in, to tarry with them. He has promised that if any man open the door, to bid him welcome, he will come in to him, Rev. iii. 20.

2. He manifested himself to them, v. 30, 31. We may suppose that he continued his discourse with them, which he began upon the road. While supper was getting ready (which perhaps was soon done, the provision was so small and mean), it is probable that he entertained them. But still they little thought that it was Jesus himself that was all this while talking with them, till at length he was pleased to throw off his disguise. They began to suspect it was he, when, as they sat down to meat: He took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave to them. This was not a miraculous meal like that of the five loaves, nor a sacramental meal like that of the eucharist, but a common meal; yet Christ here did the same as he did in those, to teach us to keep up our communion with God through Christ in common providences as well as in special ordinances. Wherever we sit down to eat, let us set Christ at the upper end of the table, take our meat as blessed to us by him, and eat and drink to his glory, and receive contentedly and thankfully what he is pleased to carve out to us, be the fare ever so coarse and mean. Their eyes were opened, and then they saw who it was, and knew him well enough. The mists were scattered, the veil was taken off, and then they made no question but it was their Master. He might put on the shape of another, but no other could put on his; and therefore it must be he. See how Christ by his Spirit and grace makes himself known. The work is completed by the opening of the eyes of their mind. If he that gives the revelation do not give the understanding, we are in the dark still.

3. He immediately disappeared: He vanished out of their sight. He became not visible by them. As soon as he had given his disciples one glimpse of him he was gone. Such short and transient views have we of Christ in this world; we see him, but in a little while lose the sight of him again.

V. Here is the reflection which these disciples made upon this conference, and the report which they made of it to their brethren at Jerusalem.

1. The reflection they each of them made upon the influence which Christ's discourse had upon them (v. 32): They said one to another, Did not our hearts burn within us? Thus do they not so much compare notes as compare hearts, in the review of the sermon Christ had preached to them. They found the preaching powerful, even when they knew not the preacher. It made things very plain and clear to them; and, which was more, brought a divine heat with a divine light into their souls. Now this they take notice of, for the confirming of their belief, that it was indeed, as at last they saw, Jesus himself that had been talking with them all along. See here, (1) What preaching is likely to do good—such as Christ's was, plain preaching—he talked with us by the way; and scriptural preaching—he opened to us the scriptures. Ministers should show people their religion in their bibles, they must show that they make that the fountain of their knowledge and the foundation of their faith. (2) What hearing is likely to do good—that which makes the heart burn; when we are much affected with the things of God, especially with the love of Christ in dying for us, and have our hearts thereby drawn out in love to him, and drawn up in holy desires and devotions, then our hearts burn within us.

2. The report they brought of this to their brethren at Jerusalem (v. 33): They rose up the same hour, so transported with joy at the discovery Christ had made of himself to them that they could not stay to make an end of their supper, but returned with all speed to Jerusalem, though it was towards evening. Now that they had seen Christ they could not rest till they had brought the good news to the disciples, both for the confirmation of their trembling faith and for the comfort of their sorrowful spirits. It is the duty of those to whom Christ has manifested himself to let others know what he has done for their souls. These disciples were full of this matter themselves, and must go to their brethren, to give vent to their joys. (1) How they found them relating another proof of the resurrection of Christ. They found the eleven, and those that were their usual companions, gathered together late in the night, and they found them saying among themselves, and when these two came in, they repeated to them with joy and triumph, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon, v. 34. That Peter had a sight of him before the rest of the disciples had appears 1 Cor. xv. 5, where it is said, He was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve. The angel having ordered the women to tell Peter of it particularly (Mark xvi. 7), for his comfort, it is highly probable that our Lord Jesus did himself the same day appear to Peter, though we have no particular narrative of it. This he had related to his brethren; but, observe, Peter does not here proclaim it, and boast of it, himself, but the other disciples speak of it with exultation, The Lord is risen indeed. He has appeared not only to the women, but to Simon. (2) How they seconded their evidence with an account of what they had seen (v. 35): They told what things were done in the way. The words that were spoken by Christ to them in the way are here called the things that were done in the way; for the words that Christ speaks are not an empty sound, wondrous things are done by them, done by the way, by the by as it were, where it is not expected. They told also how he was at length known to them in the breaking of bread.

Five times Christ was seen the same day that he rose: by Mary Magdalene alone in the garden (John xx. 14), by the women as they were going to tell the disciples (Matt. xxviii. 9), by Peter alone, by the two disciples going to Emmaus, and now at night by the eleven.

I. The great surprise which his appearing gave them. He came in among them very seasonably, as they were comparing notes concerning the proofs of his resurrection: As they thus spoke, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them, and put it out of question. 1. The comfort Christ spoke to them: Peace be unto you. This intimates in general that it was a kind visit which Christ now paid them, a visit of love and friendship. They did not credit those who had seen him; therefore he comes himself. He had promised that after his resurrection he would see them in Galilee; but so desirous was he to see them that he anticipated the appointment and sees them at Jerusalem. Christ is often better than his word, but never worse. Now his first word to them was, Peace be to you. Thus Christ would at the first word intimate to them that he did not come to quarrel with Peter for denying him and the rest for running away from him; no, he came peaceably, to signify to them that he had forgiven them. 2. The fright which they put themselves into upon it (v. 37): They were terrified, supposing that they had seen a spirit, because he was in the midst of them ere they were aware. The word used (Matt. xiv. 26), when they said It is a spirit, is a spectre, an apparition; but the word here used properly signifies a spirit; they supposed it to be a spirit not clothed with a real body.

II. The great satisfaction which his discourse gave them, wherein we have,

1. The reproof he gave them for their causeless fears: Why are you troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? v. 38. Observe here, (1) That when at any time we are troubled, thoughts are apt to rise in our hearts that do us hurt. Sometimes the trouble is the effect of the thoughts that arise in our hearts. Sometimes the thoughts arising in the heart are the effect of the trouble, without are fightings and then within are fears. (2) That many of the troublesome thoughts with which our minds are disquieted arise from our mistakes concerning Christ. They here thought that they had seen a Spirit, when they saw Christ. When Christ is by his Spirit convincing and humbling us, when he is by his providence trying and converting us, we mistake him, as if he designed our hurt, and this troubles us. (3) That all the troublesome thoughts which rise in our hearts at any time are known to the Lord Jesus. He chid his disciples for such thoughts, to teach us to chide ourselves for them.

2. The proof he gave them of his resurrection, both for the silencing of their fears and for the strengthening of their faith. Two proofs he gives them:

(1) He shows them his body, particularly his hands and his feet. "Behold my hands and my feet; you see I have hands and feet, and therefore have a true body; and you see the marks of the nails in my hands and feet, and therefore it is my own body, the same that you saw crucified, and not a borrowed one." He lays down this principle—that a spirit has not flesh and bones. Now hence he infers, "It is I myself, whom you have been so intimately acquainted with, and have had such familiar conversation with; it is I myself, whom you have reason to rejoice in, and not to be afraid of." [1] He appeals to their sight, shows them his hands and his feet, which were pierced with the nails. Christ retained the marks of them in his glorified body, that they might be proofs that it was he himself; and he was willing that they should be seen. He afterwards showed them to Thomas, for he is not ashamed of his sufferings for us; little reason then have we to be ashamed of them, or of ours for him. [2] He appeals to their touch: Handle me, and see. He would not let Mary Magdalene touch him at that time, John xx. 17. But the disciples here are entrusted to do it, that they who were to preach his resurrection, and to suffer for doing so, might be themselves abundantly satisfied concerning it. He bade them handle him, that they might be convinced that he was not a spirit. There were many heretics in the primitive times who said that Christ had never any substantial body, was neither really born nor truly suffered. Blessed be God, these heresies have long since been buried; and we know and are sure that Jesus Christ was no spirit or apparition, but had a true and real body, even after his resurrection.

(2) He eats with them, to show that he had a real and true body. Peter lays a great stress upon this (Acts x. 41): We did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead.

[1] When they saw his hands and his feet, They believed not for joy, and wondered, v. 41. It was their infirmity that they believed not, that yet they believed not. This very much corroborates the truth of Christ's resurrection that the disciples were so slow to believe it. Instead of stealing away his body, and saying, He is risen, when he is not, as the chief priests suggested they would do, they are ready to say again and again, He is not risen, when he is. When afterwards they did believe it, and venture their all upon it, it was not but upon the fullest demonstration of the thing that could be. But, though it was their infirmity, yet it was an excusable one; for it was not from any contempt of the evidence offered them that they believed not. They believed not for joy; they thought it too good news to be true. They wondered; they thought it not only too good, but too great, to be true.

[2] For their further conviction and encouragement, he called for some meat. He here did actually eat with them and the rest, to show that his body was really and truly returned to life. They gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of a honey-comb, v. 42. This was mean fare; yet, if it be the fare of the disciples, their Master will fare as they do, because in the kingdom of our Father they shall fare as he does.

3. The insight he gave them into the word of God. He refers them to the word which they had heard from him when he was with them (v. 44): These are the words which I said unto you while I was yet with you. We should better understand what Christ does, if we did but better remember what he hath said. He refers them to the word they had read in the Old Testament: All things must be fulfilled which were written. Whatever they found written concerning the Messiah in the Old Testament must be fulfilled in him, what was written concerning his sufferings as well as what was written concerning his kingdom. All things must be fulfilled, even the hardest, even the heaviest. The several parts of the Old Testament are here mentioned, as containing each of them things concerning Christ: The law of Moses, the prophets, the Psalms. See in what various ways of writing God did of old reveal his will. By an immediate present work upon their minds he gave them to apprehend the true intent and meaning of the Old Testament prophecies of Christ: Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures, v. 45. In his discourse with the two disciples he took the veil from off the text, by opening the scriptures; here he took the veil from off the heart, by opening the mind. Jesus Christ by his Spirit operates on the minds of men. He has access to our Spirits and can immediately influence them. Even good men need to have their understandings opened; for though they are not darkness, yet in many things they are in the dark. Christ's way of working faith in the soul is by opening the understanding. Thus he comes into the soul by the door. The design of opening the understanding is that we may understand the scriptures; not that we may be wise above what is written, but that we may be wiser in what is written. Christ's scholars never learn above their bibles in this world; but they need to be learning still more and more out of their bibles.

4. The instructions he gave them as apostles: "You are to be witnesses of these things (v. 48), to carry the notice of them to all the world. You are fully assured of these things yourselves, you are eye and ear-witnesses of them; go, and assure the world of them."

(1) What they must preach. They must preach the gospel. They must take their bibles along with them, and must show people how it was written of old concerning the Messiah, and the glories and graces of his kingdom, and then must tell them how all this was fulfilled in the Lord Jesus. The great gospel truth concerning the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ must be published to the children of men (v. 46): Thus it was written, and therefore, thus it behoved Christ to suffer. "Go, and tell the world that Christ suffered, as it was written of him. Go, preach Christ crucified; be not ashamed of his cross, not ashamed of a suffering Jesus. Tell them that it behoved him to suffer, that it was necessary to the taking away of the sin of the world. That he rose from the dead on the third day. In this also the scriptures were fulfilled. Go, and tell them, then, that he that was dead is alive, and lives for evermore, and has the keys of death and the grave." The great gospel duty of repentance must be pressed upon the children of men. Repentance for sin must be preached in Christ's name, and by his authority, v. 47. "Go, and tell all people that they must turn to the service of God in Christ. Their hearts and lives must be changed." The great gospel privilege of the remission of sins must be proposed to all, and assured to all that repent, and believe the gospel. "Go, tell a guilty world that there is hope concerning them."

(2) To whom they must preach. They must preach this among all nations. They must disperse themselves and carry this light along with them wherever they go. The prophets had preached repentance and remission to the Jews, but the apostles must preach them to all the world. None are exempted from the obligations the gospel lays upon men to repent, nor are any excluded from those inestimable benefits. They must begin at Jerusalem. There the gospel day must dawn. And why must they begin there? First, Because thus it was written, and therefore it behoved them to take this method. The word of the Lord must go forth from Jerusalem, Isa. ii. 3. Secondly, Because there the matters of fact on which the gospel was founded were transacted; and therefore there they were first attested. So strong, so bright, is the first shining forth of the glory of the risen Redeemer that it dares face those daring enemies of his and sets them at defiance. Thirdly, Because he would give us a further example of forgiving enemies. The first offer of gospel grace is made to Jerusalem, and thousands there are in a little time brought to partake of that grace.

(3) What assistance they should have in preaching. Behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you, and you shall be endued with power from on high, v. 49. He here assures them that in a little time the Spirit should be poured out upon them in greater measures than ever, and they should thereby be furnished with all those gifts and graces which were necessary to their discharge of this great trust. Those who receive the Holy Ghost are thereby endued with a power from on high. Christ's apostles could never have planted his gospel, and set up his kingdom in the world, as they did, if they had not been endued with such a power. This power from on high was the promise of the Father. And, if it be the promise of the Father, we may be sure that the promise is inviolable and the thing promised invaluable. Christ's ambassadors must stay till they have their powers. Though, one would think, never was such haste as now for the preaching of the gospel, yet the preachers must tarry till they be endued with power from on high.

His ascension into heaven, of which we have a very brief narrative in these verses.

I. How solemnly Christ took leave of his disciples. He had business to do in both worlds, and accordingly came from heaven to earth in his incarnation, to despatch his business here, and, having finished this, he returned to heaven, to reside there. 1. Whence he ascended: from Bethany, near Jerusalem, adjoining to the mount of Olives. There was the garden in which his sufferings began, there he was in his agony; and Bethany signifies the house of sorrow. Those that would go to heaven must ascend thither from the house of sufferings and sorrow. And here it was that awhile ago he began his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, ch. xix. 29. 2. Who were the witnesses of his ascension: He led out his disciples to see him. The disciples did not see him rise out of the grave, because his resurrection was capable of being proved by their seeing him alive afterwards; but they saw him ascend into heaven, because they could not otherwise have an ocular demonstration of his ascension. 3. What was the farewell he gave them: He lifted up his hands, and blessed them. He did not go away in displeasure, but in love; he left a blessing behind him. He blessed them to show that, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end. 4. How he left them: While he was blessing them, he was parted from them; to intimate that his being parted from them did not put an end to his blessing them. He began to bless them on earth, but he went to heaven to go on with it. 5. How his ascension is described. (1) He was parted from them. Those that love us, and pray for us, and instruct us, must be parted from us. Those that knew him after the flesh must now henceforth know him so no more. (2) He was carried up into heaven. There needed no chariot of fire, nor horses of fire; he knew the way.

II. How cheerfully his disciples continued their attendance on him. They paid their homage to him at his going away: They worshipped him, v. 52. He blessed them, in token of gratitude for which they worshipped him. The cloud that received him out of their sight did not put them or their services out of his sight. They returned to Jerusalem with great joy. Thither they went, and there they stayed with great joy. This was a wonderful change. When Christ told them that he must leave them sorrow filled their hearts; yet now that they see him go they are filled with joy. They abounded in acts of devotion while they were in expectation of the promise of the Father, v. 53. They attended the temple-service at the hours of prayer. They were continually in the temple, as their Master was when he was at Jerusalem. Temple-sacrifices, they knew, were superseded by Christ's sacrifice, but the temple-songs they joined in. Nothing better prepares the mind for the receiving of the Holy Ghost than holy joy and praise. Fears are silenced, sorrows sweetened and allayed, and hopes kept up. Amen. Let him be continually praised and blessed.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE GOSPEL

ACCORDING TO

ST. JOHN

It is not material to enquire when and where this gospel was written; we are sure that it was given to John, the brother of James, one of the twelve apostles, distinguished by the honourable character of that disciple whom Jesus loved. The ancients tell us that John lived longest of all the twelve apostles, and was the only one of them that died a natural death. Some of them say that he wrote this gospel at Ephesus in opposition to the heresy of the Ebionites, who held that our Lord was a mere man. It is clear that he wrote last of the four evangelists, and, comparing his gospel with theirs, we may observe, 1. That he relates what they had omitted; he brings up the rear, gleans up what they had passed by. 2. That he gives us more of the mystery of that of which the other evangelists gave us only the history. Some of the ancients observe that the other evangelists wrote more of the bodily things of Christ; but John writes of the spiritual things of the gospel, the life and soul of it.

CHAP. I

The scope and design of this chapter is to confirm our faith in Christ as the eternal Son of God, and the true Messiah and Saviour of the world. In order to this, we have here I. The inspired penman himself, fairly laying down, in the beginning, what he designed his whole book should be the proof of, ver. 1–5; and again, ver. 10–14; and again, ver. 16–18. II. The testimony of John Baptist concerning him (ver. 6–9; and again, ver. 15), but most fully and particularly, ver. 19–37. III. His own manifestation of himself to Andrew and Peter (ver. 38–42), to Philip and Nathanael, ver. 43–51.

Verses 1–5

Let us enquire what there is in those strong lines. The evangelist here lays down the great truth he is to prove, that Jesus Christ is God, one with the Father.

I. Of whom he speaks—The Word—ὁ λόγος. This is an idiom peculiar to John's writings. Even the vulgar Jews were taught that the Word of God was the same with God. The evangelist, in the close of his discourse (v. 18), plainly tells us why he calls Christ the Word—because he is the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, and has declared him. Word is two-fold: Word conceived, and word uttered. 1. There is the word conceived, that is, thought, which is the first and only immediate product and conception of the soul. And thus the second person in the Trinity is fitly called the Word; for he is the first-begotten of the Father. There is nothing we are more sure of then that we think, yet nothing we are more in the dark about then how we think. Surely then the generations and births of the eternal mind may well be allowed to be great mysteries of godliness, the bottom of which we cannot fathom, while yet we adore the depth. 2. There is the word uttered, and this is speech, the chief and most natural indication of the mind. And thus Christ is the Word, for by him God has in these last days spoken to us. He has made known God's mind to us, as a man's word or speech makes known his thoughts. John Baptist was the voice, but Christ the Word.

II. What he saith of him.

1. His existence in the beginning: In the beginning was the Word. This bespeaks his existence, not only before his incarnation, but before all time. The world was from the beginning, but the Word was in the beginning. The Word had a being before the world had a beginning. He that was in the beginning never began, and therefore was ever.

2. His co-existence with the Father: The Word was with God, and the Word was God. It is repeated in v. 2: the same was in the beginning with God, that is, he was so from eternity. In the beginning the world was from God, but the Word was with God, as ever with him. The Word was with God, (1) In respect of essence and substance; for the Word was God. (2) In respect of complacency and felicity. There was a glory and happiness which Christ had with God before the world was (ch. xvii. 5). (3) In respect of counsel and design. So that this grand affair of man's reconciliation to God was concerted between the Father and Son from eternity.

3. His agency in making the world, v. 3. This is here, (1) Expressly asserted: All things were made by him. He was with God, active in the divine operations in the beginning of time. Not as the workman cuts by his axe, but as the body sees by the eye. (2) The contrary is denied: Without him was not anything made that was made, from the highest angel to the meanest worm. God the Father did nothing without him in that work. This proves that he is God. This proves the excellency of the Christian religion, that the author and founder of it is the same that was the author and founder of the world. This shows how well qualified he was for the work of our redemption and salvation. He is appointed the author of our bliss who was the author of our being.

4. The original of life and light that is in him: In him was life, v. 4. This further proves that he is God. (1) He has life in himself; not only the true God, but the living God. (2) All living creatures have their life in him; all the life too that is in the creation is derived from him. He is that Word by which man lives more than by bread, Matt. iv. 4. (3) Reasonable creatures have their light from him; that life which is the light of men comes from him. Life in man is something greater and nobler than it is in other creatures; it is rational, and not merely animal. The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord, and it was the eternal Word that lighted this candle. The light of reason, as well as the life of sense, is derived from him. From whom may we better expect the light of divine revelation than from him who gave us the light of human reason?

5. The manifestation of him to the children of men. Whence is it that he has been so little taken notice of and regarded? To this he answers (v. 5), The light shines, but the darkness comprehends it not.

(1) The discovery of the eternal Word to the lapsed world, even before he was manifested in the flesh: The light shineth in darkness. [1] The eternal Word, as God, shines in the darkness of natural conscience. Something of the power of the divine Word all mankind have an innate sense of. [2] The eternal Word shone in the darkness of the Old Testament prophecies and promises. He that had commanded the light of this world to shine out of darkness was himself long a light shining in darkness.

(2) The disability of the degenerate world to receive this discovery: The darkness comprehended it not. The darkness of error and sin overpowered and quite eclipsed this light. The Jews who had the light of the Old Testament, yet comprehended not Christ in it. It was therefore requisite that Christ should come, both to rectify the errors of the Gentile world and to improve the truths of the Jewish church.

Verses 5–14

The evangelist designs to bring in John Baptist bearing an honourable testimony to Jesus Christ. Now in these verses, before he does this,

I. He gives us some account of the witness he is about to produce. His name was John, which signifies gracious.

1. We are here told concerning him, in general, that he was a man sent of God. He was a man, a mere man. God is pleased to speak to us by men like ourselves. He was sent from God, he was God's messenger. God gave him both his mission and his message. John wrought no miracle, but the strictness and purity of his life and doctrine, were plain indications that he was sent of God.

2. We are here told what his office and business were (v. 7): The same came for a witness, for a testimony. The legal institutions had been long a testimony for God, in the Jewish church. But now divine revelation is to be turned into another channel. There was a profound silence concerning him, till John Baptist came for a witness to him. (1) The matter of his testimony: He came to bear witness to the light. Light is a thing which witnesses for itself. Christ's light needs not man's testimony, but the world's darkness does. John was like the night watchman that goes round the town, proclaiming the approach of the morning light to those that have closed their eyes. He was sent of God to proclaim that dispensation at hand which would bring life and immortality to light. (2) The design of his testimony: That all men through him might believe; not in him, but in Christ. He taught men to look through him, and pass through him, to Christ. If they would but receive this witness of man, they would soon find that the witness of God was greater. It was designed that all men through him might believe, excluding none that did not exclude themselves.

3. We are here cautioned not to mistake him for the light who only came to bear witness to it (v. 8): He was not that light. He was a star, like that which guided the wise men to Christ, a morning star; but he was not the Sun. The evangelist here, when he speaks very honourably of him, yet shows that he must give place to Christ. He was great as the prophet of the Highest, but not the Highest himself. We must take heed of over-valuing ministers, as well as of under-valuing them; they are not our lords, but ministers by whom we believe. Those who usurp the honour of Christ forfeit the honour of being the servants of Christ; yet John was very serviceable as a witness to the light, though he was not that light. Those may be of great use to us who yet shine with a borrowed light.

II. Before he goes on with John's testimony, he returns to give us a further account of this Jesus, to show the graces of his incarnation.

1. Christ was the true Light (v. 9). Christ is the great light that deserves to be called so. Other lights are but figuratively and equivocally called so: Christ is the true light. But how does Christ enlighten every man that comes into the world? (1) By his creating power he enlightens every man with the light of reason; all the beauty it puts upon us, are from Christ. (2) By the publication of his gospel to all nations he does in effect enlighten every man. John Baptist was a light but he lightened only Jerusalem and Judæa, like a candle that enlightens one room; but Christ is the true light, for he is a light to enlighten the Gentiles. Divine revelation is not now to be confined, as it had been, to one people, but to be diffused to all people, Matt. v. 15. Whatever light any man has, he is indebted to Christ for it, whether it be natural or supernatural.

2. Christ was in the world, v. 10. This speaks of his being in the world when he took our nature upon him, and dwelt among us. I am come into the world. He left a world of bliss and glory, and was here in this melancholy miserable world. He was in the world, but not of it. The greatest honour that ever was put upon this world was that the Son of God was once in the world. It should reconcile us to our present abode in this world that once Christ was here. What reason Christ had to expect the most affectionate and respectful welcome possible in this world; for the world was made by him. Therefore he came to save a lost world because it was a world of his own making. The world was made by him, and therefore ought to do him homage. What cold entertainment he met with, notwithstanding: The world knew him not. The ox knows his owner, but the more brutish world did not. They did not own him, did not bid him welcome, because they did not know him. When he shall come as a Judge the world shall know him.

3. He came to his own (v. 11); not only to the world, which was his own, but to the people of Israel, that were peculiarly his own. To them he was first sent. He came to his own, to seek and save them, because they were his own. The generality rejected him: His own received him not. He had reason to expect that those who were his own should have bidden him welcome. He came among them himself, introduced with signs and wonders, and himself the greatest; and therefore it is not said of them, as it was of the world (v. 10), that they knew him not; but his own, though they could not but know him, yet received him not. Many who in profession are Christ's own, yet do not receive him, because they will not part with their sins, nor have him to reign over them. Yet there was a remnant who owned him, and were faithful to him. There were those that received him (v. 12): But as many as received him. There were many of them that were wrought upon to submit to Christ, and many more that were not of that fold. The true Christian's description and property; and that is, that he receives Christ, and believes on his name. Believing in Christ's name is receiving him as a gift from God. We must receive his doctrine as true and good; and we must receive the image of his grace, and impressions of his love, as the governing principle of our affections and actions. The true Christians' dignity and privilege are twofold:

First, The privilege of adoption: To them gave he power to become the sons of God. Hitherto, the adoption pertained to the Jews only; but now, by faith in Christ, Gentiles are the children of God. To them gave he a right; this power have all the saints. It is the unspeakable privilege of all good Christians, that they are become the children of God. If they be the children of God, they become so, are made so.

Behold what manner of love is this, 1 John iii. 1. God calls them his children, they call him Father. The privilege of adoption is entirely owing to Jesus Christ; he gave this power to them that believe on his name. The Son of God became a Son of man, that the sons and daughters of men might become the sons and daughters of God Almighty.

Secondly, The privilege of regeneration (v. 13): Which were born. All the children of God are born again; all that are adopted are regenerated. Now here we have an account of the original of this new birth. 1. Negatively. (1) It is not of blood, not of the will of the flesh, nor of corruptible seed. We do not become the children of God as we become the children of our natural parents. Grace does not run in the blood, as corruption does. (2) It is not produced by the natural power of our own will. As it is not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, so neither is it of the will of man. It is the grace of God that makes us willing to be his. But, 2. Positively: it is of God. This new birth is owing to the word of God as the means and to the Spirit of God as the great and sole author. True believers are born of God, 1 John iii 9; v. 1.

4. The word was made flesh. v. 14. This expresses Christ's incarnation more clearly than what went before. Now that the fulness of time was come he was sent forth after another manner, made of a woman.

(1) The human nature of Christ with which he was veiled. The word was made flesh. Forasmuch as the children who were to become the sons of God, were partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, Heb. ii. 14. John here saith, He was God, but He was made flesh. Compare v. 1 with this. He subjected himself to the miseries and calamities of the human nature. Flesh bespeaks man tainted with sin, and Christ appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh (Rom. viii. 3), and was made sin for us, 2 Cor. v. 21, and condemned sin in the flesh, Rom. viii. 3. The Word of the Lord, who was made flesh, endures for ever; when made flesh, he ceased not to be the Word of God. He dwelt among us. Having taken upon him the nature of man, he put himself into the place and condition of other men. Having taken a body of the same mould with ours, in it he came, and resided in the same world with us. He dwelt among us, us worms of the earth, us that were corrupt and depraved, and revolted from God. When we look upon the upper world, how mean and contemptible does this flesh, this body, appear, which we carry about with us, and this world in which our lot is cast. But that the eternal Word was made flesh, and dwelt in this world as we do should make us willing to abide in the flesh while God has any work for us to do. He dwelt among the Jews. Though the Jews were unkind to him, yet he continued to dwell among them. He dwelt among us. He was in the world, not as a wayfaring man that tarries but for a night, but he dwelt among us. The original word is observable, he dwelt as in a tabernacle, which intimates, that he dwelt here in very mean circumstances, as shepherds that dwell in tents. That his stay among us was not to be perpetual. He dwelt here as in a tent, not as at home. That as of old God dwelt in the tabernacle of Moses, so now he dwells in the human nature of Christ. And we are to make all our addresses to God through Christ.

(2) The beams of his divine glory that darted through this veil of flesh: We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. The sun is still the fountain of light, though eclipsed or clouded; so Christ was still the brightness of his Father's glory. There were those that saw through the veil.

[1] Who were the witnesses of this glory: we, his disciples and followers, we among whom he dwelt. Other men discover their weaknesses to those that are most familiar with them, but it was not so with Christ; those that were most intimate with him saw most of his glory. They saw the glory of his divinity, while others saw only the veil of his human nature.

[2] What evidence they had of it: We saw it. They had not their evidence by report, at secondhand, but were themselves eyewitnesses, We saw it. The word signifies a fixed abiding sight. This apostle himself explains this: What we declare unto you of the Word of life is what we have seen with our eyes, and what we have looked upon, 1 John i. 1.

[3] What the glory was: The glory as of the only begotten of the Father. The glory of the Word made flesh was such a glory as became the only begotten Son of God, and could not be the glory of any other. Jesus Christ is the only begotten of the Father. Believers are the children of God by the special favour of adoption and the special grace of regeneration. They are in a sense of a like nature, and have the image of his perfections; but Christ is of the same nature. He was evidently declared to be the only begotten of the Father, by that which was seen of his glory when he dwelt among us. His divine glory appeared in the holiness and heavenliness of his doctrine; in his miracles; it appeared in the purity, goodness, and beneficence, of his whole conversation. God's goodness is his glory, and he went about doing good. Perhaps the evangelist had a particular regard to the glory of his transfiguration, of which he was an eyewitness.

[4] What advantage those he dwelt among had from this. In the old tabernacle wherein God dwelt was the law, in this was grace; in that were types, in this was truth. He was full of grace and truth, the two great things that fallen man stands in need of. He was full of grace, and therefore qualified to intercede for us; and full of truth, and therefore fit to instruct us. He had a fulness of knowledge and a fulness of compassion.

Verses 15–18

1. The evangelist begins again to give us John Baptist's testimony concerning Christ, v. 15.

1. How he expressed his testimony: He cried, according to the prediction that he should be the voice of one crying. The Old Testament prophets cried aloud, to show people their sins; this New Testament prophet cried aloud, to show people their Saviour. It was an open public testimony, proclaimed, that all manner of persons might take notice of it. He was free and hearty in bearing this testimony. He cried as one that was both well assured of the truth to which he witnesses and well affected to it.

2. What his testimony was. He appeals to what he had said at the beginning of his ministry, when he had directed them to expect one that should come after him, whose forerunner he was. Now what he had then said he applies to this Jesus whom he had lately baptized: This was he of whom I spoke. In this he went beyond all the Old Testament prophets that he particularly specified the person.

(1) He had given the preference to this Jesus: He that comes after me is preferred before me as the prince or peer that comes after is preferred before the harbinger or gentleman-usher that makes way for him. Jesus Christ, who was to be called the Son of the highest (Luke i. 32), was preferred before John Baptist, who was to be called only the prophet of the Highest, Luke i. 76. John was a great man, yet he was forward to give the preference to him to whom it belonged. All the ministers of Christ must prefer him and his interest before themselves and their own interests. He comes after me, and yet is preferred before me. God dispenses his gifts according to his good pleasure, and many times crosses hands, as Jacob did. Paul far outstripped those that were in Christ before him.

(2) He gives here a good reason for it: For he was before me. In respect of seniority: he was before me, for he was before Abraham, ch. viii. 58. I am but of yesterday, he from eternity. In respect of supremacy: he is my Master, I am his minister and messenger."

II. He returns again to speak of Jesus Christ, and cannot go on with John Baptist's testimony till v. 19. The 16th verse has a manifest connection with v. 14, where the incarnate Word was said to be full of grace and truth. He has a fountain of fulness overflowing: We all have received. All we believers; as many as received him (v. 16), received from him. All true believers receive from Christ's fulness; the best and greatest saints cannot live without him, the meanest and weakest may live by him. This excludes proud boasting, that we have nothing but we have received it; and silences perplexing fears, that we want nothing but we may receive it.

1. We have received grace for grace. Our receivings by Christ are all summed up in this one word, grace; so great a gift, so rich, so invaluable; we have received no less than grace. It is repeated, grace for grace.

(1) The blessing received. It is grace; the goodwill of God towards us, and the good work of God in us. God's goodwill works the good work, and then the good work qualifies us for further tokens of his good will. As the cistern receives water from the fulness of the fountain, the branches sap from the fulness of the root, and the air light from the fulness of the sun, so we receive grace from the fulness of Christ.

(2) The manner of its reception: Grace for grace. The phrase is singular, and interpreters put different senses upon it, each of which will be of use to illustrate the unsearchable riches of the grace of Christ. Grace for grace bespeaks, [1] The freeness of this grace. It is grace for grace' sake. We receive grace, not for our sakes. It is grace to us for the sake of Jesus Christ. [2] The fulness of this grace. Grace for grace is abundance of grace, grace upon grace. It is a blessing poured out, that there shall not be room to receive it: one grace a pledge of more grace. [3] The serviceableness of this grace. Grace for grace is grace for the promoting and advancing of grace. Gracious vouchsafements for gracious performances; grace is a talent to be traded with. [4] The substitution of New Testament grace in the room and stead of Old Testament grace. And this sense is confirmed by what follows (v. 17); for the Old Testament had grace in type, the New Testament has grace in truth. This is grace instead of grace. [5] It bespeaks the augmentation and continuance of grace. Grace for grace is one grace to improve, confirm, and perfect another grace. [6] Grace for grace is grace in us answering to grace in him, as the impression upon the wax answers the seal line for line. The grace we receive from Christ changes us into the same image.

2. We have received grace and truth, v. 17. He had said (v. 14) that Christ was full of grace and truth; now here he says that by him grace and truth came to us. From Christ we receive grace; this is a string he delights to harp upon, he cannot go off from it. Two things he further observes in this verse concerning this grace: (1) Its preference above the law of Moses: The law was given by Moses, and it was a glorious discovery; but the gospel of Christ is a much clearer discovery. That which was given by Moses was purely terrifying and threatening, but that which is given by Jesus Christ has all the beneficial uses of the law, but not the terror, for it is grace. The endearments of love are the genius of the gospel, not the affrightments of law and the curse. (2) Its connection with truth: grace and truth. In the gospel we have the discovery of the greatest truths to be embraced by the understanding, as well as of the richest grace to be embraced by the will and affections. It is grace and truth with reference to the law that was given by Moses. For it is, [1] The performance of all the Old Testament promises. [2] It is the substance of all the Old Testament types and shadows. He is the true paschal lamb, the true scape-goat, the true manna. They had grace in the picture; we have grace in the person. Grace and truth came, was made; the same word that was used (v. 3) concerning Christ's making all things. By him this grace and truth do consist.

3. Another thing we receive from Christ is a clear revelation of God to us (v. 18): He hath declared God to us, whom no man hath seen at any time.

(1) The insufficiency of all other discoveries: No man hath seen God at any time. This intimates, [1] That the nature of God being spiritual, he is invisible to bodily eyes. We have therefore need to live by faith, by which we see him that is invisible, Heb. xi. 27. [2] That the revelation which God made of himself in the Old Testament was very short and imperfect, in comparison with that which he has made by Christ: No man hath seen God at any time. But this recommends Christ's holy religion to us that it was founded by one that had seen God, and knew more of his mind that anyone else ever did.

(2) The all-sufficiency of the gospel discovery proved from its author: The only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has declared him. Observe here, How fit he was to make this discovery. He is the only-begotten Son; and who so likely to know the Father as the Son? or in whom is the Father better known than in the Son? Matt. xi. 27. He is in the bosom of the Father. 1. In the bosom of his special love, dear to him, in whom he was well pleased. 2. In the bosom of his secret counsels. None so fit as he to make known God, for none knew his mind as he did.

(3) How free he was in making this discovery: He hath declared. Not only that which was hid of God, but that which was hid in God. It signifies a plain, clear, and full discovery. He that runs may now read the will of God and the way of salvation. This is the grace, this the truth, that came by Jesus Christ.

We have here the testimony of John, which he delivered to the messengers who were sent from Jerusalem to examine him.

I. Who they were that sent to him, and who they were that were sent. They that sent to him were the Jews at Jerusalem. One would think that they should have understood the times so well as to know that the Messiah was at hand, and therefore have known him that was his forerunner, but, instead of this, they sent messengers to cross questions with him. Secular learning, honour, and power, seldom dispose men's minds to the reception of divine light. They that were sent were, (1) Priests and Levites. John Baptist was himself a priest of the seed of Aaron, and therefore it was not fit that he should be examined by any but priests. (2) They were of the Pharisees that thought they needed no repentance.

II. On what errand they were sent; it was to enquire concerning John and his baptism. They did not send for John; they thought it was good to keep him at a distance. They enquire concerning him, 1. To satisfy their curiosity. The doctrine of repentance was to them strange doctrine. 2. It was to show their authority. 3. It was with a design to suppress him and silence him.

III. What was the answer he gave them, and his account, both concerning himself and concerning his baptism.

1. Concerning himself. They asked him, Thou, who art thou? John's appearing in the world was surprising. His spirit, his converse, his doctrine, had something in them which commanded and gained respect; but he did not give out himself to be some great one. He was more industrious to do good than to appear great. He answers their interrogatory, Negatively. He was not that great one whom some took him to be. God's faithful witnesses stand more upon their guard against undue respect than against unjust contempt. John disowns himself to be the Christ (v. 20): He said, I am not the Christ. Observe how emphatically this is here expressed concerning John: He confessed, and denied not, but confessed; it denotes his vehemence and constancy in making this protestation. I am not the Christ, not I; another is at hand, who is he, but I am not. His disowning himself to be the Christ is called his confessing and not denying Christ. He disowns himself to be Elias, v. 21. The Jews expected the person of Elias to return from heaven. Hearing of John's character, doctrine, and baptism, and observing that he appeared as one dropped from heaven, it is no wonder that they were ready to take him for this Elijah; but he disowned this honour too. He was indeed prophesied of under the name of Elijah (Mal. iv. 5), and he came in the spirit and power of Elias (Luke i. 17), and was the Elias that was to come (Matt. xi. 14); but he was not the person of Elias. He was the Elias that God had promised, not the Elias that they foolishly dreamed of. Elias did come, and they knew him not (Matt. xvii. 12); because they had promised themselves such an Elias as God never promised them. He disowns himself to be that prophet. First, He was not that prophet which Moses said the Lord would raise up to them of their brethren. Secondly, He was not such a prophet as they expected and wished for, who would interpose in public affairs, and rescue them from under the Roman yoke. Thirdly, He was not one of the old prophets raised from the dead.

The committee sent to examine him pressed for a positive answer (v. 22), urging the authority of those that sent them: "Tell us, What art thou? that we may give an answer to those that sent us." John was looked upon as a man of sincerity, and therefore they believed he would be fair and above-board, and give a plain answer to a plain question: What sayest thou of thyself? And he did so, I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. He gives his answer in the words of scripture, to show that the scripture was fulfilled in him. He gives his answer in very humble, modest, self-denying expressions. He chooses to apply that scripture to himself which bespeaks him little: I am the voice, mere voice. He gives such an account of himself as might awaken them to hearken to him; for he was the voice (see Isa. xl. 3), a voice to alarm, an articulate voice to instruct. Ministers are but the voice, by which God is pleased to communicate his mind. First, He was a human voice. The people were prepared to receive the law by the voice of thunders; but they were prepared for the gospel by the voice of a man like ourselves, a still small voice. Secondly, He was the voice of one crying, which denotes, 1. His earnestness and importunity; he cried aloud, and did not spare. Ministers must preach as those that are in earnest. Those words are not likely to thaw the hearers' hearts that freeze between the speaker's lips. 2. His open publication of the doctrine he preached. Thirdly, It was in the wilderness that this voice was crying; in a place of silence and solitude, out of the noise of the world and the hurry of its business. Fourthly, That which he cried was, Make straight the way of the Lord. He came to rectify the mistakes of people concerning the ways of God. The scribes and Pharisees had made them crooked. Now John Baptist calls people to return to the original rule.

2. Here is his testimony concerning his baptism.

(1) The enquiry which the committee made about it: Why baptizest thou, if thou be not the Christ, nor Elias, nor that prophet? v. 25. They readily apprehended baptism to be fitly and properly used as a sacred rite or ceremony, to signify the cleansing of them from the pollutions of their former state. That sign was made use of in the Christian church. Christ did not affect novelty, nor should his ministers. They expected it would be used in the days of the Messiah. It is taken for granted that Christ, and Elias, and that prophet, would baptize, when they came to purify a polluted world. Divine grace has provided for the cleansing of this new world from its filth. They would therefore know by what authority John baptized. His denying himself to be Elias, or that prophet, subjected him to this further question, Why baptizest thou?

(2) The account he gave of it, v. 26, 27. He owned himself to be only the minister of the outward sign: "I baptize with water, and that is all. I cannot confer the spiritual grace signified by it." He directed them to one who was greater than himself, and would do that for them which he could not do. John gave the same account to this committee that he had given to the people (v. 15): This was he of whom I spoke. He tells them of Christ's presence among them now at this time: There stands one among you, whom you know not. Christ stood among the common people, and was as one of them. Much true worth lies hid in this world; obscurity is often the lot of real excellency. God himself is often nearer to us than we are aware of. The kingdom of God was abroad and already among them, Luke xvii. 21. He tells them of Christ's preference above himself: He comes after me, and yet is preferred before me, "Whose shoe-latchet I am not worthy to loose." If so great a man as John accounted himself unworthy of the honour of being near Christ, how unworthy then should we account ourselves! Now, one would think, these chief priests and Pharisees, should presently have asked who, and where, this excellent person was. No, they came to molest John, not to receive any instructions from him. They might have known Christ, and would not. Notice is taken of the place where all this was done: In Bethabara beyond Jordan, v. 28. Bethabara signifies the house of passage; there was opened the way into the gospel state by Jesus Christ. He made this confession in the same place where he was baptizing, that all those who attended his baptism might be witnesses of it.

Verses 29–36

We have in these verses an account of John's testimony concerning Jesus Christ, which he witnessed to his own disciples that followed him. As soon as ever Christ was baptized he was immediately hurried into the wilderness, to be tempted; and there he was forty days. During his absence John had continued to bear testimony to him, but now at last he sees Jesus coming to him. Now here are two testimonies borne by John to Christ, but those two agree in one.

I. Here is his testimony to Christ, and here four things are witnessed by him concerning Christ.

1. That he is the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, v. 29. Let us learn here,

(1) That Jesus Christ is the Lamb of God, which bespeaks him the great sacrifice, by which atonement is made for sin, and man reconciled to God. Of all the legal sacrifices he chooses to allude to the lambs that were offered with a special reference to the daily sacrifice, which was offered every morning and evening continually, and that was always a lamb; to the paschal lamb, the blood of which secured the Israelites from the stroke of the destroying angel. Christ is our passover. Christ, who was to make atonement for sin, is called the Lamb of God.

(2) That Jesus Christ, as the Lamb of God, takes away the sin of the world. John Baptist had called people to repent of their sins, in order to the remission of them. Now here he shows how and by whom that remission was to be expected. This ground of hope we have—Jesus Christ is the Lamb of God. [1] He takes away sin. He came to take away the guilt of sin by the merit of his death. To take away the power of sin by the Spirit of his grace. He is taking away the sin of the world, which denotes it a continued act. He is always taking away sin. [2] He takes away the sin of the world; purchases pardon for all of what country, nation, or language, soever they be. The Lamb of God was offered to be a propitiation for the sin of the whole world; see 1 John ii. 2. If Christ takes away the sin of the world, then why not my sin? [3] He does this by taking it upon himself. He is the Lamb of God, that bears the sin of the world; so the margin reads it. He bears it from us; he bore the sin of many, as the scape-goat had the sins of Israel put upon his head, Lev. xvi. 21. God has found out a way of abolishing the sin, and yet sparing the sinner, by making his Son sin for us.

(3) That it is our duty to behold the Lamb of God thus taking away the sin of the world. See him taking away sin, and let that increase our hatred of sin. Let it increase our love to Christ.

2. That this was he of whom he had spoken before (v. 30, 31): This is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man. This honour John had above all the prophets, that, whereas they spoke of him as one that should come, he saw him already come. Such a difference there is between present faith and future vision. He refers to what he had himself said of him before: This is he of whom I said. Though Christ appeared not in any external pomp or grandeur, yet John is not ashamed to own, This is he whom I meant, who is preferred before me. And it was necessary that John should thus show them the person, otherwise they could not have believed that one who made so mean a figure should be he of whom John had spoken such great things. He protests against any confederacy or combination with this Jesus: And I knew him not. There was no acquaintance at all between them; John had no personal knowledge of Jesus till he saw him come to his baptism. They who are taught believe and confess one whom they have not seen, and blessed are they who yet have believed. The great intention of John's ministry and baptism was to introduce Jesus Christ. That he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water. Though John did not know Jesus by face, yet he knew that he should be made manifest. We may know the certainty of that which yet we do not fully know the nature and intention of. The general assurance John had that Christ should be made manifest served to carry him with diligence and resolution through his work: Therefore am I come. God reveals himself to his people by degrees. At first, John knew no more concerning Christ but that he should be made manifest; and now he is favoured with a sight of him.

3. That this was he upon whom the Spirit descended from heaven like a dove. For the confirming of his testimony concerning Christ, he here vouches the extraordinary appearance at his baptism, in which God himself bore witness to him. We are here told (v. 32–34),

(1) That John Baptist saw it: He bore record; attested it, with all the seriousness and solemnity of witness-bearing. He made affidavit of it: I saw the Spirit descending from heaven. John could not see the Spirit, but he saw the dove which was a sign and representation of the Spirit. God's children are made manifest by their graces; their glories are reserved for their future state. He descended like a dove—an emblem of meekness, and wildness, and gentleness. The dove brought the olive-branch of peace, Gen. viii. 11. The Spirit that descended upon Christ abode upon him. The Spirit did not move him at times, but at all times.

(2) That he was told to expect it. It was an instituted sign given him before, by which he might certainly know it (v. 33): I knew him not. He that sent me to baptize gave me this sign, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, the same is he. See here what sure grounds John went upon. He did not run without sending: God sent him to baptize. He had a warrant from heaven for what he did. When a minister's call is clear, his comfort is sure, though his success is not always so. He did not run without speeding; for, when he was sent to baptize with water, he was directed to one that should baptize with the Holy Ghost. It is a great comfort to Christ's ministers, that he whose ministers they are can put life, and soul, and power into their ministrations; can speak to the heart what they speak to the ear, and breathe upon the dry bones to which they prophesy. God had before given him a sign: "On whom thou shalt see the Spirit descend, that same is he." This not only prevented any mistakes, but gave him boldness in his testimony. When he had such assurance as this given him, he could speak with assurance.

4. That he is the Son of God. This is the conclusion of John's testimony, that in which all the particulars centre (v. 34): I saw, and bore record, that this is the Son of God. The truth asserted is, that this is the Son of God. This was the peculiar Christian creed, that Jesus is the Son of God (Matt. xvi. 16), and here is the first framing of it. John's testimony to it: "I saw, and bore record." What he saw he was forward to bear record of. What he bore record of was what he saw. Christ's witnesses were eyewitnesses.

II. Here is John's testimony to Christ, the next day after, v. 35, 36. John stood looking upon Jesus as he walked. It should seem, John was in close conversation with two of his disciples. He saw Jesus walking. He was looking upon Jesus; he looked steadfastly, and fixed his eyes upon him. Those that would lead others to Christ must be diligent and frequent in the contemplation of him themselves. 2. He repeated the same testimony which he had given to Christ the day before. Christ's sacrifice for the taking away of the sin of the world ought especially to be insisted upon by all good ministers: Christ, the Lamb of God, Christ and him crucified. 3. He intended this especially for his two disciples that stood with him; he was willing to turn them over to Christ. He did not reckon that he lost those disciples who went over from him to Christ, any more than the schoolmaster reckons that scholar lost whom he sends to the university. John gathered disciples, not for himself, but for Christ. Humble, generous souls will give others their due praise without fear of diminishing themselves by it.

Verses 37–42

We have here the turning over of two disciples from John to Jesus, and one of them fetching in a third, and these are the first-fruits of Christ's disciples.

I. Andrew and another with him were the two that John Baptist had directed to Christ, v. 37. Who the other was we are not told.

1. Here is their readiness to go over to Christ. They heard him speak of Christ as the Lamb of God, that takes away the sin of the world, and this made them follow him.

2. The kind notice Christ took of them, v. 38. He was soon aware of them, and turned, and saw them following. Christ takes early cognizance of the first motions of a soul towards him. He did not stay till they begged leave to speak with him, but spoke first. When there is communion between a soul and Christ, it is he that begins the discourse. He saith unto them, "What seek ye?" It is a kind invitation of them into his acquaintance: "Come, what have you to say to me?" Those whose business it is to instruct people in the affairs of their souls should be humble, and mild, and easy of access. The question Christ put to them is what we should all put to ourselves when we begin to follow Christ: "What seek ye? What do we design and desire? Do we seek a teacher, ruler, and reconciler? In following Christ, do we seek the favour of God and eternal life?"

3. Their modest enquiry concerning the place of his abode: Rabbi, where dwellest thou? In calling him Rabbi, they intimated that their design in coming to him was to be taught by him; rabbi signifies a master, a teaching master. These came to Christ to be his scholars, so must all those that apply themselves to him. In asking where he dwelt, they intimate a desire to be better acquainted with him. They would attend him at some seasonable time, when he should appoint. Civility and good manners well become those who follow Christ. They hoped to have more from him than they could have now by the way. They resolved to make a business, not a by-business of conversing with Christ. Those that have had some communion with Christ cannot but desire a further communion with him; a fixed communion with him; where they may sit down at his feet. It is not enough to take a turn with Christ now and then, but we must lodge with him.

4. The courteous invitation Christ gave them to his lodgings: He saith unto them, Come and see. He invites them to come to his lodgings: the nearer we approach to Christ, the more we see of his beauty. Deceivers maintain their interest in their followers by keeping them at a distance, but that which Christ desired to recommend him to the esteem and affections of his followers was that they would come and see. He invites them to come immediately and without delay. There is never a better time. It is best taking people when they are in a good mind; strike while the iron is hot. It is wisdom to embrace the present opportunities: Now is the accepted time.

5. Their cheerful and (no doubt) thankful acceptance of his invitation: They came and saw where he dwelt, and abode with him that day. They readily went along with him. Gracious souls cheerfully accept Christ's gracious invitations. It is good being where Christ is, wherever it be. They abode with him that day ("Master, it is good to be here"); and he bade them welcome. It was about the tenth hour.

II. Andrew brought his brother Peter to Christ. Andrew had the honour first to be acquainted with Christ, and to be the instrument of bringing Peter to him.

1. The information which Andrew gave to Peter.

(1) He first finds his own brother Simon; his finding implies his seeking him. He first findeth Simon who came only to attend on John, but has his expectations out-done; he meets with Jesus.

(2) He told him whom they had found: We have found the Messias. He speaks humbly; not, "I have found," but "We have," rejoicing that he had shared with others in it. He speaks exultingly: We have found. He proclaims it, for he knows that he shall have never the less in Christ for others sharing. He speaks intelligently: We have found the Messias, which was more than had yet been said. He speaks more clearly concerning Christ than ever his teacher had done.

(3) He brought him to Jesus, brought him to the fountain-head. Now this was an instance of true love to his brother. We ought with a particular concern and application to seek the spiritual welfare of those that are related to us; for their relation to us adds both to the obligation and to the opportunity of doing good to their souls. It was an effect of his day's conversation with Christ. Hereby it appeared that Andrew had been with Jesus that he was so full of him. He knew there was enough in Christ for all; and, having tasted that he is gracious, he could not rest till those he loved had tasted it too. True grace hates monopolies, and loves not to eat its morsels alone.

2. The entertainment which Jesus Christ gave to Peter, v. 42.

(1) Christ called him by his name: When Jesus beheld him, he said, Thou art Simon, the son of Jona. Some observe the signification of these names: Simon—obedient, Jona—a dove. An obedient dove-like spirit qualifies us to be the disciples of Christ.

(2) He gave him a new name: Cephas. His giving him a name intimates Christ's favour to him. By this Christ adopted him into his family as one of his own. The name which he gave him bespeaks his fidelity to Christ: Thou shalt be called Cephas (that is Hebrew for a stone:), which is by interpretation Peter. Peter's natural temper was stiff, and hardy, and resolute, which I take to be the principal reason why Christ called him Cephas—a stone. When Christ afterwards prayed for him, that his faith might not fail, that so he might be firm to Christ himself, then he made him what he here called him, Cephas—a stone. Those that come to Christ must come with a fixed resolution to be firm and constant to him, like a stone, and it is by his grace that they are so.

We have here the call of Philip and Nathanael.

I. Philip was called immediately by Christ himself, not as Andrew, who was directed to Christ by John or Peter, who was invited by his brother. God has various methods of bringing his chosen ones home to himself. Jesus findeth Philip. Christ sought us, and found us, before we made any enquiries after him. The name Philip is of Greek origin, and much used among the Gentiles, yet Christ changed not his name. He was called the day following. When work is to be done for God, we must not lose a day. Jesus would go forth into Galilee. Christ will find out all those that are given to him. Philip was brought to be a disciple by the power of Christ going along with that word, Follow me. We are told that Philip was of Bethsaida, and Andrew and Peter were so too, v. 44. Bethsaida was a wicked place (Matt. xi. 21), yet even there was a remnant, according to the election of grace.

II. Nathanael was invited to Christ by Philip.

1. What passed between Philip and Nathanael.

(1) The joyful news that Philip brought to Nathanael, v. 45. Philip, though newly come to an acquaintance with Christ himself, yet steps aside to seek Nathanael. O, saith Philip, we have found him of whom Moses and the prophets did write. What a transport of joy Philip was in, upon this new acquaintance with Christ: "We have found him whom we have so long wished and waited for; at last, he is come, he is come, and we have found him!" What an advantage it was to him that he was so well acquainted with the scriptures of the Old Testament, which prepared his mind for the reception of evangelical light. It was his weakness to say, We have found him, for Christ found them before they found Christ. He did not yet apprehend, as Paul did, how he was apprehended of Christ Jesus.

(2) The objection which Nathanael made against this, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? v. 46. [1] His caution was commendable; our rule is, Prove all things. [2] His objection arose from ignorance. If he meant that the Messiah, that great good thing, could not come out of Nazareth, so far he was right, but then he was ignorant of the matter of fact, that this Jesus was born at Bethlehem; so that the blunder Philip made, in calling him Jesus of Nazareth, occasioned this objection.

(3) The short reply which Philip gave to this objection: Come and see. We may know enough to satisfy ourselves, and yet not be able to say enough to silence a subtle adversary. It was his wisdom and zeal that, when he could not answer the objection himself, he would have him go to one that could: Come and see. Not, Go and see, but, "Come, and I will go along with thee." Many people are kept from the ways of religion by the unreasonable prejudices they have conceived against religion, upon the account of some foreign circumstances which do not at all touch the merits of the case.

2. What passed between Nathanael and our Lord Jesus. He came and saw, not in vain.

(1) Jesus saw him coming. He said of him to those about him, Behold an Israelite indeed. He commended him; not to flatter him, but perhaps because he knew him to be a modest man. Nathanael had objected against Christ; but Christ hereby showed that he excused it, because he knew his heart was upright. He commended him for his integrity. Behold an Israelite indeed. All are not Israel that are of Israel; here, however, was an Israelite indeed. A sincere follower of the good example of Israel. He was a genuine son of honest Jacob. A sincere professor of the faith of Israel: he was really as good as he seemed, and his practice was of a piece with his profession. He is the Jew that is one inwardly, so is he the Christian. He is one in whom is no guile: no guile towards men; a man that one may trust; no guile towards God, sincere in his repentance for sin. He does not say without guilt, but without guile. An Israelite indeed, a miracle of divine grace.

(2) Nathanael is much surprised at this.

[1] Here is Nathanael's modesty: "Whence knowest thou me, me that am unworthy of thy cognizance?" This was an evidence of his sincerity, that he did not catch at the praise he met with. Doth Christ know us? Let us covet to know him.

[2] Here is Christ's further manifestation of himself to him: Before Philip called thee, I saw thee. First, He gives him to understand that he knew him, and so manifests his divinity. Secondly, That before Philip called him he saw him under the fig-tree. Christ has knowledge of us before we have any knowledge of him. His eye was upon him when he was under the fig-tree; this was a private token which nobody understood but Nathanael: "When thou wast retired under the fig-tree I had then my eye upon thee, and saw that which was very acceptable." It is most probable that Nathanael under the fig-tree was employed in meditation, and prayer, and communion with God. Sitting under the fig-tree denotes quietness and composedness of spirit, which much befriend communion with God.

(3) Nathanael hereby obtained a full assurance of faith in Jesus Christ (v. 49): Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the king of Israel; that is, in short, thou art the true Messiah. Observe here, how firmly he believed with the heart. Now he asks no more, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? How freely he confessed with the mouth. He confesses Christ's prophetical office, in calling him Rabbi. He confesses his divine nature and mission, in calling him the Son of God. He confesses, "Thou art the king of Israel." If he be the Son of God, he is king of the Israel of God.

(4) Christ hereupon raises the hopes and expectations of Nathanael to something further and greater than all this, v. 50, 51.

[1] He here signifies his acceptance, and (it should seem) his admiration, of the ready faith of Nathanael: Because I said, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? It was a sign that Nathanael's heart was prepared beforehand, else the work had not been done so suddenly.

[2] He promises him much greater helps for the confirmation and increase of his faith.

First, In general: "Thou shalt see greater things than these"; the miracles of Christ, and his resurrection. Those who truly believe the gospel will find its evidences grow upon them. Whatever discoveries Christ is pleased to make of himself here in this world, he hath still greater things than these to make known to them.

Secondly, In particular: "Not thou only, but you, all you my disciples, you shall see heaven opened." Verily, verily I say unto you, which commands both a fixed attention to what is said as very weighty, and a full assent to it as undoubtedly true. None used this word at the beginning of a sentence but Christ, though the Jews often used it at the close of a prayer. It is a solemn asseveration. Now see what it is that Christ assures them of: Hereafter, or ere long, ye shall see heaven opened. The Son of man is a title frequently applied to him in the gospel, but always by himself. Nathanael had called him the Son of God and king of Israel: he calls himself Son of man to express his humility, and to teach his humanity. They are great things which he here foretells: You shall see heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man. It was fulfilled in the many ministrations of the angels to our Lord Jesus, especially that at his ascension, when heaven was opened to receive him, and the angels ascended and descended, and this in the sight of the disciples. Christ's ascension was the great proof of his mission, and much confirmed the faith of his disciples. We may understand it of Christ's miracles. Christ is now beginning a dispensation of miracles. Immediately after this, Christ began to work miracles, ch. ii. 11.

CHAP. II

In this chapter, we have, I. The account of the first miracle which Jesus wrought at Cana of Galilee (ver. 1–11), and his appearing at Capernaum, ver. 12. II. The account of the first passover he kept at Jerusalem after he began his public ministry; his driving the buyers and sellers out of the temple (ver. 13–17); and the sign he gave to those who quarrelled with him for it (ver. 18–22), with an account of some almost believers (ver. 23–25.)

Verses 1–11

We have here the story of Christ's miraculous conversion of water into wine at a marriage in Cana of Galilee. He could have wrought miracles before, but, miracles being designed for the sacred and solemn seals of his doctrine, he began not to work any till he began to preach.

I. The occasion of this miracle. Maimonides observes it to be to the honour of Moses that all the signs he did in the wilderness he did upon necessity; we needed food, he brought us manna, and so did Christ.

1. The time: the third day after he came into Galilee. The evangelist keeps a journal of occurrences. Our Master filled up his time better than his servants do, and never lay down at night complaining that he had lost a day.

2. The place: it was at Cana in Galilee. Christ began to work miracles in an obscure corner of the country. His doctrine and miracles would not be so much opposed by the plain and honest Galileans as they would be at Jerusalem.

3. The occasion itself was a marriage. The mother of Jesus is said to be there. The honour which Christ hereby put upon the ordinance of marriage, that he graced the solemnity of it, not only with his presence, but with his first miracle. There was a marriage, a marriage-feast, to grace the solemnity. Marriages were usually celebrated with festivals.

4. Christ and his mother and disciples were principal guests at this entertainment. The mother of Jesus was there; no mention being made of Joseph, we conclude him dead before this. Jesus was called, and he came, and feasted with them. Christ was to come in a way different from that of John Baptist, who came neither eating nor drinking. There was a marriage, and Jesus was called. It is very desirable, when there is a marriage, to have Jesus Christ present at it; to have the marriage owned and blessed by him: the marriage is then honourable indeed. They that would have Christ with them at their marriage must invite him by prayer; that is the messenger that must be sent to heaven for him; and he will come. And he will turn the water into wine. The disciples also were invited. They had thrown themselves upon his care, and they soon found that, though he had no wealth, he had good friends. Those that follow Christ shall feast with him, they shall fare as he fares. Love to Christ is testified by a love to those that are his.

II. The miracle itself.

1. They wanted wine, v. 3. There was want at a feast; though much was provided, yet all was spent. While we are in this world we sometimes find ourselves in straits, even then when we think ourselves in the fulness of our sufficiency. If always spending, perhaps all is spent ere we are aware. There was want at a marriage feast. It should seem, Christ and his disciples were the occasion of this want, but they who straiten themselves for Christ shall not lose by him.

2. The mother of Jesus solicited him to assist her friends. We are told (v. 3–5) what passed between Christ and his mother.

(1) She acquaints him with the difficulty they were in (v. 3): She saith unto him, They have no wine. Some think that she did not expect from him any miraculous supply (he having as yet wrought no miracle). But, most probably, she looked for a miracle. The bridegroom might have sent out for more wine, but she was for going to the fountain-head. We ought to be concerned for the wants and straits of our friends. In our own and our friends' straits it is our wisdom and duty to apply ourselves to Christ by prayer. In our addresses to Christ, we must not prescribe to him, but humbly spread our case before him.

(2) He gave her a reprimand for it. Here is,

[1] The rebuke itself: Woman, what have I to do with thee? As many as Christ loves, he rebukes and chastens. He calls her woman, not mother. When we begin to be assuming, we should be reminded what we are, men and women, frail, foolish, and corrupt. Now this was intended to be, First, A check to his mother for interposing in a matter which was the act of his Godhead, which had no dependence on her, and which she was not the mother of. The greatest advancements must not make us forget ourselves and our place, nor the familiarity to which the covenant of grace admits us breed contempt, irreverence, or any kind of degree of presumption. Secondly, It was an instruction to others of his relations that they must never expect him to have any regard to his kindred according to the flesh, in his working miracles, who in this matter were no more to him than other people. In the things of God we must not know faces.

[2] The reason of this rebuke: Mine hour is not yet come. For everything Christ did, and that was done to him, he had his hour, the fixed time and the fittest time. "Mine hour for working miracles is not yet come." Yet afterwards he wrought this, before the hour, because he foresaw it would confirm the faith of his infant disciples (v. 11): so that this was an earnest of the many miracles he would work when his hour was come. His mother moved him to help them when the wine began to fail (so it may be read, v. 3), but his hour was not yet come till it was quite spent. This teaches us that man's extremity is God's opportunity. Then his hour is come when we are reduced to the utmost strait, and know not what to do. The delays of mercy are not to be construed the denials of prayer.

(3) Notwithstanding this, she encouraged herself with expectations, that he would help, for she bade the servants observe his orders, v. 5. She took the reproof very submissively, and did not reply to it. It is best not to deserve reproof from Christ, but next best to be meek and quiet under it, and to count it a kindness. She kept her hope in Christ's mercy. When we come to God in Christ for any mercy, two things discourage us: Sense of our own follies and infirmities and fear of our Lord's frowns and rebukes. Afflictions are continued, deliverances delayed, and God seems angry at our prayers. This was the case of the mother of our Lord here, and yet she encourages herself with hope that he will at length give an answer of peace, to teach us to wrestle with God even when he seems in his providence to walk contrary to us. She directed the servants to have an eye to him, and not to make their applications to her. She directed them punctually to observe his orders: "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." Those that expect Christ's favours must with an implicit obedience observe his orders. The way of duty is the way to mercy; and Christ's methods must not be objected against.

(4) Christ did at length miraculously supply them; for he is often better than his word, but never worse.

[1] The miracle itself was turning water into wine; the substance of water acquiring a new form, and having all the accidents and qualities of wine. By this Christ showed himself to be the God of nature, who maketh the earth to bring forth wine. The beginning of Christ's miracles was turning water into wine; the blessing of the gospel turns water into wine. Christ hereby showed that his errand into the world was to heighten and improve creature-comforts to all believers, and make them comforts indeed.

[2] The circumstances of it magnified it and freed it from all suspicion of cheat.

First, It was done in water-pots (v. 6): There were set there six water-pots of stone. 1. For what use these water-pots were intended: for the legal purifications enjoined by the law of God, and many more by the tradition of the elders. They used much water in their washing, for which reason here were six large water-pots provided. It was a saying among them—He who uses much water in washing will gain much wealth in this world. 2. To what use Christ put them; to be the receptacles of the miraculous wine. Thus Christ came to bring in the grace of the gospel, which is as wine, instead of the shadows of the law, which were as water. These were water-pots, that had never been used to have wine in them; and of stone, which is not apt to retain the scent of former liquors, if ever they had had wine in them. They contained two or three firkins apiece; the quantity is uncertain, but very considerable. Christ gives like himself, gives abundantly, according to his riches in glory.

Secondly, The water-pots were filled up to the brim by the servants at Christ's word, v. 7.

Thirdly, The miracle was wrought suddenly, and in such a manner as greatly magnified it.

a. As soon as they had filled the water-pots, he said, Draw out now (v. 8), and it was done. Without any ceremony, in the eye of the spectators. He sits still in his place, says not a word, but wills the thing, and so works it. Christ does great things and marvellous without noise, works manifest changes in a hidden way, without any hesitation or uncertainty in his own breast. With the greatest assurance imaginable, though it was his first miracle, he recommends it to the master of the feast first. As he knew what he would do, so he knew what he could do. All was good, very good, even in the beginning.

b. Our Lord Jesus directed the servants, (a) To draw it out; to be drank. Christ's works are all for use. Has he turned thy water into wine, given thee knowledge and grace? It is to profit withal; and therefore draw out now. Those that would know Christ must make trial of him. (b) To present it to the governor of the feast. Though he was not treated as the Master of the feast, he kindly approved himself a friend to the feast, and, if not its founder, yet its best benefactor. This governor was the monitor of the feast, whose office it was to see that each had enough, and none did exceed, and that there were no indecencies or disorders. Feasts have need of governors, because too many, when they are at feasts, have not the government of themselves. Some think that this governor was priest or Levite that craved a blessing and gave thanks, and Christ would have the cup brought to him, that he might bless it, and bless God for it; for the extraordinary tokens of Christ's presence and power were not to supersede, or jostle out, the ordinary rules and methods of piety and devotion.

Fourthly, The wine which was thus miraculously provided was of the best and richest kind, which was acknowledged by the governor of the feast, v. 9, 10. 1. It was certain that this was wine. The governor knew this when he drank it, though he knew not whence it was; the servants knew whence it was, but had not yet tasted it. 2. That it was the best wine. Christ's works commend themselves even to those that know not their author. The products of miracles were always the best in their kind. This the governor of the feast takes notice of to the bridegroom, with an air of pleasantness, as uncommon. The common method was otherwise. Good wine is brought out to the best advantage at the beginning of a feast, but when they have well drank, good wine is but thrown away upon them, worse will serve then. See the vanity of all the pleasures of sense; they soon surfeit, but never satisfy; the longer they are enjoyed, the less pleasant they grow. Thou hast kept the good wine until now; not knowing to whom they were indebted for this good wine, he returns the thanks of the table to the bridegroom. Christ, in providing thus plentifully for the guests, though he hereby allows a sober cheerful use of wine, especially in times of rejoicing (Neh. viii. 10), yet he does not invalidate his own caution, which is, that our hearts be not at any time, no not at a marriage feast, overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, Luke xxi. 34. Temperance per force is a thankless virtue; but if divine providence gives us abundance of the delights of sense, and divine grace enables us to use them moderately, this is self-denial that is praiseworthy. Two considerations, drawn from this story, may be sufficient at any time to fortify us against temptations to intemperance: First, That our meat and drink are the gifts of God's bounty to us. It is therefore ungrateful and impious to abuse them. Secondly, That, wherever we are, Christ has his eye upon us. He has given us a specimen of the method he takes in dealing with those that deal with him, which is, to reserve the best for the last, and therefore they must deal upon trust. The pleasures of sin give their colour in the cup, but at the last bite; but the pleasures of religion will be pleasures for evermore.

III. In the conclusion of this story (v. 11) we are told, 1. That this was the beginning of miracles which Jesus did. He himself was the greatest miracle of all; but this was the first that was wrought by him. He had power, but there was a time of the hiding of his power. 2. That herein he manifested his glory; hereby he proved himself to be the Son of God. 3. That his disciples believed on him. Those whom he had called (ch. i), now saw this, shared in it, and had their faith strengthened by it. Even the faith that is true is at first but weak. The strongest men were once babes, so were the strongest Christians.

I. The short visit Christ made to Capernaum, v. 12. It is called his own city (Matt. ix. 1), because he made it his headquarters in Galilee, and what little rest he had was there. It was a place of concourse, and therefore Christ chose it, that the fame of his doctrine and miracles might thence spread the further.

1. The company that attended him thither: his mother, his brethren, and his disciples. Wherever Christ went, (1) He would not go alone, but would take those with him who had put themselves under his guidance. (2) He could not go alone, but they would follow him, because they liked the sweetness either of his doctrine or of his wine, ch. vi. 26. His mother, yet followed him; not to intercede with him, but to learn of him. His brethren, who were at the marriage, and his disciples, attended him wherever he went. It should seem, people were more affected with Christ's miracles at first than they were afterwards, when custom made them seem less strange.

2. His continuance there, which was at this time not many days. Christ was still upon the remove, would not confine his usefulness to one place, because many needed him. He did not stay long at Capernaum because the passover was at hand, and he must attend it at Jerusalem.

II. The passover he kept at Jerusalem; it is the first after his baptism. Christ, being made under the law, observed the passover at Jerusalem. He went up to Jerusalem when the passover was at hand, that he might be there with the first. Christ kept the passover at Jerusalem yearly, ever since he was twelve years old, but now that he has entered upon his public ministry we may expect something more from him than before; and two things he did there:

1. He purged the temple, v. 14–17.

(1) The first place we find him in at Jerusalem was the temple, and, it should seem, he did not make any public appearance till he came thither.

(2) The first work we find him at in the temple was the purging of it. He first purged out what was amiss and then taught them to do well. He expects that all who come to him should reform their hearts and lives. And this he has taught us by purging the temple. See here, What were the corruptions that were to be purged out. He found a market in one of the courts of the temple, that which was called the court of the Gentiles. They sold oxen, and sheep, and doves, for sacrifice; not for common use, but for the convenience of those who came out of the country, and could not bring their sacrifices in kind along with them. This market was admitted into the temple by the chief priests, for filthy lucre. Great corruptions in the church owe their rise to the love of money. They changed money, for the convenience of those that were to pay a half-shekel for the service of the tabernacle, and no doubt they got by it. See what course our Lord took to purge out those corruptions. He did not complain to the chief priests, for he knew they countenanced those corruptions. But he himself,

First, Drove out the sheep and oxen, and those that sold them. He never used force to drive any into the temple, but only to drive those out that profaned

it. He made a scourge of small cords, which probably they had led their sheep and oxen with. Sinners prepare the scourges with which they themselves will be driven out from the temple of the Lord.

Secondly, He poured out the changers' money. In pouring out the money, he showed his contempt of it. In overthrowing the tables, he showed his displeasure against those that make religion a matter of worldly gain. Money-changers in the temple are the scandal of it.

Thirdly, He said to them that sold doves (sacrifices for the poor), Take these things hence. The sparrows and swallows were welcome, that were left to God's providence (Ps. lxxxiv. 3), but not the doves, that were appropriated to man's profit. God's temple must not be made a pigeon-house.

Fourthly, He gave them a good reason for what he did: Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise.

a. Here is a reason why they should not profane the temple, because it was the house of God. Merchandise is a good thing in the exchange, but not in the temple. It was sacrilege; it was robbing God. It was to debase that which was solemn and awful, and to make it mean. It was to make the business of religion subservient to a secular interest. Those make God's house a house of merchandise whose minds are filled with cares about the worldly business when they are attending on religious exercises, as those who perform divine offices for filthy lucre.

b. Here is a reason why he was concerned to purge it, because it was his Father's house. Therefore he had authority to purge it, as a Son over his own house. Therefore he had a zeal for the purging of it: "It is my Father's house, and therefore I cannot bear to see it profaned, and him dishonoured." Christ's purging the temple thus may justly be reckoned among his wonderful works. Considering, (a) That he did it without the assistance of any of his friends. (b) That he did it without the resistance of any of his enemies The corruption was too plain to be justified; sinners' own consciences are reformers' best friends; yet that was not all, there was a divine power put forth herein, a power over the spirits of men.

Fifthly, Here is the remark which his disciples made upon it (v. 17): They remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up. One scripture came to their thoughts, which taught them to reconcile this action both with the meekness of the Lamb of God and with the majesty of the King of Israel; for David, speaking of the Messiah, takes notice of his zeal for God's house, as so great that it even ate him up. 1. The disciples came to understand the meaning of what Christ did, by remembering the scriptures: They remembered now that it was written. The word of God and the works of God do mutually explain and illustrate each other. See of what great use it is to the disciples of Christ to be ready and mighty in the scriptures, and to have their memories well stored with scripture truths. 2. The scripture they remembered was very apposite: The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up. All the graces that were to be found among the Old Testament saints were eminently in Christ, and particularly this of zeal for the house of God. Zeal for the house of God forbids us to consult our own credit, ease, and safety, when they come in competition with Christ's service, and sometimes carries on our souls in our duty so far and so fast that our bodies cannot keep pace with them.

2. Christ gave a sign to those who demanded it to prove his authority for so doing.

(1) Their demand of a sign: Then answered the Jews, that is the multitude of the people, with their leaders. When they could object nothing against the thing itself, they questioned his authority to do it: "What sign showest thou unto us." What had he to do to undertake it, who was in no office there? But was not the thing itself sign enough?

(2) Christ's answer to this demand, v. 19. A sign in something to come, the truth of which must appear by the event. The sign that he gives them is his own death and resurrection. He refers them to that which would be. He foretells his death and resurrection, not in plain terms, but in figurative expressions: Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. Thus he spoke in parables to those who were willingly ignorant, that they might not perceive, Matt. xiii. 13, 14. Those that will not see shall not see. Nay, this figurative speech used here proved such a stumbling-block to them that it was produced in evidence against him at his trial, Matt. xxvi. 60, 61. He foretells his death by the Jews' malice, in these words, Destroy you this temple. Christ, even at the beginning of his ministry, had a clear foresight of all his sufferings at the end of it, and yet went on cheerfully in it. He foretells his resurrection by his own power: In three days I will raise it up. There were others that were raised, but Christ raised himself. He chose to express this by destroying and re-edifying the temple. First, Because he was now to justify himself in purging the temple, which they had profaned: "You that defile one temple will destroy another; and I will prove my authority to purge what you have defiled by raising what you will destroy."

(3) "Forty and six years was this temple in building, v. 20. Temple work was always slow work and canst thou make such quick work of it?" They show some knowledge; they could tell how long the temple was in building. They show more ignorance. First, Of the meaning of Christ's words. Secondly, Of the almighty power of Christ, as if he could do no more than another man.

(4) A vindication of Christ's answer from their cavil. He spoke of the temple of his body, v. 21. Some think that when he said, Destroy this temple, he pointed to his own body; however, it is certain that he spoke of the temple of his body. Like the temple it was built by immediate divine direction. Like the temple, it was a holy house; it is called that holy thing. It was, like the temple, the habitation, of God's glory; there the eternal Word dwelt. He is Emmanuel —God with us. Worshippers looked towards that house. So we must worship God with an eye to Christ.

(5) A reflection which the disciples made upon this, long after (v. 22): When he was risen from the dead his disciples remembered that he had said this. The memories of Christ's disciples should be like the treasure of the good householder, furnished with things both new and old, Matt. xiii. 52. They remembered that saying when he was risen from the dead. They laid up the saying in their hearts, and afterwards it became both intelligible and useful. The juniors in years and profession should treasure up those truths of which at present they do not well understand either the meaning or the use, for they will be serviceable to them hereafter. This saying of Christ revived in the memories of his disciples when he was risen from the dead; and why then? Because then the Spirit was poured out to bring things to their remembrance which Christ had said to them. That very day that Christ rose from the dead he opened their understandings, Luke xxiv. 45. Because then this saying of Christ was fulfilled. When the temple of his body had been destroyed and was raised again, and that upon the third day, then they remembered this. See what use they made of it: They believed the scripture, and the word that Jesus had said. They were slow of heart to believe (Luke xxiv. 25), but they were sure. The scripture and the words of Christ are here put together, because they mutually illustrate and strengthen each other.

Verses 23–25

I. Our Lord Jesus, when he was at Jerusalem at the passover, did preach and work miracles. The time was holy time, the feast-day, and Christ took that opportunity of preaching, when the concourse of people was great.

II. Hereby many were brought to believe in his name, to acknowledge him a teacher come from God, as Nicodemus did (ch. iii. 2).

III. Yet Jesus did not commit himself unto them (v. 24): Christ did not see cause to repose any confidence in these new converts at Jerusalem, either, 1. Because they were false, at least some of them. He had more disciples that he could trust among the Galileans than among the dwellers at Jerusalem. Or, 2. Because they were weak. (1) They were timorous, and wanted zeal and courage. In times of difficulty and danger, cowards are not fit to be trusted. Or, (2) They were tumultuous, and wanted discretion and management.

IV. The reason why he did not commit himself to them was because he knew them (v. 25), knew the wickedness of some and the weakness of others. The evangelist takes this occasion to assert Christ's omniscience. He knew all men, not only their names and faces, as it is possible for us to know many, but their nature, dispositions, affections, designs, as we do not know any man, scarcely ourselves. He knows them that are truly his, knows their integrity and knows their infirmity too. He needed not that any should testify of man. His knowledge was not by information from others, but by his own infallible intuition. He knew what was in man. We know what is done by men; Christ knows what is in them. How fit is Christ to be the Saviour of men, very fit to be the physician, who has such a perfect knowledge of the patient's state and case, temper and distemper; knows what is in him! How fit also to be the Judge of all! The Lord comes to his temple, and none come to him but a parcel of weak simple people, that he can neither have credit from nor put confidence in.

CHAP. III

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's discourse with Nicodemus, a Pharisee, ver. 1–21. II. John Baptist's discourse with his disciples concerning Christ (ver. 22–36), in which he fairly and faithfully resigns all his honour and interest to him.

Verses 1–21

We found, in the close of the foregoing chapter, that few were brought to Christ at Jerusalem; yet here was one, a considerable one.

I. Who this Nicodemus was. Not many mighty and noble are called; yet some are, and here was one. Not many of the rulers, or of the Pharisees. This was a man of the Pharisees, bred to learning, a scholar. Let it not be said that all Christ's followers are unlearned and ignorant men. He was a ruler of the Jews, and a member of the great sanhedrim, a man of authority in Jerusalem. Bad as things were, there were some rulers well inclined. Nicodemus continued in his place, and did what he could, when he could not do what he would.

II. His solemn address to our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 2.

1. When he came: He came to Jesus by night, did not think it enough to hear his public discourses. He resolved to talk with him by himself, where he might be free with him. He made this address by night, which may be considered, (1) As an act of prudence and discretion. Christ was engaged all day in public work, and he would not interrupt him then, but observed Christ's hour, and waited on him when he was at leisure. Christ had many enemies, and therefore Nicodemus came to him incognito, lest being known to the chief priests they should be the more enraged against Christ. (2) As an act of zeal. He would rather take time from the diversions of the evening, or the rest of the night, than not converse with Christ. When others were sleeping, he was getting knowledge. He knew not how soon Christ might leave the town, nor what might happen betwixt that and another feast, and therefore would lose no time. In the night his converse with Christ would be more free, and less liable to disturbance. (3) As an act of fear and cowardice. He was afraid, or ashamed, to be seen with Christ, and therefore came in the night. Though he came by night, Christ bade him welcome, accepted his integrity, and pardoned his infirmity, and hereby taught his ministers to encourage good beginnings, though weak. Though now he came by night, yet afterwards he owned Christ publicly, ch. vii. 50; xix. 39. The grace which is at first but a grain of mustard-seed may grow to be a great tree.

2. What he said. He comes immediately to the business; he calls Christ Rabbi, which signifies a great man. There are hopes of those who have a respect for Christ, and think and speak honourably of him. He tells Christ how far he had attained: We know that thou art a teacher. (1) His assertion concerning Christ: Thou art a teacher come from God; supported with divine inspiration and divine authority. He came first to be a teacher; for he would rule by the power of truth, not of the sword. (2) His assurance of it: We know, not only I, but others; so he took it for granted, the thing being so plain and self-evident. (3) The ground of this assurance: No man can do those miracles that thou doest, except God be with him. Here was Nicodemus, a judicious, sensible, inquisitive man, one that had all the reason and opportunity imaginable to examine them, so fully satisfied that they were real miracles that he was wrought upon by them to go contrary to the stream of those of his own rank. We are directed what inference to draw from Christ's miracles: Therefore we are to receive him as a teacher come from God.

III. The discourse between Christ and Nicodemus hereupon, see v. 11, 12. Four things our Saviour here discourses of:

1. Concerning the necessity and nature of regeneration or the new birth, v. 3–8. Now we must consider this,

(1) As pertinently answered to Nicodemus's address. Jesus answered, v. 3. It was not enough for him to admire Christ's miracles, and acknowledge his mission, but he must be born again. It is plain that he expected the kingdom of heaven now shortly to appear. He is betimes aware of the dawning of that day. But Christ tells him that he can have no benefit by that change of the state, unless there be a change of the spirit, equivalent to a new birth. When Nicodemus owned Christ a teacher come from God, he plainly intimated a desire to know what this revelation was, and Christ declares it.

(2) As positively and vehemently asserted by our Lord Jesus: Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God. Observe,

[1] What it is that is required: to be born again. We must live a new life. Birth is the beginning of life; to be born again is to begin anew. We must not think to patch up the old building, but begin from the foundation. We must have a new nature, new principles, new affections, new aims. We must be born ἄνωθεν, which signifies both again, and from above. We must be born anew. Our souls must be fashioned and enlivened anew. We must be born from above. This new birth has its rise from heaven, it is to be born to a divine and heavenly life.

[2] The indispensable necessity of this: "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Except we be born from above, we cannot see this. We cannot understand the nature of it. We cannot receive the comfort of it. Regeneration is absolutely necessary to our happiness here and hereafter. It will appear, in the nature of the thing, that we must be born again, because it is impossible that we should be happy if we be not holy.

This great truth of the necessity of regeneration being thus solemnly laid down, a. It is objected against by Nicodemus (v. 4): How can a man be born when he is old? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born? Herein appears, (a) His weakness in knowledge; what Christ spoke spiritually he seems to have understood after a corporal and carnal manner, as if there was such a connection between the soul and the body that there could be no fashioning the heart anew but by forming the bones anew. It is a great surprise to him to hear of being born again. Could he be better bred and born than bred and born an Israelite. They that are proud of their first birth are hardly brought to a new birth. (b) His willingness to be taught. He does not turn his back upon Christ because of his hard saying, but ingenuously acknowledges his ignorance. "Lord, make me to understand this, for it is a riddle to me; I am such a fool as to know no other way for a man to be born than of his mother." When we meet with that in the things of God which is dark, and hard to be understood, we must continue our attendance upon the means of knowledge.

b. It is opened and further explained by our Lord Jesus, v. 5–8. From the objection he takes occasion to repeat and confirm what he had said (v. 5): "Verily, verily I say unto thee, the very same that I said before." Though Nicodemus understood not the mystery of regeneration, yet Christ asserts the necessity of it as positively as before. It is folly to think of evading the obligation of evangelical precepts, by pleading that they are unintelligible. To expound and clear what he had said he further shows,

(a) The author of this blessed change, and who it is that works it. To be born again is to be born of the Spirit, v. 5–8. The change is not wrought by any wisdom or power of our own, but by the power and influence of the blessed Spirit of grace.

(b) The nature of this change, and what that is which is wrought; it is spirit, v. 6. Those that are regenerated are made spiritual. The dictates and interests of the rational and immortal soul have retrieved the dominion they ought to have over the flesh.

(c) The necessity of this change. Christ here shows that it is necessary in the nature of the thing: That which is born of the flesh is flesh, v. 6. 1. We are here told what we are: We are flesh. The soul is still a spiritual substance, but so wedded to the flesh, so captivated by the will of the flesh, that it is justly called flesh. And what communion can there be between God, who is a spirit, and a soul in this condition? 2. How we came to be so; by being born of the flesh. It is a corruption that is bred in the bone with us. The corrupt nature, which is flesh, takes rise from our first birth; and therefore the new nature, which is spirit, must take rise from a second birth. Nicodemus spoke of entering again into his mother's womb, and being born; but, if he could do so, to what purpose? If he were born of his mother a hundred times, that would not mend the matter, for still that which is born of the flesh is flesh. Corruption and sin are woven into our nature; we are shapen in iniquity. It is not enough to put on a new coat or a new face, but we must put on the new man. Christ makes it further necessary, by his own word: Marvel not that I said unto thee, You must be born again, v. 7. Christ hath said it. He who is the great Physician of souls, knows their case, and what is necessary to their cure,—he hath said, You must be born again. We are not to marvel at it; for when we consider the holiness of the God with whom we have to do, the depravity of our nature, we shall not think it strange that so much stress is laid upon this as the one thing needful, that we must be born again.

(d) This change is illustrated by two comparisons. First, The regenerating work of the Spirit is compared to water, v. 5. To be born again is to be born of water and of the Spirit. That which is primarily intended here is to show that the Spirit, in sanctifying a soul, (1) Cleanses and purifies it as water, takes away its filth. (2) Cools and refreshes it, as water does the hunted hart and the weary traveller. It is probable that Christ had an eye to the ordinance of baptism, which John had used and he himself had begun to use, "You must be born again of the Spirit," which regeneration by the Spirit should be signified by washing with water, as the visible sign of that spiritual grace. Secondly, It is compared to wind: The wind bloweth where it listeth, so is every one that is born of the Spirit, v. 8. The same word signifies both the wind and the Spirit. The Spirit, in regeneration, works arbitrarily, and as a free agent. The Spirit dispenses his influences where, and when, on whom, and in what measure and degrees, he pleases. He works powerfully, and with evident effects: Thou hearest the sound thereof: though its causes are hidden, its effects are manifest. He works mysteriously, and in secret hidden ways. Thou canst not tell whence it comes, nor whither it goes. How it gathers and how it spends its strength is a riddle to us; so the manner and methods of the Spirit's working are a mystery.

2. The certainty and sublimity of gospel truths.

(1) The objection which Nicodemus still made (v. 9): How can these things be? Christ's explication of the doctrine of the necessity of regeneration, it should seem, made it never the clearer to him. The corruption of nature which makes it necessary, and the way of the Spirit which makes it practicable, are as much mysteries to him as the thing itself. Thus many will neither believe the truths of Christianity nor submit to the laws of it further than they please. Christ shall be their teacher, provided they may choose their lesson. Nicodemus owns himself ignorant of Christ's meaning, after all: "How can these things be? They are things I do not understand, my capacity will not reach them." Because this doctrine was unintelligible to him he questions the truth of it. Many think that that cannot be proved which they cannot believe.

(2) The reproof which Christ gave him for his dullness and ignorance: "Art thou a master in Israel, and yet not only unacquainted with the doctrine of regeneration, but incapable of understanding it?" This word is a reproof, [1] To those who undertake to teach others and yet are ignorant and unskilful in the world of righteousness themselves. [2] To those that spend their time in notions and ceremonies in religion, niceties and criticisms in the scripture, and neglect that which is practical. Two words in the reproof are very emphatic: First, The place where his lot was cast: in Israel, where divine revelation was. He might have learned this out of the Old Testament. Secondly, The things he was thus ignorant in: these things, these necessary things, these great things, these divine things.

(3) Christ's discourse, hereupon, of the certainty and sublimity of gospel truths (v. 11–13). Observe here,

[1] That the truths Christ taught were very certain and what we may venture upon (v. 11): We speak that we do know. The truths of Christ are of undoubted certainty. We have all the reason in the world to be assured that the sayings of Christ are faithful sayings, and such as we may venture our souls upon. Whatever Christ spoke, he spoke of his own knowledge. The things are thus sure, thus clear; and yet you receive not our witness.

[2] The truths Christ taught, though communicated in language and expressions borrowed from common and earthly things, yet were most sublime and heavenly; this is intimated, v. 12: "I have told them earthly things, that is, have told them the great things of God in similitudes taken from earthly things, to make them the more easy and intelligible, as that of the new birth and the wind, and lisped to you in your own language, and cannot make you to understand my doctrine. If such familiar expressions be stumbling-blocks, what would abstract ideas be, and spiritual things painted proper?" The things of the gospel are heavenly things, out of the road of the enquiries of human reason, and much more out of the reach of its discoveries. He considers our frame, that we are of the earth, and our place, that we are on the earth, and therefore speaks to us earthly things, and makes things sensible the vehicle of things spiritual, to make them the more easy and familiar to us. Earthly things are despised because they are vulgar, and heavenly things because they are abstruse; and so, whatever method is taken, still some fault or other is found with it.

[3] Our Lord Jesus, and he alone, was fit to reveal to us a doctrine thus certain, thus sublime: No man hath ascended up into heaven but he, v. 13. None but Christ was able to reveal to us the will of God for our salvation. Nicodemus addressed Christ as a prophet; but he must know that he is greater than all the Old Testament prophets, for none of them had ascended into heaven. No man hath attained to the certain knowledge of God and heavenly things as Christ has. It is not for us to send to heaven for instructions; we must wait to receive what instructions Heaven will send to us. Jesus Christ is able to reveal the will of God to us; for it is he that came down from heaven and is in heaven. He had said (v. 12), How shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things? He gives them an instance of those heavenly things when he tells them of one that came down from heaven, and yet is the Son of man. If the regeneration of the soul of man is such a mystery, what then is the incarnation of the Son of God? We have here an intimation of Christ's two distinct natures in one person. He gives them a proof of his ability to speak to them heavenly things by telling them, (1) That he came down from heaven. The intercourse settled between God and man began above. We love him, and send to him, because he first loved us, and sent to us. Now this intimates, [1] Christ's divine nature. [2] His intimate acquaintance with the divine counsels. [3] The manifestation of God. The New Testament shows us God coming down from heaven, to teach and save us. Herein he commended his love. (2) That he is the Son of man, by which the Jews always understand to be meant the Messiah. (3) That he is in heaven. Now at this time, when he is talking with Nicodemus on earth, yet, as God, he is in heaven.

3. Christ here discourses of the great design of his own coming into the world, and the happiness of those that believe in him, v. 14–18. Here we have the very marrow and quintessence of the whole gospel, that Jesus Christ came to seek and to save the children of men from death, and recover them to life. This saving here is opposed to condemning, v. 16–18.

(1) Jesus Christ came to save us by healing us, as the children of Israel that were stung with fiery serpents were cured and lived by looking up to the brazen serpent.

First, The deadly and destructive nature of sin, which is implied here. The guilt of sin is like the pain of the biting of a fiery serpent; the power of corruption is like the venom diffused thereby. The curses of the law are as fiery serpents, so are all the tokens of divine wrath.

Secondly, The powerful remedy provided against this fatal malady. The case of poor sinners is deplorable; but is it desperate? Thanks be to God, it is not. The Son of man is lifted up, as the serpent of brass was by Moses. It was a serpent of brass that cured them. It was made in the shape of a fiery serpent, and yet had no poison, no sting, fitly representing Christ; as harmless as a serpent of brass. It was lifted up upon a pole, and so must the Son of man be lifted up. Christ is lifted up, [1] In his crucifixion. He was lifted up upon the cross. His death is called his being lifted up, ch. xii. 32, 33. [2] In his exaltation. He was lifted up to the Father's right hand. He was lifted up to the cross, to be further lifted up to the crown. [3] In the publishing and preaching of his everlasting gospel. Being thus lifted up, it was appointed for the cure. He that sent the plague provided the remedy. It was God himself that found the ransom. He whom we have offended is our peace.

Thirdly, The way of applying this remedy, and that is by believing. Everyone that looked up to it did well, Num. xxi. 9. He hath said, Look, and be saved (Isa. xlv. 22), look and live.

Fourthly, The great encouragements given us by faith to look up to him. a. It was for this end that he was lifted up, that his followers might be saved. b. The offer that is made of salvation by him is general, whosoever believes without exception. c. The salvation offered is complete. They shall not perish. They shall have eternal life.

(2) Jesus Christ came to save us by pardoning us, v. 16, 17. Here is gospel indeed, good news, the best that ever came from heaven to earth.

First, Here is God's love, in giving his Son for the world (v. 16). [1]. The great gospel mystery revealed: God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son. a. Jesus Christ is the only-begotten Son of God. Now know we that he loves us, when he has given his only-begotten Son for us. b. In order to the redemption and salvation of man, it pleased God to give his only-begotten Son. He gave him, that is, he gave him up to suffer and die for us. His enemies could not have taken him if his Father had not given him. c. Herein God has commended his love to the world; God so loved the world, so really, so richly. Behold, and wonder, that the great God should love such a worthless world; that the holy God should love such a wicked world. The Jews vainly conceited that the Messiah should be sent only in love to their nation; but Christ tells them that he came in love to the whole world, Gentiles as well as Jews. Through him there is a general offer of life and salvation made to all. So far God loved the world that he sent his Son with this fair proposal, that whosoever believes in him shall not perish. Salvation has been of the Jews, but now Christ is known as salvation to the ends of the earth. [2]. Here is the great gospel duty, and that is to believe in Jesus Christ. [3]. Here is the great gospel benefit: That whosoever believes in Christ shall not perish. God has taken away their sin, they shall not die; a pardon is purchased. They are entitled to the joys of heaven: they shall have everlasting life.

Secondly, Here is God's design in sending his Son into the world: it was that the world through him might be saved. He came into the world with salvation in his eye, with salvation in his hand (v. 17): God sent his Son into the world; sent him as his agent or ambassador, as resident. We are concerned to enquire on what errand he comes: Is it peace? And this scripture returns the answer, Peaceably. He did not come to condemn the world. We had reason enough to expect that he should, for it is a guilty world; it is convicted. Justly may such a world as this be condemned. He came with full powers indeed to execute judgment (ch. v. 22, 27), but did not begin with a judgment of condemnation, but put us upon a new trial before a throne of grace. He came that the world through him might be saved. God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, and so saving it. This is good news to a convinced conscience, healing to broken bones and bleeding wounds, that Christ, our judge, came not to condemn, but to save.

(3) From all this is inferred the happiness of true believers: He that believeth on him is not condemned, v. 18. This denotes more than a reprieve; he is not condemned, that is, he is acquitted; and if he be not condemned he is discharged. Who is he that condemns? It is Christ that died. The cross perhaps lies heavy upon him, but he is saved from the curse: condemned by the world, it may be, but not condemned with the world, Rom. viii. 1.

4. The deplorable condition of those that persist in unbelief and wilful ignorance, v. 18–21.

(1) Read here the doom of those that will not believe in Christ: they are condemned already. [1] How great the sin of unbelievers is. They believe not in the name of the only-begotten Son of God, who is infinitely true, and deserves to be believed, infinitely good, and deserves to be embraced. God sent one to save us that was dearest to himself; and shall not he be dearest to us? [2] How great the misery of unbelievers is: they are condemned already. A certain condemnation. A present condemnation. They are condemned already, for their own hearts condemn them. A condemnation grounded upon their former guilt. He is condemned already, because he has not believed. Unbelief is a sin against the remedy.

(2) Read also the doom of those that would not so much as know him, v. 19. And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and they loved darkness rather. The gospel is light, and, when the gospel came, light came into the world. Light is self-evidencing, so is the gospel; it proves its own divine origin. Light is discovering, and truly the light is sweet. A dark place indeed the world would be without it. It is the unspeakable folly of the most of men that they loved darkness rather than this light. Sinners that were wedded to their lusts loved their ignorance and mistakes rather than the truths of Christ. Wretched man is in love with his sickness, in love with his slavery, and will not be made free, will not be made whole. The true reason why men love darkness rather than light is because their deeds are evil. Their case is sad, and, because they are resolved that they will not mend it, they are resolved that they will not see it. Wilful ignorance is so far from excusing sin that it will be found to aggravate the condemnation: This is the condemnation, that they shut their eyes against the light, and will not so much as admit a parley with Christ and his gospel. We must account in the judgment not only for the knowledge we sinned against, but for the knowledge we sinned away. It is a common observation that everyone that doeth evil hateth the light, v. 20. Evil-doers seek concealment, out of a sense of shame and fear of punishment. They come not to this light, but keep as far off it as they can, lest their deeds should be reproved. The light of the gospel is sent into the world to reprove the evil deeds of sinners; to show people their transgressions, to show that to be sin which was not thought to be so, that sin by the new commandment might appear exceeding sinful. The gospel has its convictions, to make way for its consolations. It is for this reason that evil-doers hate the light of the gospel. There were those who had done evil and were sorry for it, who bade this light welcome, as the publicans and harlots. But he that does evil, and resolves to go on in it, hateth the light. Christ is hated because sin is loved. They who do not come to the light thereby evidence a secret hatred of the light. On the other hand, upright hearts bid this light welcome (v. 21): He that doeth truth cometh to the light. As it convinces and terrifies evil-doers, so it confirms and comforts those that walk in their integrity. The character of a good man. He is one that doeth truth. Though sometimes he comes short of doing good, the good he would do, yet he doeth truth, he aims honestly; he has his infirmities, but holds fast his integrity. He is one that cometh to the light. He that doeth truth is willing to know the truth by himself, and to have his deeds made manifest. He is solicitous to know what the will of God is, and resolves to do it, though ever so contrary to his own will and interest. Here is the character of a good work: it is wrought in God. Our works are then good, when the will of God is the rule of them and the glory of God the end of them; when they are done in his strength and for his sake. Nicodemus, though he was puzzled at first, yet afterwards became a faithful disciple of Christ.

Verses 22–36

I. Christ's removal into the land of Judæa (v. 22). Our Lord Jesus, after he entered upon his public work, travelled much, and removed often. Many a weary step he took to do good to souls. The Sun of righteousness took a large circuit to diffuse his light and heat, Ps. xix. 6. He was not wont to stay long at Jerusalem. After these things, after he had had this discourse with Nicodemus, he came into the land of Judæa; not so much for greater privacy as for greater usefulness. His preaching and miracles, perhaps, made most noise at Jerusalem, the fountain-head of news, but did least good there. When he came into the land of Judæa his disciples came with him. There he tarried with them. Those that are ready to go with Christ shall find him as ready to stay with them. There he baptized. John began to baptize in the land of Judæa (Matt. iii. 1), therefore Christ began there. He himself baptized not, with his own hand, but his disciples by his orders and directions, as appears, ch. iv. 2. Holy ordinances are Christ's, though administered by weak men.

II. John's continuance in his work, as long as his opportunities lasted, v. 23, 24. Here we are told,

1. That John was baptizing. Christ's baptism, was, for substance, the same with John's, and therefore they did not at all clash or interfere with one another. (1) Christ began the work of preaching and baptizing before John laid it down, so the wheels might be kept going. It is a comfort to useful men, when they are going off the stage, to see those rising up who are likely to fill up their place. (2) John continued the work of preaching and baptizing though Christ had taken it up. There was still work for John to do, for Christ was not yet generally known, nor were the minds of people thoroughly prepared for him by repentance. He goes on with his work, till Providence lays him aside. The greater gifts of some do not render the labours of others, that come short of them, needless and useless; there is work enough for all hands. They are sullen that will sit down and do nothing when they see themselves outshone.

2. That he baptized in Ænon near Salim, places we find nowhere else mentioned. Wherever it was, it seems that John removed from place to place. Ministers must follow their opportunities. He chose a place where there was much water, that is, many streams of water; so that wherever he met with any that were willing to submit to his baptism water was at hand to baptize.

3. That thither people came to him and were baptized. Some refer this both to John and to Jesus:

some came to John, some to Jesus, and, as their baptism was one, so were their hearts.

4. It is noted (v. 24) that John was not yet cast into prison. John never desisted from his work as long as he had his liberty.

III. A contest between John's disciples and the Jews about purifying, v. 25. 1. Who were the disputants: some of John's disciples, and the Jews who had not submitted to his baptism of repentance. Penitents and impenitents divide this sinful world. 2. What was the matter in dispute: about purifying, about religious washing. We may suppose that John's disciples cried up his baptism, his purifying, and gave the preference to that as perfecting and superseding all the purifications of the Jews, and they were in the right. No doubt the Jews with as much assurance applauded the purifyings that were in use among them. It is very likely that the Jews in this dispute, when they could not deny the excellent nature and design of John's baptism, raised an objection against it from Christ's baptism, which gave occasion for the complaint that follows here (v. 26). Thus objections are made against the gospel from the advancement and improvement of gospel light, as if childhood and manhood were contrary to each other, and the superstructure were against the foundation.

IV. A complaint which John's disciples made to their master concerning Christ and his baptizing, v. 26. They come to their master, and tell him, "Rabbi, he that was with thee; he baptizeth, and all men come to him." They suggest that Christ's setting up a baptism of his own was a piece of presumption, as if John, having first set up this rite of baptizing, must have, as it were, a patent for the invention: "He that was with thee beyond Jordan, behold, the same, baptizes." They suggest that it was a piece of ingratitude to John. He to whom thou barest witness baptizes; as if Jesus owed all his reputation to the honourable character John gave of him. But Christ needed not John's testimony, ch. v. 36. He reflected more honour upon John than he received from him. John was just to Christ, in bearing witness to him; and Christ's answering his testimony did rather enrich than impoverish John's ministry. They conclude that it would be a total eclipse to John's baptism: "All men come to him." Aiming at the monopoly of honour and respect has been in all ages the bane of the church, and the shame of its members and ministers. We mistake if we think that the excelling gifts and graces, and labours and usefulness, of one, are a diminution and disparagement to another that has obtained mercy to be faithful. We must leave it to God to choose, employ, and honour his own instruments as he pleaseth.

V. Here is John's answer, v. 27, &c. It was no disturbance to him, but what he wished for. He therefore checked the complaint, and took this occasion to confirm the testimonies he had formerly borne to Christ as superior to him.

1. John here abases himself in comparison with Christ, v. 27–30.

(1) John acquiesces in the divine disposal (v. 27): A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven. Different employments are according to the direction of divine Providence, different endowments according to the distribution of the divine grace. We should not envy those that have a larger share of gifts than we have, or move in a larger sphere of usefulness. John reminds his disciples that Jesus would not have thus excelled him except he had received it from heaven, and, if God gave him the Spirit without measure (v. 34), shall they grudge at it? We should not be discontented, though we be inferior to others in gifts and usefulness, and be eclipsed by their excellencies. John was ready to own that it was God that gave him the interest he had in the love and esteem of the people; and, if now his interest decline, God's will be done! When he has fulfilled his ministry, he can contentedly see it go out of date.

(2) John appeals to the testimony he had formerly given concerning Christ (v. 28). I said, again and again, I am not the Christ, but I am sent before him. Neither the frowns of the chief priests, nor the flatteries of his own disciples, could make him change his note. Now this serves here, [1] As a conviction to his disciples of the unreasonableness of their complaint. "Now," saith John, "do you not remember what the testimony was that I did bear? Did I not say, I am not the Christ? Did I not say, I am sent before him? Why then does it seem strange to you that I should stand by and give way to him?" [2] As a comfort to himself that he had never given his disciples any occasions thus to set him up in competition with Christ; but, on the contrary, had particularly cautioned them against this mistake. John had not only not encouraged them to hope that he was the Messiah, but had plainly told them the contrary. It is a common excuse for those who have undue honour paid them—If the people will be deceived, let them; but that is an ill maxim for those to go by whose business it is to undeceive people.

(3) John professes the great satisfaction he had in the advancement of Christ, he rejoiced in it. This he expresses (v. 29) by an elegant similitude. He compares our Saviour to the bridegroom: "He that hath the bride is the bridegroom. Do all men come to him? It is his right." As far as particular souls are devoted to him in faith and love, so far the bridegroom has the bride. He compares himself to the friend of the bridegroom, assists him in prosecuting the match, speaks a good word for him, rejoices most of all when he has the bride. The friend of the bridegroom stands, and hears him; rejoices with joy because of the bridegroom's voice. Faithful ministers are friends of the bridegroom, to recommend him to the children of men; to bring letters and messages from him, for he courts by proxy. The friends of the bridegroom must stand, and hear the bridegroom's voice; must receive instructions from him, and attend his orders. The espousing of souls to Jesus Christ, in faith and love, is the fulfilling of the joy of every good minister. Surely they have no greater joy.

(4) He owns it highly fit and necessary that the reputation and interest of Christ should be advanced, and his own diminished (v. 30): He must increase, but I must decrease. John speaks of Christ's increase and his own decrease as highly just and agreeable, and affording him entire satisfaction. He was well pleased to see the kingdom of Christ getting ground: "He must increase." The kingdom of Christ is, and will be, a growing kingdom, like the light of the morning, like the grain of mustard-seed. He was not at all displeased that the effect of this was the diminishing of his own interest: I must decrease. The shining forth of the glory of Christ eclipses the lustre of all other glory. As the light of the morning increases, that of the morning star decreases. We must cheerfully be content to be anything, to be nothing, so that Christ may be all.

2. John Baptist here advances Christ, and instructs his disciples concerning him.

(1) Concerning the dignity of Christ's person (v. 31): He that cometh from above is above all. He supposes his divine origin, that he came from above, from heaven. None but he that came from heaven was fit to show us the will of heaven, or the way to heaven. Hence he infers his sovereign authority: he is above all, above all things and all persons. When we come to speak of the honours of the Lord Jesus, we can say but this, He is above all. This he further illustrates by the meanness of those who stood in competition with him: He that is of the earth, is earthly, has his converse with earthly things, and his concern is for them. The prophets and apostles were of the same mould with other men; they were but earthen vessels, though they had a rich treasure lodged in them.

(2) Concerning the excellency and certainty of his doctrine. He, for his part, spoke of the earth, and so do all those that are of the earth. The prophets were men; of themselves they could not speak but of the earth. The preaching of the prophets and of John was but low and flat compared with Christ's preaching; as heaven is high above the earth, so were his thoughts above theirs. But he that cometh from heaven is above all the prophets that ever lived on earth. The doctrine of Christ is here recommended to us,

First, As infallibly sure and certain, and to be entertained accordingly (v. 32): What he hath seen and heard, that he testifieth. 1. Christ's divine knowledge; he testified nothing but what he had seen and heard. What he discovered of the divine nature was what he had seen; what he revealed of the mind of God was what he had heard immediately from him. The prophets testified what was made known to them in dreams and visions, but not what they had seen and heard. The gospel of Christ is not a doubtful opinion, like an hypothesis or new notion in philosophy, but it is a revelation of the mind of God, which is of eternal truth in itself. 2. His divine grace and goodness. Christ's preaching is here called his testifying, to denote, (1) The convincing evidence of it; it was not reported as news by hearsay, but it was testified as evidence given in court. (2) The affectionate earnestness of the delivery of it.

From the certainty of Christ's doctrine, John takes occasion, to lament the infidelity of the most of men. They receive it not, they will not hear it, or give credit to it. This he speaks of not only as a matter of wonder but as a matter of grief; John's disciples grieved that all men came to Christ (v. 26); they thought his followers too many. But John grieves that no man came to him; he thought them too few. The unbelief of sinners is the grief of saints. He takes occasion to commend the faith of the chosen remnant (v. 33): He that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true. God is true, though we do not set our seal to it; his truth needs not our faith to support it, but by faith we do ourselves the honour and justice to subscribe to his truth. God's promises are all yea and amen; by faith we put our amen to them. By believing in Christ we set to our seal that God is true to all the promises which he has made concerning Christ. That he is true to all the promises he has made in Christ. Being satisfied that he is true, we are willing to deal with him upon trust.

Secondly, It is recommended to us as a divine doctrine (v. 34): For he whom God hath sent speaketh the word of God, for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him. 1. He spoke the words of God. Both substance and language were divine. He proved himself sent of God (ch. iii. 2), and therefore his words are to be received as the words of God. 2. He spoke as no other prophet did; for God giveth not the Spirit by measure to him. The Old Testament prophets had the Spirit, and in different degrees. But, whereas God gave them the Spirit by measure, he gave him to Christ without measure. The Spirit was not in Christ as in a vessel, but as in a fountain, as in a bottomless ocean.

(3) Concerning the power and authority he is invested with. He is the beloved Son of the Father (v. 35): The Father loveth the Son. The prophets were faithful as servants, but Christ as a Son. He continued his love to him even in his estate of humiliation, loved him never the less for his poverty, and sufferings. He is Lord of all. The Father hath given all things into his hand. Love is generous. Having given him the Spirit without measure, he gave him all things. All power; so it is explained, Matt. xxviii. 18. He has power over all flesh, the heathen given him for his inheritance. Both the golden sceptre and the iron rod are given into his hand. All grace is given into his hand as the channel of conveyance. We are unworthy that the Father should give those things into our hands. The things he intended for us he gives into his hands, who is worthy. They are given into his hands, by him to be given into ours. The riches of the new covenant are deposited in so sure, so kind, so good a hand, the hand of him that purchased them for us.

He is the object of that faith which is made the great condition of eternal happiness: He that believeth on the Son, hath life, v. 36. It is the conclusion of the whole matter. As God offers and conveys good things to us by the testimony of Jesus Christ, so we receive and partake of those favours by believing the testimony. This way of receiving fitly answers that way of giving. We have here the sum of that gospel which is to be preached to every creature. Here is,

First, The blessed state of all true Christians: He that believes on the Son hath everlasting life. Not only believes him, that what he saith is true, but believes on him, and confides in him. The benefit of true Christianity is no less than everlasting life. True believers, even now, have everlasting life; not only they shall have it hereafter, but they have it now. They have the Son of God, and in him they have life. Grace is glory begun.

Secondly, The wretched and miserable condition of unbelievers: He that believeth not the Son is undone. The word includes both incredulity and disobedience. They cannot be happy in this world, nor that to come: He shall not see life, that life which Christ came to bestow. They cannot but be miserable: The wrath of God abides upon an unbeliever.

CHAP. IV

We have Christ, I. Departing out of Judæa, ver. 1–3. II. Passing through Samaria. 1. His coming into Samaria, ver. 4–6. 2 His discourse with the Samaritan woman at a well, ver. 7–26. 3. The notice which the woman gave of him to the city, ver. 27–30. 4. Christ's talk with his disciples in the meantime, ver. 31–38. 5. The good effect of this among the Samaritans, ver. 39–42. III. For some time in Galilee (ver. 43–46), and his curing a nobleman's son there, ver. 46–54.

Verses 1–3

Now he left Judæa four months before harvest (v. 35).

I. He made disciples. His ministry was successful, notwithstanding the opposition it met with. It is Christ's prerogative to make disciples, to form and fashion them to his will. The Christian is made such, not born such.

II. He baptized those whom he made disciples; not himself, but by the ministry of his disciples, v. 2. Because he would put a difference between his baptism and that of John, who baptized all himself, He would put honour upon his disciples, and so train them up to further services. He would teach us that what is done by his ministers, according to his direction, he owns as done by himself.

III. He made and baptized more disciples than John. Christ's converse was more winning than John's.

IV. The Pharisees were informed of this. When the Pharisees thought they had got rid of John, Jesus appears. That which grieved them was that Christ made so many disciples. The success of the gospel exasperates its enemies.

V. Our Lord Jesus knew very well what informations were given in against him. None can dig so deep as to hide their counsels from the Lord.

VI. Hereupon our Lord Jesus left Judæa and departed again to go to Galilee. He left Judæa, because he was likely to be persecuted there even to the death. Christ quitted the country, and went where what he did would be less provoking than just under their eye. His hour was not yet come. He had not finished his testimony, and therefore would not surrender or expose himself. The disciples he had gathered in Judæa were not able to bear hardships, and therefore he would not expose them. Hereby he gave an example to his own rule: When they persecute you in one city, flee to another. We are not called to suffer, while we may avoid it without sin; and therefore we may change our place. He departed into Galilee, because he had work to do there, and many friends and fewer enemies.

Verses 4–26

We have here an account of the good Christ did in Samaria. The Samaritans, both in blood and religion, were mongrel Jews. They worshipped the God of Israel only, to whom they erected a temple on mount Gerizim. The Samaritans would not admit Christ, when they saw he was going to Jerusalem (Luke ix. 53); the Jews thought they could not give him a worse name than to say, He is a Samaritan.

1. Christ's coming into Samaria. He charges his disciples not to enter into any city of the Samaritans (Matt. x. 5), nor did he here preach publicly, or work any miracle, his eye being to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. What kindness he here did them was only a crumb of the children's bread that casually fell from the master's table.

1. His road from Judæa to Galilee lay through the country of Samaria (v. 4): He must needs go through Samaria. There was no other way, unless he would have fetched a compass on the other side Jordan, a great way about. We should not go into places of temptation but when we needs must; and then we should not reside in them, but hasten through them. It was happy for Samaria that it lay in Christ's way.
2. His baiting place happened to be at a city of Samaria. The place is described. It was called Sychar; probably the same with Sichem, or Shechem. Shechem yielded the first proselyte that ever came into the church of Israel (Gen. xxxiv. 24), and now it is the first place where the gospel is preached out of the commonwealth of Israel. Abimelech was made king here; it was Jeroboam's royal seat; but the evangelist takes notice of Jacob's interest there, which was more its honour than its crowned heads. Here lay Jacob's ground, the parcel of ground which Jacob gave to his son Joseph. Here was Jacob's well. Being wearied with his journey, he sat thus on the well. We have here our Lord Jesus labouring under the common fatigue of travellers. He was wearied with his journey. Because it was the sixth hour, the time of the heat of the day, therefore he was weary. He was a true man, and subject to the common infirmities of the human nature. He was a poor man, else he might have travelled on horseback or in a chariot. When we are carried easily, let us think on the weariness of our Master. It should seem that he was not of a robust constitution; it should seem, his disciples were not tired, for they went into the town without any difficulty. Bodies of the finest mould are most sensible of fatigue, and can worst bear it. We have him here betaking himself to the common relief of travellers: Being wearied, he sat thus on the well. He sat thus, in an uneasy posture.

II. His discourse with a Samaritan woman. This discourse is reducible to four heads:

1. They discourse concerning the water, v. 7–15.

(1) Notice is taken of the circumstances that gave occasion to this discourse. There comes a woman of Samaria to draw water. She had no servant to be a drawer of water; she would do it herself. See here, How the divine Providence brings about glorious purposes by events which seem to us fortuitous and accidental. His disciples were gone away into the city to buy meat. Christ did not go into the city to eat, but sent his disciples to fetch his meat thither; not because he scrupled eating in a Samaritan city, but, [1] Because he had a good work to do at that well. [2] Because it was more private and retired, more cheap and homely, to have his dinner brought him thither, than to go into the town for it. Christ could eat his dinner as well upon a draw well as in the best inn in the town. He often preached to multitudes yet here he condescends to teach a single person, a woman, a poor woman, a stranger, a Samaritan, to teach his ministers to do likewise, as those that know what a glorious achievement it is to help to save, though but one soul, from death.

(2) Let us observe the particulars of this discourse. Jesus begins with a modest request for a draught of water: Give me to drink. He that for our sakes became poor here becomes a beggar. Christ asked for it because he would draw on further discourse with her. Christ is still begging in his poor members, and a cup of cold water, given to them in his name, shall not lose its reward. The woman quarrels with him because he did not carry on the humour of his own nation (v. 9): How is it? Observe, First, What a mortal feud there was between the Jews and the Samaritans: The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans. Quarrels about religion are usually the most implacable of all quarrels. They plainly show that however their religion may be true they are not truly religious. Secondly, How ready the woman was to upbraid Christ with the haughtiness and ill nature of the Jewish nation: How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me? Moderate men of all sides are men wondered at. Two things this woman wonders at: That he should ask this kindness; for it was the pride of the Jews that they would endure any hardship rather than be beholden to a Samaritan. We must, like our Master, put on goodness and kindness, though it should be ever so much the genius of our country, or the humour of our party, to be morose and ill-natured. This woman expected that Christ should be as other Jews were. No rule but has some exceptions. She wonders that he should expect to receive this kindness from her that was a Samaritan. Christ takes this occasion to instruct her in divine things: If thou knewest the gift of God, thou wouldst have asked, v. 10. He waives her objection of the feud between the Jews and Samaritans. Some differences are best healed by avoiding all occasions of entering into dispute about them. Christ will convert this woman, showing her her need of a Saviour. He fills her with an apprehension that she had now an opportunity of gaining that which would be of unspeakable advantage to her. Christ tells her expressly that she had now a season of grace.

[1] He hints to her what she should know, but was ignorant of: If thou knewest the gift of God, who it is that saith, Give me to drink. She saw him to be a Jew, a poor weary traveller; but he would have her know something more concerning him. Jesus Christ is the gift of God, the richest token of God's love to us. It is an unspeakable privilege to have this gift of God proposed and offered to us. It is he that saith, Give me to drink; this gift comes begging to thee.

[2] He hopes concerning her, what she would have done if she had known him: Thou wouldst have asked. Those that would have any benefit by Christ must ask for it. Those that have a right knowledge of Christ will seek to him. Christ knows what they that want the means of knowledge would have done if they had had them.

[3] He assures her what he would have done for her if she had applied to him: "He would have given thee living water." By this living water is meant the Spirit, who is not like the water in the bottom of the well, but like living or running water. The Spirit of grace is as living water. Jesus Christ can and will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him. The woman cavils at the gracious intimation which Christ gave her (v. 11, 12): Thou hast nothing to draw with; and besides, Art thou greater than our father Jacob? What he spoke figuratively, she took literally; Nicodemus did so too. She does not think him capable of furnishing her with any water: Thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep. But there are those who will not believe his promise, unless the means of the performance of it be visible; as if he could not draw water without our buckets. She asks scornfully, "Whence hast thou this living water? I see not whence thou canst have it." The fountain of life is hid with Christ. Christ has enough for us, though we see not whence he has it. She does not think it possible that he should furnish her with any better water, Art thou greater than our father Jacob, who gave us the well?

[4] We will suppose the tradition true, that Jacob himself, and his children, and cattle, did drink of this well. And we may observe from it, the power and providence of God, in the continuance of the fountains of water from generation to generation.

[5] Yet, allowing that to be true, she was out in several things. In calling Jacob father. What authority had the Samaritans to reckon themselves of the seed of Jacob? She is out in claiming this well as Jacob's gift. But thus we are apt to call the messengers of God's gifts the donors of them, and to look so much at the hands they pass through as to forget the hand they come from. She was out in speaking of Christ as not worthy to be compared with our father Jacob. An over-fond veneration for antiquity makes God's graces, in the good people of our own day, to be slighted. Christ makes it out that the living water he had to give was far better than that of Jacob's well, v. 13, 14. Christ did not cast her off, but encouraged her. He shows her that the water of Jacob's well yielded but a transient satisfaction: "Whoso drinketh of this water shall thirst again. It is no better than other water; it will quench the present thirst, but the thirst will return." This intimates, a. The infirmities of our bodies in this present state; they are ever craving. Life is a fire, a lamp, which will soon go out, without continual supplies of fuel and oil. b. The imperfections of all our comforts in this world; they are not lasting. Yesterday's meat and drink will not do to-day's work. But the living waters he would give should yield a lasting satisfaction and bliss, v. 14. Whoever partakes of the Spirit of grace,

(a) He shall never thirst. A desiring thirst he has, nothing more than God, still more and more of God; but not a despairing thirst.

(b) He shall never thirst, because this water that Christ gives shall be in him a well of water. He can never be reduced to extremity that has in himself a fountain of supply and satisfaction, ever ready, for it shall be in him. He needs not sneak to the world for comfort. Believers have in them a well of water, overflowing, ever flowing. It is springing up, ever in motion. If good truths stagnate in our souls, like standing water, they do not answer the end of our receiving them. It is springing up unto everlasting life, which intimates the aims of gracious actings. Spiritual life springs up towards its own perfection in eternal life. It will continue springing up till it come to perfection, eternal life at last. And now is not this water better than that of Jacob's well? The woman begs of him to give her some of this water (v. 15): Give me this water, that I thirst not. Some think that she speaks tauntingly, and ridicules what Christ had said as mere stuff. "A rare invention; it will save me a great deal of pain if I thirst not, and a great deal of pains if I never come hither to draw." Others think that it was a well-meant but weak and ignorant desire. Whatever it be, let me have it. Ease, or saving of labour, is a valuable good to poor labouring people. Even those that are weak and ignorant may yet have some faint and fluctuating desires towards Christ and his gifts.

2. The next subject of discourse with this woman is concerning her husband, v. 16–18. It was not to let fall the discourse of the water of life that Christ started this, but it was with a gracious design. Waiving the discourse about the living water, he sets himself to awaken her conscience, and then she would more easily apprehend the remedy by grace. And this is the method of dealing with souls; they must first be made weary and heavy-laden under the burden of sin, and then brought to Christ for rest. This is the course of spiritual physic.

(1) How discreetly and decently Christ introduces this discourse (v. 16): Go, call thy husband, and come hither. The order Christ gave her had a very good colour: "Call thy husband, that he may teach thee, and help thee to understand these things. Call thy husband, that he may learn with thee: that then you may be heirs together of the grace of life." As it had a good colour, so it had a good design; for hence he would take occasion to call her sin to remembrance. There is need of art and prudence in giving reproofs.

(2) How industriously the woman seeks to evade the conviction, and yet insensibly convicts herself. She said, I have no husband.

(3) How closely our Lord Jesus brings home the conviction to her conscience. It is probable that he said more than is here recorded, for she thought that he told her all that ever she did (v. 29). A surprising narrative of her past conversation: Thou hast had five husbands. A severe reproof of her present state of life: He whom thou now hast is not thy husband. So that, in short, she lived in adultery. Yet observe how mildly Christ tells her of it; He with whom thou livest is not thy husband: and then leaves it to her own conscience to say the rest. Yet in this he puts a better construction than it would well bear upon what she said: Thou hast well said I have no husband; and again, In that saidst thou truly. What she intended as a denial of the fact he favourably interpreted as a confession of the fault. Those who would win souls should make the best of them, whereby they may hope to work upon their good-nature; for, if they make the worst of them, they certainly exasperate their ill-nature.

3. The next subject of discourse with this woman is concerning the place of worship, v. 19–24.

(1) A case of conscience concerning the place of worship, v. 19, 20.

[1] The inducement she had to put this case: Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet. She does not deny the truth of what he had charged her with, nor is she put into a passion by it, as many are when they are touched in a sore place, but (which is a rare thing) can bear to be told of a fault. She goes further: First, She speaks respectfully to him, calls him Sir. This was the effect of Christ's meekness in reproving her; he gave her no ill language, and then she gave him none. Secondly, She acknowledges him to be a prophet. Thirdly, She desires some further instruction from him.

[2] The case itself that she propounded concerning the place of religious worship in public. She knew she must worship God, and desired to do it aright; and therefore, meeting with a prophet, begs his direction.

It was agreed between the Jews and the Samaritans that God is to be worshipped (even those who were such fools as to worship false gods were not such brutes as to worship none). But the matter in variance was where they should worship God. Observe how she states the case:

As for the Samaritans: Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; there the Samaritan temple was built by Sanballat. Whatever the temple was the place was holy; it was mount Gerizim, the mount on which the blessings were pronounced. It might plead prescription: Our fathers worshipped here. She thinks they have antiquity, tradition, and succession, on their side. As to the Jews: You say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship. The Samaritans governed themselves by the five books of Moses. Now, though they found frequent mention there of the place God would choose, yet they did not find it named there; and therefore thought themselves at liberty to set up another place.

(2) Christ's answer to this case of conscience, v. 21, &c. He puts a slight upon the question concerning the place of worship (v. 21): "Woman, believe me; that which thou hast been taught to lay so much weight on shall be set aside as a thing indifferent." The hour comes when you shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem worship the Father. A period shall be put to all niceness and all differences about the place of worship. It shall be a thing perfectly indifferent whether in either of these places or any other men worship God, for they shall not be tied to any place; neither here nor there, but both, and anywhere, and everywhere. He lays a stress upon other things. When he made so light of the place of worship he did not intend to lessen our concern about the thing itself. As to the present state of the controversy, he determines against the Samaritan worship, v. 22. The Samaritans were certainly in the wrong, because they were out in the object of their worship. But you worship you know not what. Ignorance is so far from being the mother of devotion that it is the murderer of it. That the Jews were certainly in the right. "We know what we worship. We go upon sure grounds in our worship." Those who by the scriptures have obtained some knowledge of God may worship him comfortably to themselves, and acceptably to him, for they know what they worship. Worship may be true where yet it is not pure and entire. Our Lord Jesus was pleased to reckon himself among the worshippers of God: We worship. Let not the greatest of men think the worship of God below them, when the Son of God himself did not. Salvation is of the Jews; and therefore they know what they worship, and what grounds they go upon in their worship. The author of eternal salvation comes of the Jews, and is sent first to bless them. The means of eternal salvation are afforded to them. The word of salvation was of the Jews. Having shown that the place is indifferent, he comes to show what is necessary and essential—that we worship God in spirit and in truth, v. 23, 24. The stress is upon the state of mind in which we worship him. It concerns us to be right, not only in the object of our worship, but in the manner of it; and it is this which Christ here instructs us in.

[1] The revolution which should introduce this change: The hour cometh, and now is. The perfect day is coming, and now it dawns.

[2]. The blessed change itself. True worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth. As creatures, we worship the Father of all: as Christians, we worship the Father of our Lord Jesus. Now the change shall be in the nature of the worship. Christians shall worship God, not in the ceremonial observances of the Mosaic institution, but in spiritual ordinances; in the temper and disposition of the worshippers. All should, and they will, worship God in spirit and in truth. It is spoken of (v. 23) as their character, and (v. 24) as their duty. It is required of all that worship God that they worship him in spirit and in truth. We must worship God in spirit, Phil. iii. 3. We must depend upon God's Spirit for strength and assistance. We must worship him with fixedness of thought and a flame of affection, with all that is within us. In truth, that is, in sincerity. We must mind the power more than the form. God must be thus worshipped, because they only are accounted the true worshippers. The gospel erects a spiritual way of worship, so that the professors of the gospel do not live up to gospel light and laws, if they do not worship God in spirit and in truth. For the Father seeketh such worshippers of him. Such worshippers are very rare. The gate of spiritual worshipping is strait. Such worship is necessary, and what the God of heaven insists upon. God is greatly well pleased with and graciously accepts such worship and such worshippers. His seeking such worshippers implies his making them such. Christ came to declare God to us (ch. i. 18), and this he has declared concerning him; he declared it to this poor Samaritan woman, for the meanest are concerned to know God. God is a spirit. It is easier to say what God is not than what he is. The spirituality of the divine nature is a very good reason for the spirituality of divine worship. If we do not worship God, who is a spirit, in the spirit, we miss the end of worship.

4. The last subject of discourse with this woman is concerning the Messiah, v. 25, 26.

(1) The faith of the woman, by which she expected the Messiah: I know that Messias cometh—and he will tell us all things. She had nothing to object against what Christ had said; his discourse was what might become the Messiah; but from him she would receive it, and in the meantime she thinks it best to suspend her belief. Thus many have no heart to the price in their hand, because they think they have a better in their eye. Whom she expects: I know that Messias cometh. The Jews and Samaritans agreed in the expectation of the Messiah and his kingdom. Those who knew least knew this, that Messias was to come. Messias, who is called Christ. The evangelist, though he retains the Hebrew word Messias, takes care to render it by a Greek word of the same signification, who is called Christ—Anointed. What she expects from him: "He will tell us all things. He will tell us the mind of God fully and clearly, and keep back nothing." Now this implies an acknowledgment, First, Of the imperfection of the discovery they now had of the divine will, and the rule they had of the divine worship. Secondly, Of the sufficiency of the Messiah to make this change: "He will tell us all things which we want to know, and about which we wrangle in the dark."

(2) The favour of our Lord Jesus in making himself known to her: I that speak to thee am he, v. 26. Christ did never make himself known so expressly to any as he did here to this poor Samaritan, and to the blind man (ch. ix. 37). Christ would thus put an honour upon such as were poor and despised. This woman had never had any opportunity of seeing Christ's miracles, which were then the ordinary method of conviction. God can make the light of grace shine into the heart even where he doth not make the light of the gospel shine in the face. This woman was better prepared to receive such a discovery than others were. Christ will manifest himself to those who with an honest humble heart desire to be acquainted with him: I that speak to thee am he. See here, How near Jesus Christ was to her, when she knew not who he was, Gen. xxviii. 16. Many are lamenting Christ's absence, and longing for his presence, when at the same time he is speaking to them. Christ makes himself known to us by speaking to us: I that speak unto thee, I am he.

Verses 27–42

I. The interruption given to this discourse by the disciples' coming. Just when the discourse was brought to a head, then came the disciples. They wondered at Christ's converse with this woman, marvelled that he talked thus earnestly with a woman, a strange woman alone, especially with a Samaritan woman. They wondered he should condescend to talk with such a poor contemptible woman, forgetting what despicable men they themselves were when Christ first called them. Yet they acquiesced in it; they knew it was for some good reason, and therefore none of them asked, What seekest thou? or, Why talkest thou with her? All is well which Jesus Christ saith and doeth. Whatever they thought, they said nothing.

II. The notice which the woman gave to her neighbours, v. 28, 29. Observe here,

1. How she forgot her errand to the well, v. 28. She went her way. She withdrew, in civility to Christ, that he might have leisure to eat his dinner. She delighted in his discourse, but would not be rude. She supposed that Jesus would go forward in his journey, and therefore hastened to tell her neighbours. See how she improved time. When opportunities of getting good cease we should seek opportunities of doing good. Notice is taken of her leaving her water-pot or pail. She left it in kindness to Christ, that he might have water to drink with his dinner. She left it that she might make the more haste into the city. She left her water-pot, as one careless of it, being wholly taken up with better things.

2. How she minded her errand to the town. She went into the city, and said to the men, to every man she met in the streets: Come, see a man who told me all things that ever I did. Is not this the Christ? Observe,

(1) How solicitous she was to have her friends and neighbours acquainted with Christ. When she had found that treasure, she called together her friends and neighbours (as Luke xv. 9), not only to rejoice with her, but to share with her. Has he done us the honour to make himself known to us? Let us do him the honour to make him known to others; nor can we do ourselves a greater honour. This woman becomes an apostle. I have most opportunity, and therefore lie under the greatest obligations, to do good to those that live near me.

(2) How fair and ingenuous she was in the notice she gave them concerning this stranger. She tells them plainly what induced her to admire him: He has told me all things that ever I did. No more is recorded than what he told her of her husbands. He told her that which none knew but God and her own conscience. Two things affected her: First, the extent of his knowledge. We ourselves cannot tell all things that ever we did. Secondly, The power of his word. This made a great impression upon her, that he told her her secret sins. "Come see a man that has told me of my sins." She fastens upon that part of Christ's discourse which one would think she would have been most shy of repeating. That knowledge of Christ into which we are led by the conviction of sin and humiliation is most likely to be sound and saving. She invites them to come and see him. Not barely, "Come and look upon him" (she does not invite them to him as a show), but "Come and converse with him; come and hear his wisdom, as I have done." She would not undertake to manage the arguments which had convinced her, in such a manner as to convince others; all that see the evidence of truth themselves are not able to make others see it. Jesus was now at the town's end. "Now come see him." Shall we not go over the threshold to see him whose day prophets and kings desired to see? She resolves to appeal to themselves, Is this not the Christ? She does not peremptorily say, "He is the Messiah." She will not impose her faith upon them, but only propose it to them. By such fair but forcible appeals as these men's judgments and consciences are sometimes taken hold of ere they are aware.

(3) What success she had in this invitation: They went out of the city, and came to him, v. 30. They came unto him; did not send for him into the city to them, they went out to him. Those that would know Christ must meet him where he records his name.

III. Christ's discourse with his disciples while the woman was absent, v. 31–38. See how industrious our Lord Jesus was to redeem time, to husband every minute of it. It were well if we could thus gather up the fragments of time. Two things are observable in this discourse:

1. How Christ expresses the delight which he himself had in his work. Now with this work we here find him wholly taken up. For,

(1) He neglected his meat and drink for his work. When he sat down upon the well, he was weary, and needed refreshment; but this opportunity of saving souls made him forget his weariness and hunger. And he minded his food so little that his disciples were forced to invite him to it: They prayed him, Master, eat. It was an instance of their love to him that they invited him; but it was a greater instance of his love to souls that he needed invitation. He minded it so little that they suspected he had had meat brought him in their absence (v. 33): Has any man brought him aught to eat? He had so little appetite for his dinner that they were ready to think he had dined already.

(2) He made his work his meat and drink. The work he had done in instructing the woman, the work he had to do among the Samaritans, this was meat and drink to him. Never did a hungry man, or an epicure, expect a plentiful feast with so much desire, nor feed upon its dainties with so much delight, as our Lord Jesus expected and improved an opportunity of doing good to souls. It was such meat as the disciples knew not of. This may be said of good Christians too, that they have meat to eat which others know not of, joy with which a stranger does not intermeddle. Now this word made them ask, Has any man brought him aught to eat? The reason why his work was his meat and drink was because it was his Father's work, his Father's will: My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, v. 34. The salvation of sinners is the will of God, and the instruction of them in order thereunto is his work. He made this work his business and delight. When his body needed food, his mind was so taken up with this that he forgot both hunger and thirst, both meat and drink. He was earnest and in care to go through it, and to finish his work. He resolved never to quit it, nor lay it down, till he could say, It is finished. Many have zeal to carry them out at first, but not zeal to carry them on to the last.

2. See here how Christ excites his disciples to diligence in their work; they were workers with him, and therefore should be workers like him. The work they had to do was to preach the gospel. Now this work he here compares to harvest work, v. 35–38. Harvest time is busy time; all hands must be then at work. Harvest time is opportunity, a short and limited time, and harvest work is work that must be done then or not at all. Now he here suggests three things to them to quicken them to diligence:

(1) That it was necessary work, and the occasion for it very urgent and pressing (v. 35): You say, It is four months to harvest; but I say, The fields are already white. [A saying concerning the corn-harvest; there are yet four months, and then comes harvest. "You say, for the encouragement of the sower at seed-time, that it will be but four months to the harvest."] God has not only promised us a harvest every year, but has appointed the weeks of harvest; so that we know when to expect it. Christ's saying concerning the gospel harvest: Look, the fields are already white unto the harvest. Here in this place there was harvest work for him to do. They would have him to eat, v. 31. "Eat!" saith he, "I have other work to do, that is more needful; look what crowds of Samaritans are coming that are ready to receive the gospel." People's forwardness to hear the word is a great excitement to ministers' diligence and liveliness in preaching it. There are multitudes as ready to receive the gospel as a field of corn that is fully ripe is ready to be reaped. The fields were now made white to the harvest. It is a great encouragement to us to engage in any work for God, if we understand by the signs of the times that this is the proper season for that work. John Baptist had made ready a people prepared for the Lord. Since he began to preach the kingdom of God every man pressed into it, Luke xvi. 16. This, therefore, was a time to thrust in their sickle. It was necessary to work now. If the corn that is ripe be not reaped, it will shed and be lost. If souls that are under convictions be not helped now, their hopeful beginnings will come to nothing.

(2) That it was profitable and advantageous work, which they themselves would be gainers by (v. 36): "He that reapeth receiveth wages." Christ's reapers never have cause to say they served a hard Master. His work is its own wages. Christ's reapers have fruit: He gathereth fruit unto life eternal; that is, he shall both save himself and those that hear him. This is the comfort of faithful ministers, that their work has a tendency to the eternal salvation of precious souls: They have joy: That he that sows and they that reap may rejoice together. The minister who is the happy instrument of beginning a good work is he that sows; he that is employed to carry it on and perfect it is he that reaps: and both shall rejoice together. The reapers share in the joy of harvest.

(3) That it was easy work, and work that was half done to their hands by those that were gone before them: One soweth, and another reapeth, v. 37, 38. Moses, and the prophets, and John Baptist, had paved the way to the gospel. I sent you to reap that whereupon you bestowed no labour. This intimates two things concerning the Old Testament ministry: It was very much short of the New Testament ministry. Moses and the prophets sowed, but they could not be said to reap. Their writings have done much more good since they left us than ever their preaching did. It was very serviceable to the New Testament ministry, and made way for it. Had it not been for the seed sown by the prophets, this Samaritan woman could not have said, We know that Messias cometh. This also intimates two things concerning the ministry of the apostles of Christ. It was a fruitful ministry: they were reapers that gathered in a great harvest. It was much facilitated by the writings of the prophets. The prophets sowed in tears, crying out, We have laboured in vain; the apostles reaped in joy, saying, Thanks be to God, who always causeth us to triumph. From the labours of ministers that are dead and gone much good fruit may be reaped by the people that survive them and the ministers that succeed them. See what reason we have to bless God for those that are gone before us. We are entered into their labours.

IV. The good effect which this visit Christ made to the Samaritans had upon them, v. 39–42. See what impressions were made on them,

1. By the woman's testimony concerning Christ; and the testimony no more than this, He told me all that ever I did. And two things they were brought to:

(1) To credit Christ's word (v. 39): Many of the Samaritans of that city believed on him for the saying of the woman. Who they were that believed: Many of the Samaritans, who were not of the house of Israel. Their faith was an earnest of the faith of the Gentiles. Upon what inducement they believed: For the saying of the woman. See here, First, How God is sometimes pleased to use very weak and unlikely instruments for the beginning and carrying on of a good work. Secondly, How great a matter a little fire kindles. Our Saviour, by instructing one poor woman, spread instruction to a whole town. Let not ministers be either careless in their preaching, or discouraged in it, because their hearers are few and mean; for, by doing good to them, good may be conveyed to more. See how good it is to speak experimentally of Christ. Those are most likely to do good that can tell what God has done for their souls.

(2) To court his stay among them (v. 40): When they were come to him they besought him that he would tarry with them. Upon the woman's report, they believed him to be a prophet, and came to him; and, when they saw him, they respected him as a prophet. They begged he would tarry with them that they might testify their respect to him; that they might receive instruction from him. Many would have flocked to one that would tell them their fortune, but these flocked to one that would tell them their faults. The Jews drove him from them: while the Samaritans invited him to them. The proof of the gospel's success is not always according to the probability, nor what is experienced according to what is expected. Christ granted their request. He abode there. When he had an opportunity of doing good, he abode there. We are told what impressions were made upon them by Christ's own word (v. 41, 42), what he said and did there is not related. He said and did that which convinced them that he was the Christ: and the labours of a minister are best told by the good fruit of them. Now their eyes saw him; and the effect was, [1] That their number grew (v. 41): Many more believed. [2] That their faith grew. Those who had been wrought upon by the report of the woman now saw cause to say, Now we believe, not because of thy saying, v. 42. Here are three things in which their faith grew: a. In the matter of it. Upon the testimony of the woman, they believed him to be a prophet; but now that they have conversed with him they believe that he is the Christ, the Anointed One, and that, being the Christ, he is the Saviour of the world. They believed him to be the Saviour not only of the Jews, but of the world, which they hoped would take them in, though Samaritans. b. In the certainty of it; their faith now grew up to a full assurance: We know that this is indeed the Christ. c. In the ground of it: Now we believe, not because of thy saying, for we have heard him ourselves. They had before believed for her saying: "Now we believe because we have heard him ourselves. We are abundantly satisfied and assured that this is the Christ." In this instance we may see how faith comes by hearing. Faith comes to the birth by hearing the report of men. The instructions of parents and preachers recommend the doctrine of Christ to our acquaintance. Faith comes to its growth, by hearing the testimony of Christ himself; and this goes further, and recommends his doctrine to our acceptance. We were induced to look into the scriptures by the saying of those who told us that in them they had found eternal life; now we believe, not for their saying, but because we have searched them ourselves: and our faith stands not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.

Thus was the seed of the gospel sown in Samaria.

Verses 43–54

I. Christ's coming into Galilee, v. 43. After two days he left them because he must preach to other cities, Luke iv. 43. He went into Galilee.

1. Whither Christ went; into Galilee, but not to Nazareth, which was strictly his own country. He went among the villages, but declined going to Nazareth, for a reason here given, which Jesus himself testified: That a prophet has no honour in his own country. The honour due to the Lord's prophets has very often been denied them. This due honour is most frequently denied them in their own country. Christ's near kinsmen spoke most slightly of him, ch. vii. 5. Men's pride and envy make them scorn to be instructed by those who once were their school-fellows and play-fellows. It is just with God to deny his gospel to those that despise the ministers of it. They that mock the messengers forfeit the benefit of the message.

2. What entertainment he met with among the Galileans in the country (v. 45): They received him. Christ and his gospel are not sent in vain; if they have not honour with some, they shall have with others. Now the reason given why these Galileans were so ready to receive Christ is because they had seen the miracles he did at Jerusalem, v. 45. They went up to Jerusalem at the feast, the feast of the passover. They went up to the feast, and there they became acquainted with Christ. They that are diligent and constant in attending on public ordinances some time or other meet with more spiritual benefit than they expect. At Jerusalem they saw Christ's miracles. The miracles were wrought for the benefit of those at Jerusalem; yet the Galileans got more advantage by them than they did for whom they were chiefly designed. Thus the word preached to a mixed multitude may perhaps edify occasional hearers more than the constant auditory.

3. What city he went to. He chose to go to Cana of Galilee, where he had made the water wine (v. 46). The evangelist mentions this miracle here to teach us to keep in remembrance what we have seen of the works of Christ.

II. His curing the nobleman's son. This story is not recorded by any other of the evangelists.

1. Who the petitioner was, and who the patient: the petitioner was a nobleman; the patient was his son: There was a certain nobleman. The father a nobleman and yet the son sick; for dignities and titles of honour will be no security from the assaults of sickness and death. It was fifteen miles from Capernaum to Cana, where Christ now was; yet this affliction in his family sent him so far to Christ.

2. How the petitioner made his application to the physician. He went to him himself, and besought him to come and heal his son, v. 47. See here, His tender affection to his son, that when he was sick he would spare no pains to get help for him. His great respect to our Lord Jesus, that he would come himself to wait upon him, and that he besought him, when, as a man in authority, he might have ordered his attendance. The greatest men, when they come to God, must become beggars. As to the errand he came upon, we may observe a mixture in his faith. There was sincerity in it; he did believe that Christ could heal his son. Yet there was infirmity in his faith; he thought he could not heal him at a distance, and therefore he besought him that he would come down and heal him. We are encouraged to pray, but we are not allowed to prescribe: Lord, heal me; but, whether with a word or a touch, thy will be done.

3. The gentle rebuke he met with in this address (v. 48): Jesus said to him, "Except you see signs and wonders, you will not believe." Though he was a nobleman, and now in grief about his son, yet Christ gives him a reproof. Christ first shows him his sin and weakness, to prepare him for mercy, and then grants his request. Those whom Christ intends to honour with his favours he first humbles with his frowns. Whereas they had heard by credible and incontestable report of the miracles he had wrought in other places, they could not believe except they saw them with their own eyes. They must be honoured, and they must be humoured, or they will not be convinced. Whereas they had seen divers miracles which sufficiently proved Christ to be a teacher come from God, they would go no further in believing than they were driven by signs and wonders. The spiritual power of the word did not affect them, did not attract them, but only the sensible power of miracles.

4. His continued importunity in his address (v. 49): Sir, come down ere my child die. He took the reproof patiently; he spoke to Christ respectfully. And, as he did not take the reproof for an affront, so he did not take it for a denial, but still prosecuted his request, and continued to wrestle till he prevailed. He is so wholly taken up with concern about his child that he can mind nothing else. He still discovered the weakness of his faith in the power of Christ. He must have Christ to come down, thinking that else he could do the child no kindness. He believes that Christ could heal a sick child, but not that he could raise a dead child, "O come down, ere my child die," as if then it would be too late. He forgot that Elijah and Elisha had raised dead children; and is Christ's power inferior to theirs? Observe what haste he is in: Come down, ere my child die; as if there were danger of Christ's slipping his time.

5. The answer of peace which Christ gave (v. 50): Go thy way, thy son liveth. Christ here gives us an instance of his power, that he not only could heal, but could heal with so much ease. Here is nothing said, nothing done, nothing ordered to be done, and yet the cure wrought. This nobleman would have Christ come down and heal his son; Christ will heal his son, and not come down. And thus the cure is the sooner wrought, the nobleman's mistake rectified, and his faith confirmed; so that the thing was better done in Christ's way. When he denies what we ask, he gives what is much more to our advantage. He observed the nobleman to be in pain about his son, and therefore Christ dropped the reproof, and gave him assurance of the recovery of his child; for he knows how a father pities his children.

6. The nobleman's belief of the word of Christ: He believed, and went away. He is satisfied with the method Christ took. Now he sees no sign or wonder, and yet believes the wonder done. Christ said, Thy son liveth, and the man believed him. Christ said, Go thy way; and, as an evidence of the sincerity of his faith, he went his way.

7. The further confirmation of his faith, by comparing notes with his servants at his return. His servants met him with the agreeable news of the child's recovery, v. 51. Christ said, Thy son liveth; and now the servants say the same. Good news will meet those that hope in God's word. He enquired what hour the child began to recover (v. 52). He was desirous to have his faith confirmed. The diligent comparison of the works of Christ with his word will be of great use to us for the confirming of our faith. This was the course the nobleman took: He enquired of the servants the hour when he began to amend; and they told him, Yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him; not only he began to amend, but he was perfectly well on a sudden; so the father knew that it was at the same hour when Jesus said to him, Thy son liveth. Two things would help to confirm his faith: First, That the child's recovery was sudden and not gradual. They name the precise time to an hour: Yesterday, not about, but at the seventh hour, the fever left him. The word of Christ did not work like physic, which must have time to operate, and produce the effect, and perhaps cures by expectation only; no, with Christ it was he spoke and it was done; not, He spoke and it was set a-doing. Secondly, That it was just at the same time that Christ spoke to him: at that very hour. The synchronisms and coincidents of events add very much to the beauty and harmony of Providence. In men's works, distance of place is the delay of time and the retarding of business; but it is not so in the works of Christ.

8. The happy effect and issue of this. The bringing of the cure to the family brought salvation to it. The nobleman himself believed. He had before believed the word of Christ; but now he believed in Christ. Christ has many ways of gaining the heart, and by the grant of a temporal mercy may make way for better things. His whole house believed likewise. Because of the interest they all had in the miracle, which preserved the blossom and hopes of the family; this affected them all, and endeared Christ to them. This was a nobleman, and probably he had a great household; but, when he comes into Christ's school, he brings them all along with him. What a blessed change was here in this house, occasioned by the sickness of the child! This should reconcile us to afflictions; we know not what good may follow from them.

9. Here is the evangelist's remark upon this cure (v. 54); This is the second miracle, referring to ch. ii. 11. In Judæa he had wrought many miracles. They had the first offer; but, being driven thence, he wrought miracles in Galilee. Somewhere or other Christ will find a welcome. People may, if they please, shut the sun out of their own houses, but they cannot shut it out of the world. This is noted to be the second miracle, to remind us of the first. Fresh mercies should revive the remembrance of former mercies, as former mercies should encourage our hopes of further mercies. Probably, the patient being a person of quality, when this nobleman applied himself to Christ, multitudes followed. What abundance of good may great men do, if they be good men!

CHAP. V

We have in the gospel a faithful record of all that Jesus began both to do and to teach, Acts i. 1. These two are interwoven, because what he taught explained what he did, and what he did confirmed what he taught. Accordingly, we have in this chapter a miracle and a sermon. I. The miracle was the cure of an impotent man that had been diseased thirty-eight years, ver. 1–16. II. The sermon was Christ's vindication of himself, when he was prosecuted as a criminal for healing the man on the sabbath day. 1. He asserts his authority as Messiah, ver. 17–29. 2. He proves it and condemns the Jews for their unbelief, ver. 30–47.

Verses 1–16

This miraculous cure is not recorded by any other of the evangelists, who confine themselves mostly to the miracles wrought in Galilee, but John relates those wrought at Jerusalem.

I. The time when this cure was wrought: it was at a feast of the Jews, that is, the passover, for that was the most celebrated feast. Christ, though residing in Galilee, yet went up to Jerusalem at the feast, v. 1. It was an opportunity of good; there were great numbers gathered together there at that time; it was a general rendezvous, from all parts of the country, besides proselytes from other nations. It was to be hoped that they were in a good frame, for they came together to worship God. Now a mind inclined to devotion lies very open to the further discoveries of divine light and love.

II. The place where this cure was wrought: at the pool of Bethesda, which had a miraculous healing virtue in it, v. 2–4.

1. Where it was situated: At Jerusalem, by the sheep-market. Some think it was near the temple, and, if so, it yielded a melancholy but profitable spectacle to those that went up to the temple to pray.

2. How it was called: It was a pool which is called in Hebrew, Bethesda—the house of mercy; for therein appeared much of the mercy of God to the sick and diseased. In a world of so much misery as this is, it is well that there are some Bethesdas.

3. How it was fitted up: It had five porches in which the sick lay. Thus the charity of men concurred with the mercy of God for the relief of the distressed. Nature has provided remedies, but men must provide hospitals.

4. How it was frequented with sick and cripples (v. 3): In these lay a great multitude of impotent folks. How many are the afflictions of the afflicted in this world! It may do us good to visit the hospitals sometimes, that we may take occasion, from the calamities of others, to thank God for our comforts. The evangelist specifies three sorts of diseased people that lay here, blind, halt, and withered. These are mentioned because, being least able to help themselves into the water, they lay longest waiting in the porches. O that men were as wise for their souls, and as solicitous to get their spiritual diseases healed!

5. What virtue it had for the cure of these impotent folks (v. 4): An angel went down, and troubled the water; and whoso first stepped in was made whole. The virtue this pool had was supernatural.

(1) The preparation of the medicine by an angel, who went down into the pool, and stirred the water. See what mean offices the holy angels condescend to. If we would do the will of God as the angels do it, we must think nothing below us but sin. The troubling of the water was the signal given of the descent of the angel. The waters of the sanctuary are then healing when they are put in motion. Ministers must stir up the gift that is in them. When they are cold and dull in their ministrations, the waters settle and are not apt to heal. The angel descended, to stir the water at a certain season.

(2) The operation of the medicine: Whoever first stepped in was made whole. What disease soever it was, this water cured it. The power of miracles succeeds where the power of nature succumbs. He that first stepped in had the benefit, not those that lingered and came in afterwards. This teaches us to observe and improve our opportunities, that we slip not a season which may never return.

Now this is all the account we have of this standing miracle. It was a token of God's goodwill to that people, and an indication that, though they had been long without prophets and miracles, yet God had not cast them off. It was a type of the Messiah that arises with healing under his wings.

III. The patient on whom this cure was wrought (v. 5): one that had been infirm thirty-eight years. His disease was grievous: He had an infirmity; he had lost the use of his limbs. It is sad to have the body so disabled that instead of being the soul's instrument, it is become, even in the affairs of this life, its burden. What reason have we to thank God for bodily strength, to use it for him. The duration of it was tedious: Thirty-eight years. He was lame longer than most live. Shall we complain of one wearisome night, or one fit of illness, who perhaps for many years have scarcely known what it has been to be a day sick, when many others, better than we, have scarcely known what it has been to be a day well?

IV. The cure and the circumstances of it briefly related, v. 6–9.

1. Jesus saw him lie. Observe, When Christ came up to Jerusalem he visited not the palaces, but the hospitals, an indication of his great design in coming into the world, which was to seek and save the sick and wounded. There was a great multitude of poor cripples here at Bethesda, but Christ fastened his eye upon this one. Christ delights to help the helpless. He had often been disappointed of a cure; therefore Christ took him for his patient: it is his honour to side with the weakest.

2. He knew and considered how long he had lain in this condition.

3. He asked him, Wilt thou be made whole? A strange question to be asked one that had been so long ill. Some indeed would not be made whole, because their sores serve them to beg by. Christ put it to him, to express his own pity and concern for him. Christ is tenderly inquisitive concerning the desires of those that are in affliction, to teach them to value the mercy, and to excite in them desires after it. In spiritual cases, people are not willing to be cured of their sins. If people were willing to be made whole, the work were half done, for Christ is willing to heal, if we be but willing to be healed.

4. The poor impotent man takes this opportunity to set forth the misery of his case: Sir, I have no man to put me into the pool, v. 7. He complains for want of friends to help him in: "I have no man, no friend to do me that kindness." One would think that some of those who had been themselves healed should have lent him a hand. To the sick and impotent it is as true a piece of charity to work for them as to relieve them. He bewails his infelicity, that very often when he was coming another stepped in before him. But a step between him and a cure, and yet he continues impotent. There is no getting over the old maxim, Every one for himself. Having been so often disappointed, he begins to despair, and now is Christ's time to come to his relief. And observe further, to his praise, that, though he had waited so long in vain, yet still he continued lying by the pool-side, hoping that sometime or other help would come.

5. Our Lord Jesus hereupon cures him with a word.

(1) The word he said: Rise, take up thy bed, v. 8. He is bidden to rise and walk; a strange command to be given to an impotent man, that had been long disabled. He must rise and walk, that is, attempt to do it, and in the essay he should receive strength to do it. If he had not attempted to help himself, he had not been cured, yet it does not therefore follow that, when he did rise and walk, it was by his own strength; no, it was by the power of Christ. He is bidden to take up his bed. First, To make it to appear that it was a perfect cure, and purely miraculous; for he did not recover strength by degrees, but from the extremity of weakness and impotency he suddenly stepped into the highest degree of bodily strength. He, who this minute was not able to turn himself in his bed, the next minute was able to carry his bed. Secondly, It was to proclaim the cure. Being the sabbath day, whoever carried a burden through the streets made himself very remarkable, and everyone would enquire what was the meaning of it. Christ would thus witness against the tradition of the elders. The case may be such that it may become a work of necessity, or mercy, to carry a bed on the sabbath day; but here it was more, it was a work of piety. He would hereby try the faith and obedience of his patient. Those that have been healed by Christ's word should be ruled by his word.

(2) The efficacy of this word (v. 9). Immediately he was made whole. What a joyful surprise was this to the poor cripple, to find himself all of a sudden so easy, so strong, so able to help himself! What a new world was he in, in an instant! He took up his bed and walked, and did not care who blamed him or threatened him for it.

V. What became of the poor man after he was cured.

1. What passed between him and the Jews who saw him carry his bed on the sabbath day. The Jews quarrelled with the man, telling him that it was not lawful, v. 10. Thus far was commendable, that, while they knew not by what authority he did it, they were jealous for the honour of the sabbath. The man justified himself in what he did by a warrant that would bear him out, v. 11. "I do not do it in contempt of the law and the sabbath. He that could work such a miracle as to make me whole no doubt might give me such a command as to carry my bed. He that was so kind as to make me whole would not be so unkind as to bid me do what is sinful." The Jews enquired further who it was that gave him this warrant (v. 12): What man is that? How industriously they overlooked that which might be a ground of their faith in Christ. They resolve to look upon Christ as a mere man: What man is that? They were resolved that they would never own him to be the Son of God. They resolve to look upon him as a bad man. He who bade this man carry his bed was certainly a delinquent. The poor man was unable to give them any account of him: He wist not who he was, v. 13. Christ was unknown to him when he healed him. Christ does many a good turn for those that know him not. He enlightens, strengthens, quickens, comforts us, and we wist not who he is. For the present he kept himself unknown; for as soon as he had wrought the cure he conveyed himself away, a multitude being in that place. This is mentioned to show, either, First, How Christ conveyed himself away---by retiring into the crowd, so as not to be distinguished from a common person. Or, Secondly, Why he conveyed himself away, because there was a multitude there, and he industriously avoided both the applause of those who would admire the miracle and cry that up, and the censure of those who would censure him as a sabbath-breaker, and run him down. Christ left the miracle to commend itself, and the man on whom it was wrought to justify it.

2. What passed at their next interview, v. 14.

(1) Where Christ found him: in the temple. Christ went to the temple. The man that was cured went to the temple. There Christ found him. Thither he straightway went because he had, by his infirmity, been so long detained thence. Perhaps he had not been there for thirty-eight years. His first visit shall be to the temple. Because he had by his recovery a good errand thither; he went up to the temple to return thanks to God for his recovery. Because he had, by carrying his bed, seemed to put a contempt on the sabbath, he would thus show that he had an honour for it. Works of necessity and mercy are allowed; but when they are over we must go to the temple.

(2) What he said to him. He now applies himself to the healing of his soul. He gives him a memento of his cure: Behold thou art made whole. Christ calls his attention to it. Let the impressions of it abide, and never be lost. He gives him a caution against sin, Being made whole, sin no more. This implies that his disease was the punishment of sin. While those chronical diseases lasted, they prevented the outward acts of many sins, and therefore watchfulness was the more necessary when the disability was removed. When the trouble which only dammed up the current is over, the waters will return to their old course. It is common for people, when they are sick, to promise much, when newly recovered to perform something, but after awhile to forget all. He gives him warning of his danger: Lest a worse thing come to thee. Christ knew that he was one of those that must be frightened from sin. There is something worse that will come to him if he relapse into sin after God has given him such a deliverance.

VI. The notice which the poor simple man gave to the Jews concerning Christ, v. 15. He told them it was Jesus that had made him whole. The rage and enmity of the Jews against him: Therefore did the rulers of the Jews persecute Jesus. See, (1) How absurd and unreasonable their enmity to Christ was. Therefore, because he had made a poor sick man well, they persecuted him, because he did good in Israel. (2) How bloody and cruel it was: They sought to slay him. (3) How it was varnished over with a colour of zeal for the honour of the sabbath; for this was the pretended crime, Because he had done these things on the sabbath day. Thus hypocrites often cover their real enmity against the power of godliness with a pretended zeal for the form of it.

Verses 17–30

We have here Christ's discourse upon occasion of his being accused as a sabbath-breaker.

I. The doctrine laid down, by which he justified what he did on the sabbath day (v. 17): He answered them, My father worketh hitherto, and I work. Waving all other pleas, he insists upon that which was equivalent to the whole, and abides by it, which he had mentioned, Matt. xii. 8. The Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath day. 1. He pleads that he was the Son of God, plainly intimated in his calling God his Father. 2. That he was a worker together with God. My Father worketh hitherto. But I also work with him. As God created all things by Christ, so he supports and governs all by him. He that does all is Lord of all, and therefore Lord of the sabbath.

II. The offence that was taken at his doctrine (v. 18): The Jews sought the more to kill him. His defence was made his offence. They sought to kill him,

1. Because he had broken the sabbath.

2. He had said also that God was his Father. Now they pretend a jealousy for God's honour, and charge Christ with it as a heinous crime that he made himself equal with God. This was justly inferred from what he said, that he was the Son of God, and that God was his Father. He had said that he worked with his Father, and hereby he made himself equal with God. Yet it was unjustly imputed to him as an offence that he equalled himself with God, for he was and is God. Therefore Christ, in answer to this charge, makes out his claim and proves that he is equal with God in power and glory.

III. Christ's discourse upon this occasion. In these verses he explains, and afterwards confirms, his commission, as Mediator. And, as the honours he is hereby entitled to are such as it is not fit for any creature to receive, so the work he is hereby entrusted with is such as it is not possible for any creature to go through with, and therefore he is God.

1. In general. He is one with the Father in all he does as Mediator. It is ushered in with a solemn preface (v. 19): Verily, verily, I say unto you. This intimates that the things declared are, (1) Very awful and great. (2) Very sure. (3) That they are matters purely of divine revelation, which we could not otherwise have come to the knowledge of. Two things he saith in general concerning the Son's oneness with the Father in working:

[1] That the Son conforms to the Father (v. 19): The Son can do nothing of himself but what he sees the Father do; for these things does the Son. The Lord Jesus, as Mediator, is Obedient to his Father's will. Christ was so entirely devoted to his Father's will that it was impossible for him in anything to act separately. He is observant of his Father's counsel; he can, he will, do nothing but what he sees the Father do. No man can find out the work of God, but the only-begotten Son, sees what he does, is intimately acquainted with his purposes, and has the plan of them ever before him. What the Father did in his counsels, the Son had ever in his view, and still he had his eye upon it. Yet he is equal with the Father in working; for what things soever the Father does these also does the Son likewise; he did the same things, not such things, but the same things; and he did them in the same manner, with the same authority, the same energy and efficacy.

[2] That the Father communicates to the Son, v. 20.

First, The inducement to it: The Father loveth the Son. Christ was now hated of men, but he comforted himself with this, that his Father loved him.

Secondly, The instances of it. He shows it, 1. In what he does communicate to him: He shows him all things that himself doth. He shows him all things which he does, that is, which the Son does; all that the Son does is by direction from the Father; he shows him. 2. In what he will communicate; he will show him greater works than these. Works of greater power than the curing of the impotent man; for he should raise the dead, and should himself rise from the dead. Many are brought to marvel at Christ's works, whereby he has the honour of them, who are not brought to believe, by which they would have the benefit of them.

2. In particular. He proves his equality with the Father, by specifying some of those works which he does that are the peculiar works of God. This is enlarged upon, v. 21–30.

(1) Observe what is here said concerning the Mediator's power to raise the dead and give life. [1] His authority to do it (v. 21): As the Father raiseth up the dead, so the Son quickeneth whom he will. It is God's prerogative to raise the dead, and give life. A resurrection from the dead never lay in the common road of nature, nor ever fell within the thought of those that studied only the compass of nature's power. It is purely the work of a divine power, and the knowledge of it purely by divine revelation. The Mediator is invested with this prerogative: He quickens whom he will. He does not enliven things by natural necessity, as the sun does, whose beams revive of course; but he acts as a free agent. As he has the power, so he has the wisdom and sovereignty, of a God; has the key of the grave and of death.

[2] His ability to do it, because he has life in himself, as the Father has, v. 26. It is certain that the Father has life in himself. He is a sovereign giver of life; he has the disposal of life in himself; and of all good (for so life sometimes signifies). He is to his creatures the fountain of life, and all good. It is as certain that he has given to the Son to have life in himself. The Son, as Redeemer, is the original of all spiritual life and good; is that to the church which the Father is to the world. The kingdom of grace, and all the life in that kingdom, are as fully and absolutely in the hand of the Redeemer as the kingdom of providence is in the hand of the Creator.

[3] His acting according to this authority and ability. There are two resurrections performed by his powerful word, both which are here spoken of:

A resurrection that now is (v. 29), a resurrection from the depth of sin to the life of righteousness. The hour is coming, and now is. It is a resurrection begun already. This is plainly distinguished from that in v. 28, which speaks of the resurrection at the end of time. Some think this was fulfilled in those whom he miraculously raised to life. I rather understand it of the power of the doctrine of Christ, for the recovering and quickening of those that were dead in trespasses and sins, Eph. ii. 1. The hour was coming when dead souls should be made alive by the preaching of the gospel: nay, it then was, while Christ was upon earth. It is to be applied to all the wonderful success of the gospel, among both Jews and Gentiles; an hour which still is, and is still coming. Sinners are spiritually dead, miserable, but neither sensible of their misery nor able to help themselves out of it,

The conversion of a soul to God is its resurrection from death to life; then it begins to live when it begins to live to God. It is by the voice of the Son of God that souls are raised to spiritual life. The dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God.

The voice of Christ must be heard by us, that we may live by it. A resurrection yet to come; this is spoken of, v. 28, 29. When this resurrection shall be: The hour is coming. It is not yet come, it is not the hour spoken of at v. 25, that is coming, and now is. It will certainly come, it is coming on, nearer every day. How far off it is we know not. Who shall be raised: All that are in the graves. Christ here tells us that all must appear before the Judge, and therefore all must be raised. The grave is the prison of dead bodies, where they are detained. Yet, in prospect of their resurrection, we may call it their bed, where they sleep to be awaked again. How they shall be raised. (a) The efficient of this resurrection: They shall hear his voice. A divine power shall go along with the voice, to put life into them, and enable them to obey it. (b) The effect of it: They shall come forth out of their graves. They shall appear before Christ's tribunal. To what they shall be raised; to a different state of happiness or misery, according to their different character.

(a) They that have done good shall come forth to the resurrection of life; they shall live again, to live for ever. It will be well in the great day with those only that have done good. They shall be admitted into the presence of God, and that is life, it is better than life.

(b) They that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation; they shall live again, to be for ever dying.

(2) Observe what is here said concerning the Mediator's authority to execute judgment, v. 22–24, 27. As he has an almighty power, so he has a sovereign jurisdiction. Christ's commission or delegation to the office of a judge, which is twice spoken of here (v. 22): He hath committed all judgment to the Son; and again (v. 27): He hath given him authority.

First, The Father judges no man; he is pleased to govern by Jesus Christ. He does not rule us by the mere right of creation. Having made us, he may do what he pleases with us, as the potter with the clay; yet he does not take advantage of this. The Mediator having undertaken to make a vicarious satisfaction, the matter is referred to him.

Secondly, He has committed all judgment to the Son. It is God in Christ that reconciles the world, and to him he has given power to confer eternal life. The book of life is the Lamb's book; by his award we must stand or fall. He is constituted sole manager of the judgment of the great day. The final and universal judgment is committed to the Son of Man.

Thirdly, He has given him authority to execute judgment also, v. 27. He that executes judgment upon them is the same that would have wrought salvation for them. Whence he has that authority: the Father gave it to him. Now all this redounds very much to the honour of Christ, and very much to the comfort of all believers, who may with the greatest assurance venture their all in such hands. He has all judgment committed to him for two reasons:

First, Because he is the Son of man; which denotes these three things: 1. His humiliation and gracious condescension. To this low estate he stooped. Because he condescended to be the Son of Man, his Father made him Lord of all, Phil. ii. 8, 9. 2. His affinity and alliance to us. Being the Son of man, he is of the same nature with those whom he is set over. 3. His being the Messiah promised. He is the Messiah, and therefore is invested with all this power. Christ usually called himself the Son of man, which was the more humble title, and bespeaks him a prince and Saviour, not to the Jewish nation only, but to the whole race of mankind.

Secondly, That all men should honour the Son, v. 23. The honouring of Jesus Christ is here spoken of as God's great design, and as man's great duty. We must honour the Son, must confess that he is Lord, and worship him; must honour him who was dishonoured for us. Even as they honour the Father. This supposes it to be our duty to honour the Father, and directs us to honour the Son. To enforce this law, it is added, He that honours not the Son honours not the Father who has sent him. Some pretend a reverence for the Creator, and speak honourably of him, who make light of the Redeemer, and speak contemptibly of him. Indignities done to the Lord Jesus reflect upon God himself. The Father counts himself struck as through him. The reason of this is because it is the Father who hath sent him. Affronts to an ambassador are justly resented by the prince that sends him. Here is the rule by which the Son goes in executing this commission (v. 24): He that heareth and believeth hath everlasting life. Here we have the substance of the whole gospel.

First, The character of a Christian: He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me. To be a Christian indeed is to hear the word of Christ. It is not enough to be within hearing of it, we must hear and obey, it must abide by the gospel of Christ as the fixed rule of our faith and practice. To believe on him that sent him; for Christ's design is to bring us to God. Christ is our way; God is our rest.

Secondly, The charter of a Christian. A charter of pardon: He shall not come into condemnation. The grace of the gospel is a full discharge from the curse of the law. A charter of privileges: He is passed out of death to life. Hear and live, believe and live, is what we may venture our souls upon. Here is the righteousness of his proceedings (v. 30). My judgment is just. His judgments are certainly just, for they are directed by the Father's wisdom: I can of my ownself do nothing, but as I hear I judge, as he had said before (v. 19). The Son can do nothing but what he sees the Father do; so here, nothing but what he hears the Father say: As I hear, 1. From the secret eternal counsels of the Father, so I judge. Would we know what we may depend upon in our dealing with God? Hear the word of Christ. What Christ has adjudged is an exact copy or counterpart of what the Father has decreed. 2. From the published records of the Old Testament. Christ, in all the execution of his undertaking, had an eye to the scripture. As it was written in the volume of the book. By the Father's will: My judgment is just, because I seek not my own will, but his who sent me. Not as if the will of Christ were contrary to the will of the Father. Christ has, as man, the natural and innocent affections of the human nature, sense of pain and pleasure, an inclination to life, an aversion to death: yet he pleased not himself, but acquiesced entirely in the will of his Father. What he did as Mediator was not the result of any peculiar or particular purpose and design of his own, but he was therein guided by his Father's will.

Verses 31–47

I. He sets aside his own testimony of himself (v. 31): "If I bear witness of myself, though it is infallibly true (ch. viii. 14), you will not admit it."

II. He produces other witnesses that bear testimony to him that he was sent of God.

1. The Father himself bore testimony to him (v. 32): There is another that beareth witness. I take this to be meant of God the Father. The seal which the Father put to his commission: He beareth witness of me, not only has done so by a voice from heaven, but still does so by the tokens of his presence with me. The satisfaction Christ had in this testimony: "I know that the witness which he witnesseth of me is true."

2. John Baptist witnessed to Christ, v. 33, &c. John came to bear witness of the light (ch. i. 7).

(1) Now the testimony of John was a solemn and public testimony: You sent an embassy of priests and Levites to John, which gave him an opportunity of publishing what he had to say. It was a true testimony: He bore witness to the truth. Christ does not say, He bore witness to me, but, like an honest man. He bore witness to the truth.

(2) Two things are added concerning John's testimony:

[1] That it was a testimony more than he needed to vouch (v. 34): I receive not testimony from man. Christ needs no testimonials or certificates, but what his own worth and excellency bring with him; why then did Christ here urge the testimony of John? Why, these things I say, that you may be saved. This he aimed at in all this discourse, to save not his own life, but the souls of others. Christ desires and designs the salvation even of his enemies and persecutors.

[2] That it was a testimony to the man, because John Baptist was one whom they had a respect for (v. 35).

First, The character of John Baptist: He was a burning and a shining light. He was a light, not light (so Christ was the light), but a luminary, a derived subordinate light. He was a burning light, which denotes sincerity; painted fire may be made to shine, but that which burns is true fire. It denotes also his activity, zeal, and fervency. Fire is always working on itself or something else, so is a good minister. He was a shining light, which denotes either his exemplary conversation, in which our light should shine (Matt. v. 16), or an eminent diffusive influence.

Secondly, The affections of the people to him: You were willing for a season to rejoice in his light. 1. It was a transport that they were in, upon the appearing of John: "You delighted to rejoice in his light; you were very proud that you had such a man among you. You were willing to dance, and make a noise about this light, as boys about a bonfire." 2. It was but transient, and soon over: "You were fond of him for a season, as little children are fond of a new thing, but soon grew weary of him, and said that he had a devil, and now you have him in prison." It is common for forward and noisy professors to cool and fall off. These here rejoiced in John's light, but never walked in it. Christ mentions their respect to John, to condemn them for their present opposition to himself. If they had continued their veneration for John they would have embraced Christ.

3. Christ's own works witnessed to him (v. 36): I have a testimony greater than that of John; for if we believe the witness of men, the witness of God is greater, 1 John v. 9. We must be glad of all the supports that offer themselves for the confirmation of our faith, though they may not amount to a demonstration; we have occasion for them all. Now this greater testimony was that of the works which his Father had given him to finish. In general the whole course of his life and ministry. All that work of which he said when he died, It is finished; all he said and did was holy and heavenly, and a divine purity, power and grace shone in it, proving abundantly that he was sent of God. In particular, the miracles he wrought for the proof of his divine mission witnessed of him. Now it is here said, (1) That these works were given him by the Father, that is, he was both appointed and empowered to work them. (2) They were given to him to finish; and his finishing them proves a divine power. (3) These works did bear witness of him, did prove that he was sent of God. That the Father had sent him as a Father, not as a master sends his servant on an errand, but as a father sends his son to take possession for himself.

4. He produces, more fully than before, his Father's testimony concerning him (v. 37): The Father that sent me hath borne witness of me. God was pleased to bear witness of his Son himself by a voice from heaven at his baptism (Matt. iii. 17): This is my beloved Son. Those whom God sends he will bear witness of; where he gives a commission, he will not fail to seal it. Where God demands belief, he will not fail to give sufficient evidence, as he has done concerning Christ. If God himself thus bore witness of Christ, how came it to pass that he was not universally received by the Jewish nation and their rulers? To this Christ here answers that it was for two reasons: (1) Because they were not acquainted with such extraordinary revelations of God and his will: You have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape, or appearance. They showed themselves to be as ignorant of God as we are of a man we never either saw or heard. Ignorance of God is the true reason of men's rejecting the record he has given concerning his Son. (2) Because they were not affected with the ordinary ways by which God had revealed himself to them: You have not his word abiding in you, v. 38. First, The word of God was not in them; it was among them, but not in them, in their hearts: not ruling in their souls, but only shining in their eyes and sounding in their ears. What did it avail them that they had the oracles of God committed to them (Rom. iii. 2), when they had not these oracles commanding in them? If they had, they would readily have embraced Christ. Secondly, It did not abide. Many have the word of God coming into them, and making some impressions for awhile, but it does not abide with them; it is not constantly in them, as a man at home, but only now and then, as a wayfaring man. But how did it appear that they had not the word of God abiding in them? It appeared by this, Whom he hath sent, him ye believe not. The indwelling of the word, and Spirit, and grace of God in us, is best tried by its effects, particularly by our receiving what he sends, especially Christ whom he hath sent.

5. The next witness he calls is the Old Testament, and to it he appeals (v. 39, &c.): Search the scriptures.

(1) This may be read, either, [1] "You search the scriptures, and you do well to do so." Christ owns that they did indeed search the scriptures, but it was in search of their own glory. It is possible for men to be very studious in the letter of the scripture, and yet to be strangers to the power and influence of it. Or, [2] As we read it: Search the scriptures. It was spoken to them in the nature of an appeal. When appeals are made to the scriptures they must be searched. Search the whole book of scripture throughout, compare one passage with another, and explain one by another. We must likewise search particular passages to the bottom, and see not what they seem to say, but what they say indeed. It is spoken to us in the nature of an advice. All those who would find Christ must search the scriptures, which denotes, 1. Diligence in seeking, close application of mind. 2. Desire and design of finding. We must often ask, "What am I now searching for?" We must search as those that sink for gold or silver, or that dive for pearl.

(2) Now there are two things which we are here directed to have in our eye, in our searching the scripture: heaven our end, and Christ our way. [1] For in them you think you have eternal life. The scripture assures us of an eternal state set before us, and offers to us an eternal life in that state. But to the Jews Christ saith only, You think you have eternal life in the scriptures. They looked for it by the bare reading and studying of the scripture. It was a common but corrupt saying among them, He that has the words of the law has eternal life. [2] We must search the scriptures for Christ, as the new and living way that leads to this end. These are they that testify of me. The scriptures, even those of the Old Testament, testify of Christ, and by them God bears witness to him. The Jews knew very well that the Old Testament testified of the Messiah, and were critical in their remarks upon the passages that looked that way; and yet were careless, and wretchedly overseen, in the application of them. Therefore we must search the scriptures, because they testify of Christ; for this is life eternal, to know him. Christ is the treasure hid in the field of the scriptures, the water in those wells.

(3) To this testimony he annexes a reproof in four instances.

[1] Their neglect of him and his doctrine: "You will not come to me, that you might have life," v. 40. Their estrangement from Christ was the fault not so much of their understandings as of their wills. Christ offered life, and it was not accepted. There is life to be had with Jesus Christ for poor souls. Life is the perfection of our being, and inclusive of all happiness; and Christ is our life. Those that would have this life must come to Jesus Christ for it, we may have it for the coming for. The only reason why sinners die is because they will not come to Christ; it is not because they cannot, but because they will not. They will not be cured, for they will not observe the methods of cure. Those words (v. 41), I receive not honour from men, come in in a parenthesis, to obviate an objection against him, as if he sought his own glory in obliging all to come to him. He did not covet nor court the applause of men. He had not the applause of men. Instead of receiving honour from men, he received a great deal of dishonour and disgrace from men. He needed not the applause of men; it was no addition to his glory.

[2] Their want of the love of God (v. 42): "I know you that you have not the love of God in you." The reason why people slight Christ is because they do not love God. He charged them (v. 37) with ignorance of God, and here with want of love to him; therefore men have not the love of God because they desire not the knowledge of him. The crime charged upon them: You have not the love of God in you. They pretended a great love to God, and thought they proved it by their zeal for the law, and yet they were really without the love of God. There are many who make a great profession of religion who yet show they want the love of God by their neglect of Christ. They hate his holiness and undervalue his goodness. It is the love of God in us, that love seated in the heart, that God will accept; the love shed abroad there. The proof of this charge, is given by the personal knowledge of Christ. I know you. Christ sees through all our disguises, and can say to each of us, I know thee. Christ knows men better than their neighbours know them. Christ knows men better than they know themselves. We may deceive ourselves, but we cannot deceive him.

[3] Another charge is their readiness to entertain false christs and false prophets (v. 43): I am come in my Father's name, and you receive me not. If another shall come in his own name, him you will receive. They would not receive Christ, who came in his Father's name. They hearken to everyone that will set up in his own name. They forsake their own mercies, which is bad enough; and it is for lying vanities, which is worse. Those are false prophets who come in their own name. It is just with God to suffer those to be deceived with false prophets who receive not the truth. They that shut their eyes against the true light are given up to wander endlessly after false lights, and to be led aside after every ignis fatuus. They loathe manna, and at the same time feed upon ashes.

[4] They are charged with pride and vain-glory, and unbelief, and the effect of them, v. 44. They therefore slighted and undervalued Christ because they admired and overvalued themselves.

First, their ambition of worldly honour. Christ despised it, v. 41. They set their hearts upon it: You receive honour one of another. "You desire to receive it, and aim at this in all you do. You give honour to others, and applaud them, only that they may return it, and may applaud you. What respect is shown to you you receive yourselves, and do not transmit to God."

Secondly, Their neglect of spiritual honour, called here the honour that comes from God only. This honour have all the saints. All that believe in Christ, through him receive the honour that comes from God. This honour that comes from God we must seek; we must account it our reward, as the Pharisees accounted the praise of men.

Thirdly, The influence this had upon their infidelity. How can you believe who are thus affected? The ambition and affectation of worldly honour are a great hindrance to faith in Christ. How can they believe, the summit of whose ambition is to make a fair show in the flesh?

6. The last witness here called is Moses, v. 45, &c. Christ here shows them,

(1) That Moses was a witness against the unbelieving Jews: There is one that accuses you, even Moses. This may be understood either, [1] As showing the difference between the law and the gospel. Moses, that is, the law, accuses you, for by the law is the knowledge of sin; it condemns you. But it is not the design of Christ's gospel to accuse us: Think not that I will accuse you. He came to be an advocate, not an accuser; to reconcile God and man. Or, [2] As showing the manifest unreasonableness of their infidelity: "Think not that I will appeal from your bar to God's and challenge you to answer there for what you do against me, as injured innocency usually does." Instead of accusing his crucifiers to his Father, he prayed, Father, forgive them. Nor let them mistake concerning Moses, as if he would stand by them in rejecting Christ; no, There is one that accuses you, even Moses in whom you trust. The Jews trusted in Moses, and thought their having his laws and ordinances would save them. Those that confide in their privileges will find that those very privileges will be witnesses against them.

(2) That Moses was a witness for Christ and to his doctrine (v. 46, 47): He wrote of me. The ceremonies of the law of Moses were figures of him that was to come. Christ here shows that Moses was so far from writing against Christ that he wrote for him, and of him. Christ here charges it on the Jews that they did not believe Moses. He had said (v. 45) that they trusted in Moses, they trusted to his name, but they did not receive his doctrine in its true sense and meaning. He proves this charge from their disbelief of him: Had you believed Moses, you would have believed me. Many say that they believe, whose actions give their words the lie. Those who rightly believe one part of scripture will receive every part. From their disbelief of Moses he infers that it was not strange that they rejected him: If you believe not his writings, how shall you believe my words? "If you do not believe sacred writings, those oracles which are in black and white, which is the most certain way of conveyance, how shall you believe my words, words being usually less regarded? If you believe not what Moses spoke and wrote of me, how shall you believe me and my mission?" If we admit not the premises, how shall we admit the conclusion. If therefore we believe not the divine inspiration of those writings, how shall we receive the doctrine of Christ?

Thus ends Christ's plea for himself. Their mouths were stopped for the present, and yet their hearts were hardened.

CHAP. VI

I. The miracle of the loaves, ver. 1–14. II. Christ's walking upon the water, ver. 15–21. III. The people's flocking after him to Capernaum, ver. 22–25. IV. His conference with them, occasioned by the miracles of the loaves (ver. 26, 27), showing them how they must labour for spiritual food (ver. 28, 29), and what that spiritual food is, ver. 30–59. V. Their discontent at what he said, ver. 60–65. VI. The apostasy of many from him, ver. 66–71.

Verses 1–14

We have here an account of Christ's feeding five thousand men with five loaves and two fishes. It is the only passage of the actions of Christ's life that is recorded by all the four evangelists. John relates this, because of the reference the following discourse has to it.

I. The place and time where and when this miracle was wrought.

1. The country that Christ was in (v. 1): He went over the sea of Galilee. Christ did not go directly over but made a coasting voyage to another place on the same side.

2. The company that he was attended with: A great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles, v. 2. Our Lord Jesus, while he went about doing good, lived continually in a crowd. Good and useful men must not complain of a hurry of business, when they are serving God. It will be time enough to enjoy ourselves when we come to that world where we shall enjoy God. Christ's miracles drew many after him that were not effectually drawn to him.

3. Christ's posting himself advantageously to entertain them (v. 3): He went up into a mountain, and there he sat with his disciples, Christ was now driven to be a field preacher; but his word was never the worse for that to those who followed him still, not only when he went out to a desert place, but when he went up to a mountain, though up-hill be against heart. Whoever would might come, and find him there. He sat with his disciples.

4. The time when it was. After those things. We are told (v. 4) that it was when the passover was nigh. It was a custom with the Jews religiously to observe the approach of the passover thirty days before. Perhaps, the approach of the passover, when everyone knew Christ would go up to Jerusalem, and be absent for some time, made the multitude attend the more diligently on him. The prospect of losing our opportunities should quicken us to improve them with double diligence.

II. The miracle itself.

1. The notice Christ took of the crowd that attended him (v. 5): He lifted up his eyes, and saw a great company come to him. Christ showed himself pleased with their attendance, and concerned for their welfare, to teach us to condescend to those of low estate, and not to set those with the dogs of our flock whom Christ hath set with the lambs of his.

2. The enquiry he made concerning the way of providing for them. He directed himself to Philip, who had been his disciple from the first, and had seen all his miracles, and particularly that of his turning water into wine. Those that have been witnesses of Christ's works, and have shared in the benefit of them, are inexcusable if they say, Can he furnish a table in the wilderness? Philip was of Bethsaida, in the neighbourhood of which town Christ now was, and therefore he was most likely to help them to provision at the best hand. Now Christ asked, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? He takes it for granted that they must all eat with him. One would think that when he had taught and healed them he had done his part; yet he is solicitous to entertain them. Those that will accept Christ's spiritual gifts, instead of paying for them, shall be paid for their acceptance of them. His enquiry is, Whence shall we buy bread? He will buy to give, and we must labour that we may give, Eph. iv. 28.

3. The design of this enquiry; it was only to try the faith of Philip, for he himself knew what he would do, v. 6. When we know not, he himself knows what he will do. When Christ is pleased to puzzle his people, it is only with a design to prove them.

4. Philip's answer to this question: "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient, v. 7. Neither will the country afford so much bread, nor can we afford to lay out so much money." Philip would go as near hand as he could, would have everyone to take a little. Christ might now have said to him, as he did afterwards, Have I been so long with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? We are apt thus to distrust God's power when visible and ordinary means fails, that is, to trust him no further than we can see him.

5. The information which Christ received concerning the provision they had. It was Andrew who acquainted Christ with what they had at hand; and in this we may see,

(1) The strength of his love to those for whom he saw his Master concerned, in that he was willing to bring out all they had, though he knew not but they might want themselves, and anyone would have said, Charity begins at home. He did not go about to conceal it. It was five barley loaves, and two small fishes. The provision was coarse and ordinary; they were barley loaves. Christ and his disciples were glad of barley-bread. It does not follow hence that we should tie ourselves to such coarse fare, and place religion in it (when God brings that which is finer to our hands, let us receive it, and be thankful). Barley-bread is what Christ had, and better than we deserve. It was but short and scanty; there were but five loaves, and those so small that one little lad carried them all. There were but two fishes, and those small ones. The provision of bread was little, but that of fish was less in proportion to it, so that many a bit of dry bread they must eat before they could make a meal. Well, Andrew was willing that the people should have this, as far as it would go. A distrustful fear of wanting ourselves should not hinder us from needful charity to others.

(2) See here the weakness of his faith in that word, "But what are they among so many?" Philip and he had not that actual consideration of the power of Christ which they should have had.

6. The directions Christ gave the disciples to seat the guests (v. 10): "Make the men sit down." This was like sending providence to market, and going to buy without money. (1) The furniture of the dining-room: there was much grass in that place. Here was this plenty of grass where Christ was preaching; the gospel brings other blessings along with it. This plenty of grass made the place the more commodious for those that must sit on the ground, and served them for cushions, and, considering what Christ says of the grass of the field (Matt. vi. 29, 30), these excelled those of Ahasuerus: nature's pomp is the most glorious. (2) The number of the guests: About five thousand: a great entertainment, representing that of the gospel, which is a feast for all nations (Isa. xxv. 6), a feast for all comers.

7. The distribution of the provision, v. 11. It was done with thanksgiving: He gave thanks. We ought to give thanks to God for our food, for it is a mercy to have it. Though our provision be coarse and scanty, though we have neither plenty nor dainty, yet we must give thanks to God for what we have. It was distributed from the hands of Christ by the hands of his disciples, v. 11. All our comforts come to us originally from the hand of Christ; whoever brings them, it is he that sends them. It was done to universal satisfaction. They did not everyone take a little, but all had as much as they would. How agreeable this miraculous food may be supposed to have been, above common food. Those whom Christ feeds with the bread of life he does not stint. There were but two small fishes, and yet they had of them too as much as they would. Those who call feeding upon fish fasting, reproach the entertainment Christ here made, which was a full feast.

8. The care that was taken of the broken meat. The orders Christ gave concerning it (v. 12): When they were filled Christ said to the disciples, Gather up the fragments. We must always take care that we make no waste of any of God's good creatures; for the grant we have of them is with this proviso, wilful waste only excepted. It is just with God to bring us to the want of that which we make waste of. When we are filled we must remember that others want, and we may want. Those that would have wherewith to be charitable must be provident. Christ did not order the broken meat to be gathered up till all were filled; we must not begin to hoard and lay up till all is laid out that ought to be. The observance of these orders (v. 13): They filled twelve baskets with the fragments, which was an evidence not only of the truth of the miracle, that they were fed, but of the greatness of it; they were not only filled, but there was all this over and above. See how large the divine bounty is; bread enough, and to spare, in our Father's house. The fragments filled twelve baskets, one for each disciple; they were thus repaid with interest for their willingness to part with what they had for public service.

III. Here is the influence which this miracle had upon the people (v. 14): They said, This is of a truth that prophet. Even the vulgar Jews with great assurance expected the Messiah to come into the world, and to be a great prophet. The Pharisees despised them as not knowing the law; but, it should seem, they knew more of him that is the end of the law than the Pharisees did. The miracles which Christ wrought did clearly demonstrate that he was the Messiah promised, a teacher come from God, the great prophet. There were many who were convinced he was that prophet that should come into the world who yet did not cordially receive his doctrine. It is possible for men to acknowledge that Christ is that prophet, and yet to turn a deaf ear to him.

I. Christ's retirement from the multitude.

1. What induced him to retire; because he perceived that those who acknowledged him to be that prophet would come, and take him by force, to make him a king, v. 15. Now here we have an instance,

(1) Of the irregular zeal of some of Christ's followers; nothing would serve but they would make him a king. This was an act of zeal for the honour of Christ. They were concerned to see so great a benefactor to the world so little esteemed in it; and therefore they would make him a king. Those whom Christ has feasted with the royal dainties of heaven should, in return for his favour, make him their king, and set him upon the throne in their souls. It was an irregular zeal. It was grounded upon a mistake concerning the nature of Christ's kingdom, as if it were to be of this world, and he must appear with outward pomp. Such a king as this they would make him, which was as great a disparagement to his glory as it would be to lacker gold or paint a ruby. Right notions of Christ's kingdom would keep us to right methods for advancing it. It was excited by the love of the flesh; they would make him their king who could feed them so plentifully without their toil, and save them from the curse of eating their bread in the sweat of their face. It was intended to carry on a secular design; they hoped this might be a fair opportunity of shaking off the Roman yoke. Thus is religion often prostituted to a secular interest, and Christ is served only to serve a turn. Jesus is usually sought after for something else, not for his own sake. It was contrary to the mind of our Lord Jesus himself; for they would take him by force, whether he would or no.

(2) Of the humility of the Lord Jesus, that he departed; so far was he from countenancing the design that he effectually quashed it. Herein he has left a testimony against ambition and affectation of worldly honour. Let us not then covet to be the idols of the crowd, nor be desirous of vain-glory. It is a testimony also against faction and sedition, treason and rebellion, and whatever tends to disturb the peace of kings and provinces. Whither he retired: He departed again into a mountain, into the mountain, the mountain where he had preached (v. 3), and then returned to it alone, to be private. Christ chose sometimes to be alone for the more free converse with God, and our own souls are never less alone, than when alone.

II. The disciples' distress at sea.

1. Here is their going down to the sea in a ship (v. 16, 17): When even was come, and they had done their day's work, it was time to look homeward, and therefore they went aboard, and set sail for Capernaum.

2. Here is the stormy wind arising. They had lately been feasted at Christ's table: but after the sunshine of comfort expect a storm. It was now dark. Sometimes the people of God are in trouble, and cannot see their way out; in the dark concerning the cause of their trouble, concerning the design and tendency of it, and what the issue will be. Jesus was not come to them. The absence of Christ is the great aggravation of the troubles of Christians. The sea rose by reason of a great wind. It was calm and fair when they put to sea, but it arose when they were at sea. In times of tranquillity we must prepare for trouble, for it may arise when we little think of it. Clouds and darkness sometimes surround the children of the light, and of the day.

3. Here is Christ's seasonable approach to them, v. 19. They had rowed about twenty-five or thirty furlongs. And, when they were got off a good way at sea, they see Jesus walking on the sea. The power Christ has over the laws and customs of nature. Christ walked upon the water as upon dry land. The concern Christ has for his disciples in distress: He drew nigh to the ship. He will not leave them comfortless when they seem to be tossed with tempests and not comforted. The relief Christ gives to his disciples in their fears. They were afraid, more afraid of an apparition (for so they supposed him to be) than of the winds and waves. When they thought a demon haunted them, they were more terrified than they had been while they saw nothing in it but what was natural. Our real distresses are often much increased by our imaginary ones. We are often not only worse frightened than hurt, but then most frightened when we are ready to be helped. How affectionately did Christ silence their fears with that compassionate word (v. 20), It is I, be not afraid! Nothing more powerful to comfort saints than this, "I am Jesus whom thou lovest; be not afraid of me, nor of the storm." When trouble is nigh Christ is nigh.

4. Here is their speedy arrival at the port they were bound for, v. 17. They welcomed Christ into the ship; they willingly received him. Christ's absenting himself for a time is but so much the more to endear himself, at his return, to his disciples. Christ brought them safely to the shore: Immediately the ship was at the land whither they went. The ship of the church may be much shattered and distressed, yet it shall come safe to the harbour at last. The disciples had rowed hard, but could not make their point till they had got Christ in the ship, and then the work was done suddenly. If we have received Christ Jesus the Lord, though the night be dark and the wind high, yet we may comfort ourselves with this, that we shall be at shore shortly, and are nearer to it than we think we are.

Verses 22–27

I. The careful enquiry which the people made after Christ, v. 23, 24. They saw Christ retire to the mountain. They way-laid his return, and the day following,

1. They were much at a loss for him. He was gone, and they knew not what was become of him. They saw there was no boat there but that in which the disciples went off. They observed also that Jesus did not go with his disciples, but that they went off alone.

2. They were very industrious in seeking him. They searched the places thereabouts, and when they saw that Jesus was not there, nor his disciples, they resolved to search elsewhere. Those whom Christ has feasted with the bread of life should have their souls carried out in earnest desires towards him. Much would have more, in communion with Christ. They resolved to go to Capernaum in quest of him. Thither his disciples were gone; and they knew he would not be long absent from them. Providence favoured them with an opportunity of going thither, for there came other boats from Tiberias, nigh to the place where they did eat bread. Those that in sincerity seek Christ are commonly owned and assisted by Providence in those pursuits. The evangelist adds, After that the Lord had given thanks, v. 11. So much were the disciples affected with their Master's giving thanks that they could never forget the impressions made upon them by it. This was the grace and beauty of that meal, and made it remarkable; their hearts burned within them.

3. They also took shipping, and came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus. Their convictions being strong, and their desires warm, they followed him. Good motions are often crushed, and come to nothing, for want of being prosecuted in time. They came to Capernaum, and, for aught that appears, had a calm and pleasant passage, while his sincere disciples had a rough and stormy one. It is not strange if it fare worst with the best men in this evil world. They came, seeking Jesus.

II. The success of this enquiry: They found him on the other side of the sea, v. 25. It is worth while to cross a sea to seek Christ, if we may but find him at last. These people appeared afterwards to be unsound, and not actuated by any good principle, and yet were thus zealous. If men have no more to show for their love to Christ than their running after sermons and prayers, and their pangs of affection to good preaching, they have reason to suspect themselves no better than this eager crowd. But though these people were no better principled, and Christ knew it, yet he was willing to be found of them.

III. The question they put to him: Rabbi, when camest thou hither? It should seem by v. 59 that they found him in the synagogue. There they found him, and all they had to say to him was, Rabbi, when camest thou hither? Their enquiry refers not only to the time, but to the manner, of his conveying himself thither; not only When, but "How camest thou hither?" They were curious in asking concerning Christ's motions, but not solicitous to observe their own.

IV. The answer Christ gave them, such an answer as their case required.

1. He discovers the corrupt principle they acted from in following him (v. 26): "Verily, verily, I say unto you. You seek me; that is well, but it is not from a good principle." Christ knows not only what we do, but why we do it. Not because you saw the miracles. It was for their own bellies' sake: Because you did eat of the loaves, and were filled; not because he taught them, but because he fed them. He had given them a full meal's meat: They did eat, and were filled; and some of them perhaps were so poor that they had not known of a long time before now what it was to have enough, to eat and leave. A cheap meal's meat, that cost them nothing. Many follow Christ for loaves, and not for love. These people complimented Christ with Rabbi, yet he told them thus faithfully of their hypocrisy; his ministers must hence learn not to flatter those that flatter them, but to give faithful reproofs where there is cause for them.

2. He directs them to better principles (v. 27): Labour for that meat which endures to everlasting life. His design is,

(1) To moderate our worldly pursuits: Labour not for the meat that perishes. We must not make the things of this world our chief care and concern. The things of the world are meat that perishes. Worldly wealth, honour, and pleasure, are meat; they feed the fancy (and many times this is all) and fill the belly. These are things which men hunger after as meat. Those that have the largest share of them are not sure to have them while they live, but are sure to leave them and lose them when they die. It is therefore folly for us inordinately to labour after them. We must not make these perishing things our chief good.

(2) To quicken and excite our gracious pursuits: "Labour for that meat which belongs to the soul." It is unspeakably desirable: It is meat which endures to everlasting life; it is a happiness which will last as long as we must, which not only itself endures eternally, but will nourish us up to everlasting life. It is undoubtedly attainable. It is that which the Son of man shall give. First, Who gives this meat: the Son of man, who has power to give eternal life, with all the means of it. We are told to labour for it, as if it were to be got by our own industry, and sold upon that valuable consideration. But, when we have laboured ever so much for it, we have not merited it as our hire, but the Son of man gives it. And what more free than gift? Secondly, What authority he has to give it; for him has God the Father sealed. He has sealed him, that is, has given him full authority to deal between God and man, as God's ambassador to man and man's intercessor with God, and has proved his commission by miracles.

Verses 28–59

He gave them leave to ask him questions, and did not resent the interruption as an affront. Those that would be apt to teach must be swift to hear, and study to answer.

I. They enquire what work they must do, and he answers them, v. 28, 29. Their enquiry was pertinent enough (v. 28): What shall we do, that we may work the works of God? A humble serious question, showing them to be, at least for the present, in a good mind, and willing to know and do their duty. They were convinced that those who would obtain this everlasting meat, (1) Must aim to do something great. Those who look high in their expectations, must aim high in those endeavours, and study to do the works of God, distinguished from the works of worldly men in their worldly pursuits. It is not enough to speak the words of God, but we must do the works of God. (2) Must be willing to do anything: What shall we do? Lord, I am ready to do whatever thou shalt appoint. Christ's answer was plain enough (v. 29): This is the work of God that ye believe. The work of faith is the work of God. They enquire after the works of God (in the plural number), being careful about many things; but Christ directs them to the one thing needful; that you believe. Without faith you cannot please God. That faith is the work of God which closes with Christ; to rest upon him, and resign ourselves to him.

II. Christ having told them that the Son of man would give them this meat, they enquire concerning him.

1. Their enquiry is after a sign (v. 30): What sign showest thou? Thus far they were right, that, since he required them to give him credit, he should produce his credentials. But herein they missed it,

(1) That they overlooked the many miracles which they had seen wrought by him. Is this a time of day to ask, "What sign showest thou?" especially at Capernaum, where he had done so many mighty works. Were not these very persons but the other day miraculously fed by him? None so blind as they that will not see.

(2) That they preferred the miraculous feeding of Israel in the wilderness before all the miracles Christ wrought (v. 31): Our fathers did eat manna in the desert. They quote a scripture for it: He gave them bread from heaven. What a good use might be made of this story to which they here refer! Yet see how these people perverted it, and made an ill use of it. Christ reproved them for their fondness of the miraculous bread, and bade them not set their hearts upon meat which perisheth. Under colour of magnifying the miracles of Moses, they tacitly undervalue this miracle of Christ. Christ fed them but once, and then reproved those who followed him in hope to be still fed. Moses fed his followers forty years, and miracles were not their rarities, but their daily bread: Christ fed them with bread out of the earth, barley-bread, and fishes out of the sea; but Moses fed Israel with bread from heaven, angel's food. Thus big did these Jews talk of the manna which their fathers did eat; but their fathers had slighted it, and called it light bread, Num. xxi. 5. Thus apt are we to slight and overlook the appearances of God's power and grace in our own times, while we pretend to admire the wonders of which our fathers told us.

2. Here is Christ's reply to this enquiry. It was true that their fathers did eat manna in the desert. But, it was not Moses that gave it to them, he was but the instrument, and therefore they must look beyond him to God. Moses gave them not either that bread or that water. He informs them concerning the true manna: But my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven; the bread from heaven is now given, not to your fathers, but to you, for whom the better things were reserved: he is now giving you that bread from heaven, which is truly so called.

III. Christ, having replied to their enquiries, takes further occasion to discourse of himself under the similitude of bread, and of believing under the similitude of eating and drinking; to which, together with his putting both together in the eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood, and with the remarks made upon it by the hearers, the rest of this conference may be reduced.

1. Christ having spoken of himself as the great gift of God, and the true bread (v. 32), largely explains and confirms this. He here shows that he is the true bread; this he repeats again and again, v. 33, 35, 48–51. Observe, (1) That Christ is bread, is that to the soul which bread is to the body; it is the staff of life. Our bodies could better live without food than our souls without Christ. (2) That he is the bread of God (v. 33), divine bread; the bread of God's family, his children's bread. (3) That he is the bread of life (v. 35, and again, v. 48), that bread of life. Christ is the bread of life, for he is the fruit of the tree of life. He is the living bread (so he explains himself, v. 51): I am the living bread. Bread is itself a dead thing, but Christ is himself living bread, and nourishes by his own power. Christ is ever living, everlasting bread. The doctrine of Christ crucified is now as strengthening and comforting to a believer as ever it was. He gives life unto the world (v. 33). The manna did only preserve and support life. Christ gives life to those that were dead in sin. The manna was ordained only for the life of the Israelites, but Christ is given for the life of the world. (4) That he is the bread which came down from heaven; this is often repeated here, v. 33, 50, 51, 58. This denotes, the divinity of Christ's person; the divine original of all that good which flows to us through him. (5) That he is that bread of which the manna was a type and figure (v. 58), the true bread, v. 32. There was manna enough for them all; so in Christ a fulness of grace for all believers; he that gathers much of this manna will have none to spare when he comes to use it, and he that gathers little, when his grace comes to be perfected in glory, shall find that he has no lack. He here shows what his undertaking was, giving us an account of his business among men, v. 38–40. He came from heaven upon his Father's business (v. 38), not to do his own will, but the will of him that sent him. He came from heaven; we may well ask with wonder, "What moved him to such an expedition?" Here he tells us that he came to do, not his own will, but the will of his Father. "I am come to do the will of him that sent me." He came into the world as God's great agent and the world's great physician. The scope of his whole life was to glorify God and do good to men. He acquaints us, in particular, with that will of the Father which he came to do.

First, The private instructions given to Christ to save all the chosen remnant; and this is the covenant of redemption between the Father and the Son (v. 38): This is the Father's will, who hath sent me; that of all whom he hath given me I should lose none. There is a certain number of the children of men given by the Father to Jesus Christ, to be his care, and so to be to him for a name and a praise. Those whom God chose to be the objects of his special love he lodged as a trust in the hands of Christ. Jesus Christ has undertaken that he will lose none of those that were thus given him of the Father. Christ's undertaking for those that are given him extends to the resurrection of their bodies. I will raise it up again at the last day. Christ's undertaking will never be accomplished till the resurrection. The spring and original of all this is the sovereign will of God.

Secondly, The public instructions which were to be given to the children of men, upon what terms, they might obtain salvation by Christ; and this is the covenant of grace between God and man. Who the particular persons were that were given to Christ is a secret. Though their names are concealed, their characters are published. An offer is made that by it those that were given to Christ might be brought to him (v. 40): "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one that sees the Son, and believes on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up." Is it not reviving to hear this? Eternal life may be had, if it be not our own fault. The crown of glory is set before us as the prize of our high calling, which we may run for and obtain. Every one may have it. This everlasting life is sure to all those who believe in Christ. He that sees the Son, and believes on him, shall be saved. I rather understand seeing here to mean the same thing with believing. Everyone that sees the Son, that is, believes on him, sees him with an eye of faith. It is not a blind faith that Christ requires, that we should be willing to have our eyes put out, and then follow him, but that we should see him, and see what ground we go upon in our faith. Those who believe in Jesus Christ, shall be raised up by his power at the last day. He had it in charge as his Father's will (v. 39), and here he solemnly makes it his own undertaking: I will raise him up.

2. Now Christ discoursing thus concerning himself, as the bread of life that came down from heaven, let us see what remarks his hearers made upon it.

(1) When they heard of such a thing as the bread of God, which gives life, they heartily prayed for it (v. 34): Lord, evermore give us this bread. I take this request to be made, though ignorantly, yet honestly, and to be well meant. General and confused notions of divine things produce some kind of desires towards them. Those who have an indistinct knowledge of the things of God, who see men as trees walking, make, as I may call them, inarticulate prayers for spiritual blessings. They think the favour of God a good thing, and heaven a fine place, while they have no value nor desire at all for that holiness which is necessary.

(2) But, when they understood that by this bread of life Jesus meant himself, then they despised it. They murmured at him. This comes in immediately after that solemn declaration which Christ had made of God's will and his own undertaking concerning man's salvation (v. 39, 40), which certainly were some of the most weighty and gracious words that ever proceeded out of the mouth of our Lord Jesus. One would think that when they heard that God had thus visited them, they should have bowed their heads and worshipped; but on the contrary, they murmured, quarrelled with what Christ said. Many that will not professedly contradict the doctrine of Christ yet say in their hearts that they do not like it. That which offended them was Christ's asserting his origin to be from heaven, v. 41, 42. How is it that he saith, I came down from heaven? That which they thought justified them herein was that they knew his extraction on earth: Is not this Jesus the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? They took it amiss that he should say that he came down from heaven, when he was one of them.

3. Christ, having spoken of faith as the great work of God (v. 29), discourses largely concerning this work.

(1) He shows what it is to believe in Christ. He that comes to me is the same with him that believes in me (v. 35), and again (v. 37): He that comes unto me; so v. 44, 45. Repentance towards God is coming to him as our chief good and highest end; and so faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ is coming to him as our prince and Saviour, and our way to the Father. When he was here on earth it was more than barely coming where he was; so it is now more than coming to his word and ordinances. It is to feed upon Christ (v. 51): If any man eat of this bread. The former denotes applying ourselves to Christ; this denotes applying Christ to ourselves.

(2) He shows what is to be got by believing in Christ. What shall we be the better if we feed upon him? Want and death are the chief things we dread. They shall never want, never hunger, never thirst, v. 35. Desires they have, earnest desires, but these so abundantly satisfied, that they cannot be called hunger and thirst, which are uneasy and painful. They shall never die, not die eternally. He that believes on Christ has everlasting life (v. 47). Union with Christ and communion with God in Christ are everlasting life begun. Whereas they that did eat manna died, Christ is such bread as a man may eat of and never die, v. 49, 50. [1] The insufficiency of the typical manna: Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. Those that did eat manna, angel's food, died, like other men. Many of them died for their unbelief and murmurings. Their eating manna was no security to them from the wrath of God, as believing in Christ is to us. The rest of them died in a course of nature, and their carcases fell in that wilderness where they did eat manna. Let them not then boast so much of manna. [2] The all-sufficiency of the true manna: This is the bread that cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die. Not die, that is, not perish, not come short of the heavenly Canaan. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever, v. 51. This is the meaning of this never dying: though he go down to death, he shall pass through it to that world where there shall be no more death. To live for ever is not to be for ever, but to be happy for ever.

(3) He shows what encouragements we have to believe in Christ. Christ here speaks of some who had seen him and yet believed not, v. 36. Faith is not always the effect of sight; the soldiers were eye-witnesses of his resurrection, and yet, instead of believing in him, they belied him. Two things, to encourage our faith: That the Son will bid all those welcome that come to him (v. 37): Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. How welcome should this word be to our souls which bids us welcome to Christ! The duty required is a pure gospel duty: to come to Christ, that we may come to God by him. His beauty and love must draw us to him; sense of need and fear of danger must drive us to him; anything to bring us to Christ. The promise is a pure gospel promise: I will in no wise cast out. There are two negatives: I will not, no, I will not. Much favour is expressed here. We have reason to fear that he should cast us out. We may justly expect that he should frown upon us, and shut his doors against us; but he obviates these fears with this assurance, he will not do it; will not reject us though we are sinful. More favour is implied than is expressed; when it is said that he will not cast them out the meaning is, He will receive them, and give them all that which they come to him for. That the Father will, without fail, bring all those to him in due time that were given him.

First, He here assures us that this shall be done: All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, v. 37. Christ had complained (v. 36) of those who, though they had seen him, yet would not believe on him; and then he adds this for their conviction and awakening. How can we think that God gave us to Christ if we give ourselves to the world and the flesh? For his own comfort and encouragement he adds: All that the Father gives him shall come to him. Here we have, (a) The election described: All that the father giveth me, and all that belongs to them; all their services, all their interests. As all that he has is theirs, so all that they have is his. God was now about to give him the heathen for his inheritance (Ps. ii. 8). And though the Jews, who saw him, believed not on him, yet these (saith he) shall come to me; the other sheep, which are not of this fold, shall be brought, ch. x. 15, 16. (b) The effect of it secured: They shall come to me. This is not in the nature of a promise, but a prediction. None of them shall be forgotten; not a grain of God's corn shall be lost. They are by nature alienated from Christ, and averse to him, and yet they shall come. Not, They shall be driven to me, but, They shall come freely, shall be made willing.

Secondly, How shall those who are given to Christ be brought to him? Two things are to be done in order to it:

a. Their understandings shall be enlightened; this is promised, v. 45, 46. It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God; they shall all know me. In order to our believing in Jesus Christ, it is necessary that we be taught of God. That there be a divine revelation made to us. There are some things which even nature teaches, but to bring us to Christ there is need of a higher light. That there be a divine work wrought in us. God, in giving us reason, teaches us more than the beasts of the earth; but in giving us faith he teaches more than the natural man. All that are genuine, are taught of God; he hath undertaken their education. It follows then, by way of inference from this, that every man that has heard and learned of the Father comes to Christ, v. 45. Except God by his grace enlighten our minds and not only tell us, that we may hear, but teach us, that we may learn the truth as it is in Jesus, we shall never be brought to believe in Christ. Those who do not come to Christ have never heard nor learned of the Father; for, if they had, doubtless they would have come to Christ. In vain do men pretend to be taught of God if they believe not in Christ. But lest any should dream of a visible appearance of God the Father, he adds (v. 46): Not that any man hath seen the Father. God, in enlightening men's eyes and teaching them, works in a spiritual way. The Father of spirits hath access to, and influence upon, men's spirits, undiscerned. Those that have not seen his face have felt his power. Those that learn of the Father must learn of Christ, who alone hath seen him.

b. Their wills shall be bowed. In the depraved soul of fallen man there is a rebellion of the will against the right dictates of the understanding. It is therefore requisite that there be a work of grace wrought upon the will, which is here called drawing (v. 44): No man can come to me except the Father, who hath sent me, draw him. The Jews murmured at the doctrine of Christ. Christ said (v. 43), "Murmur not among yourselves; lay not the fault of your dislike of my doctrine one upon another. Your antipathies to the truths of God are so strong that nothing less than a divine power can conquer them. No man can come to me except the Father, who hath sent me, draw him," v. 44. (a) The nature of the work: It is drawing, which denotes not a force put upon the will, but a change wrought in the will. A new bias is given to the soul, by which it inclines to God. He that formed the spirit of man knows how to new-mould the soul. (b) The necessity of it: No man, in this weak and helpless state, can come to Christ without it. (c) The author of it: The Father who hath sent me. The Father would not send him on a fruitless errand. So, having sent Christ to save souls, he sends souls to him to be saved by him. (d) The crown and perfection of this work: And I will raise him up at the last day. This is four times mentioned in this discourse. If he undertakes this, surely he can do anything. Let our expectations be carried out towards a happiness reserved for the last day.

4. Christ comes more particularly to show what of himself is this bread, v. 51–58, where he still prosecutes the metaphor of food. The bread that I will give is my flesh (v. 51), the flesh of the Son of man and his blood, v. 53. His flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed, v. 53. We must eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood (v. 53); and again (v. 54), Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood; and the same words (v. 56, 57), he that eateth me.

(1) Let us see how this discourse of Christ was liable to mistake and misconstruction. It was misconstrued by the carnal Jews (v. 52): They strove among themselves: How can this man give us his flesh to eat? Christ spoke (v. 51) of giving his flesh for us, to suffer and die; but they understood it of his giving it to us, to be eaten. It is misunderstood by many who hence infer that, if they take the sacrament when they die, they shall certainly go to heaven.

(2) Let us see how this discourse of Christ is to be understood.

[1] What is meant by the flesh and blood of Christ. It is called (v. 53), The flesh of the Son of man, and his blood. It is said to be given for the life of the world, that is, First, Instead of the life of the world, which was forfeited by sin, Christ gives his own flesh as a ransom. Secondly, In order to the life of the world, to purchase a general offer of eternal life to all the world. So that the flesh and blood of the Son of man denote Christ and him crucified, and the redemption wrought out by him. The promises of the covenant, and eternal life; these are called the flesh and blood of Christ, 1. Because they are purchased by the breaking of his body, and the shedding of his blood. 2. Because they are meat and drink to our souls. He had before compared himself to bread, which is necessary food; here to flesh, which is delicious. It is meat indeed, and drink indeed; in opposition to the shows and shadows with which the world shams off those that feed upon it.

[2] What is meant by eating this flesh and drinking this blood. It is certain that it means neither more nor less than believing in Christ. Believing in Christ includes these four things, which eating and drinking do: First, It implies an appetite to Christ. This spiritual eating and drinking begins with hungering and thirsting (Matt. v. 6): "Give me Christ or else I die." Secondly, An application of Christ to ourselves. Meat looked upon will not nourish us, but meat fed upon. We must so accept of Christ as to appropriate him to ourselves. Thirdly, A delight in Christ and his salvation. The doctrine of Christ crucified must be meat and drink to us, most pleasant and delightful. Fourthly, A derivation of nourishment from him and a dependence upon him for the support and comfort of our spiritual life, and the strength, growth, and vigour of the new man. It is to live upon him as we do upon our meat. When afterwards he would institute some outward sensible signs, by which to represent our communicating of the benefits of his death, he chose those of eating and drinking, and made them sacramental actions.

(3) Having thus explained the general meaning of this part of Christ's discourse, the particulars are reducible to two heads:

[1] The necessity of our feeding upon Christ (v. 53): Except you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, you have no life in you. First, It is a certain sign that you have no spiritual life in you if you have no desire towards Christ, nor delight in him. If the soul does not hunger and thirst, certainly it does not live. Secondly, It is certain that you can have no spiritual life, unless you derive it from Christ by faith; separated from him you can do nothing. Our bodies may as well live without meat as our souls without Christ.

[2] The benefit and advantage of it, in two things: First, We shall be one with Christ (v. 56): He that eats my flesh, and drinks my blood, he dwelleth in me, and I in him. By faith we have a close and intimate union with Christ; he is in us, and we in him. Such is the union between Christ and believers that he shares in their griefs, and they share in his graces and joys; he sups with them upon their bitter herbs, and they with him upon his rich dainties.

Secondly, We shall live, shall live eternally, by him. We shall live by him (v. 57): As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. True believers receive this divine life by virtue of their union with Christ. He that eateth me, or feeds on me, even he shall live by me: those that live upon Christ shall live by him. Because he lives, we shall live also. We shall live eternally by him (v. 54): Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, he hath eternal life. He shall live for ever, v. 58.

Lastly, The historian concludes with an account where Christ had this discourse with the Jews (v. 59): In the synagogue as he taught. This was that in his discourse which was new. Christ pleaded this upon his trial (ch. xviii. 20): I ever taught in the synagogue.

Verses 60–71

We have here an account of the effects of Christ's discourse.

I. To some it was a savour of death unto death; not only to the Jews, but even to many of his disciples.

1. Their murmurings at the doctrine they heard (v. 60); not a few, but many of them, were offended at it. See what they say to it (v. 60): This is a hard saying, who can hear it? They do not like it themselves. Now, when they found it a hard saying, if they had humbly begged of Christ to have declared unto them this parable, he would have opened it, and their understandings too. They think it impossible that anyone else should like it: "Who can hear it? Surely none can." Thus the scoffers at religion are ready to undertake that all the intelligent part of mankind concur with them. Thanks be to God, thousands have heard these sayings of Christ, and have found them not only easy, but pleasant.

2. Christ's animadversions upon their murmurings.

(1) He well enough knew their murmurings, v. 61. Christ knew them; he saw them, he heard them. He knew it in himself, not by any information given him, but by his own divine omniscience. Thoughts are words to Christ; we should therefore take heed not only what we say and do, but what we think.

(2) He well enough knew how to answer them: "Doth this offend you?" We may justly wonder that so much offence should be taken at the doctrine of Christ for so little cause. Christ speaks of it here with wonder: "Doth this offend you?" He gives them a hint of his ascension into heaven, as that which would give an irresistible evidence of the truth of his doctrine (v. 62): What and if you shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before? If this be so hard a saying that you cannot hear it, how will you digest it when I tell you of my returning to heaven, whence I came down? Those who stumble at smaller difficulties should consider how they will get over greater. "You think I take too much upon me when I say, I came down from heaven, for it was with this that you quarrelled (v. 42); but will you think so when you see me return to heaven?" Christ did often refer himself thus to subsequent proofs. He gives them a general key to this and all such parabolical discourses, teaching them that they are to be understood spiritually: It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing, v. 63. The bare participation of ordinances, unless the Spirit of God work with them, and quicken the soul by them, profits nothing; the word and ordinances, if the Spirit works with them, are as food to a living man, if not, they are as food to a dead man. The doctrine of eating Christ's flesh and drinking his blood, if it be understood literally, profits nothing. The spiritual sense of meaning of it quickens the soul, makes it alive and lively: The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life. To believe that Christ died for me, to derive from that doctrine strength and comfort, this is the spirit and life of that saying, and, construing it thus, it is an excellent saying. The reason why men dislike Christ's sayings is because they mistake them. The literal sense of a parable does us no good, we are never the wiser for it. The flesh profits nothing; but the Spirit quickeneth. They found fault with Christ's sayings, whereas the fault was in themselves; it is only to sensual minds that spiritual things are senseless and sapless, spiritual minds relish them, see 1 Cor. ii. 14, 15. He gives them an intimation of his knowledge of them, and that he had expected no better from them, though they called themselves his disciples, v. 64, 65.

First, They did not believe his report. Among those who are nominal Christians, there are many who are real infidels. The unbelief of hypocrites is naked and open before the eyes of Christ. He knew from the beginning who they were that believed, and who of the twelve should betray him; who were sincere, as Nathanael (ch. i. 47), and who were not. It is Christ's prerogative to know the heart; he knows who they are that believe not, but dissemble in their profession. If we pretend to judge men's hearts, we step into Christ's throne. We are often deceived in men, and see cause to change our sentiments of them.

Secondly, The reason why they did not believe his report was because the arm of the Lord was not revealed to them (v. 65): Therefore said I unto you that no man can come to me, except it be given unto him of my Father; referring to v. 44. There he had said that none could come to him, except the Father draw him; here he saith, except it be given him of my Father, which shows that God draws souls by giving them grace and strength, and a heart to come.

3. We have here their final apostasy from Christ hereupon: From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him, v. 66: the backsliding of these disciples. They had entered themselves in Christ's school, but they went back, did not only play truant for once, but took leave of him. Here were many that went back. It is often so; when some backslide many backslide with them; the disease is infectious. The occasion of this backsliding: From that time, from the time that Christ preached this comfortable doctrine, that he is the bread of life, and that those who by faith feed upon him shall live by him. The corrupt and wicked heart of man often makes that an occasion of offence which is indeed matter of the greatest comfort. That which is the undoubted word and truth of Christ must be faithfully delivered, whoever may be offended at it. Men's humours must be captivated to God's word, and not God's word accommodated to men's. The degree of their apostasy: They walked no more with him, returned no more to him and attended no more upon his ministry.

II. This discourse was to others a savour of life unto life. Many went back, but, thanks be to God, all did not.

1. The affectionate question which Christ put to the twelve (v. 67): Will you also go away? He saith nothing to those who went back. It was no great loss of those whom he never had; lightly come, lightly go; but he takes this occasion to speak to the twelve, to confirm them: Will you also go away? (1) "It is at your choice whether you will or no; if you will forsake me, now is the time, when so many do." Christ will detain none with him against their wills; his soldiers are volunteers, not pressed men. The twelve had now had time enough to try how they liked Christ and his doctrine. He here allows them a power of revocation, and leaves them at their liberty. (2) "It is at your peril if you do go away." They have not been so intimate with me as you have been, nor received so many favours from me; they are gone, but will you also go? The nearer we have been to Christ and the longer we have been with him, the more mercies we have received from him the greater will be our sin if we desert him. (3) "I have reason to think you will not. I hope better things of you, for you are they that have continued with me," Luke xxii. 28. Christ and believers know one another too well to part upon every displeasure.

2. The believing reply which Peter, in the name of the rest, made to this question, v. 68, 69. Peter was upon all occasions the mouth of the rest, not so much because he had more of his Master's ear than they, but because he had more tongue of his own; and what he said was sometimes approved and sometimes reprimanded (Matt. xvi. 17, 23)—the common lot of those who are swift to speak. Here is a good resolution to adhere to Christ: "Lord, to whom shall we go? No, Lord, we like our choice too well to change." Those who leave Christ would do well to consider to whom they will go. "Whither shall we go? Shall we make our court to the world? It will certainly deceive us. Shall we return to sin? It will certainly destroy us. Shall we leave the fountain of living waters for broken cisterns?" The disciples resolve to continue their pursuit of life and happiness, and will adhere to Christ as their guide. "If ever we find the way to happiness, it must be in following thee." Let those who find fault with this religion find a better before they quit it. Here is a good reason for this resolution. It was not the inconsiderate resolve of a blind affection, but the result of mature deliberation. The disciples were resolved never to go away from Christ because of the advantage they promised themselves by him: Thou hast the words of eternal life. The word of his doctrine showed the way to eternal life, and directed us what to do, that we might inherit it. His having the words of eternal life is the same with his having power to give eternal life. He had in the foregoing discourse assured eternal life to his followers; these disciples fastened upon this plain saying, and therefore resolved to stick to him, when the others overlooked this, and fastened upon the hard sayings, and therefore forsook him. Though we cannot account for every mystery, every obscurity, in Christ's doctrine, yet we know that it is the word of eternal life, and therefore must live and die by it. Because of the assurance they had concerning him (v. 69): We believe, and are sure, that thou art that Christ. The doctrine they believed: that this Jesus was the Messiah promised to the fathers, and that he was not a mere man, but the Son of the living God. The degree of their faith: it rose up to a full assurance: We are sure. When we have so strong a faith in the gospel of Christ as boldly to venture our souls upon it, then, and not till then, we shall be willing to venture everything else for it.

3. The melancholy remark which our Lord Jesus made upon this reply of Peter's (v. 70, 71): Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? And the evangelist tells us whom he meant: he spoke of Judas Iscariot. Peter had undertaken for them all that they would be faithful to their Master. Now Christ does not condemn his charity (it is always good to hope the best), but he tacitly corrects his confidence. We must not be too sure concerning any. God knows those that are his; we do not. Hypocrites and betrayers of Christ are no better than devils. Judas, into whose heart Satan entered, and filled it, is called a devil. Many that are seeming saints are real devils. It is strange; and to be wondered at; Christ speaks of it with wonder: Have not I? It is sad, and to be lamented. The disguises of hypocrites however they may deceive men cannot deceive Christ. Christ's divine sight, far better than any double sight, can see spirits. There are those who are chosen by Christ to special services who yet prove false to him: I have chosen you and yet one of you is a devil. In the most select societies on this side heaven it is no new thing to meet with those that are corrupt. Of the twelve that were chosen to an intimate conversation with an incarnate Deity, one was an incarnate devil. The historian lays an emphasis upon this, that Judas was one of the twelve that were so dignified and distinguished. Let us not reject the twelve because one of them is a devil. There is a society within the veil into which no unclean thing shall enter.

CHAP. VII

I. Christ's declining for some time to appear publicly in Judæa, ver. 1. II. His design to go up to Jerusalem at the feast of tabernacles, and his discourse with his kindred in Galilee concerning his going up to this feast, ver. 2–13. III. His preaching publicly in the temple at that feast. 1. In the midst of the feast, ver. 14, 15. (1) Concerning his doctrine, ver. 16–18. (2) Concerning the crime of sabbath-breaking laid to his charge, ver. 19–24. (3) Concerning himself, both whence he came and whither he was going, ver. 25–36. 2. On the last day of the feast. (1) His gracious invitation to poor souls to come to him, ver. 37–39. (2) The reception that it met with. [1] Many of the people disputed about it, ver. 40–44. [2] The chief priests would have brought him into trouble for it (ver. 45–49), but were silenced by one of their own court, ver. 50–53.

Verses 1–13

I. The reason given why Christ spent more of his time in Galilee than in Judæa (v. 1): because the Jews, the people in Judæa and Jerusalem, sought to kill him, for curing the impotent man on the sabbath day, ch. v. 16. It is not said, He durst not, but, He would not, walk in Jewry; it was not through fear and cowardice that he declined it, but in prudence, because his hour was not yet come. Christ will withdraw from those that drive him from them. In times of imminent peril it is not only allowable, but advisable, to withdraw, and to choose the service of those places which are least perilous, Matt. x. 23. If the providence of God casts persons of merit into places of obscurity and little note, it must not be thought strange; it was the lot of our Master himself. He did not sit still in Galilee, but walked; he went about doing good. When we cannot do what and where we would, we must do what and where we can.

II. The approach of the feast of tabernacles (v. 2), one of the three solemnities which called for the personal attendance of all the males at Jerusalem. This feast was still religiously observed. Divine institutions are never antiquated, nor go out of date, by length of time: nor must wilderness mercies ever be forgotten.

III. Christ's discourse with his brethren. They interposed to advise him in his conduct.

1. Their ambition and vain-glory in urging him to make a more public appearance than he did: "Depart hence," said they, "and go into Judæa" (v. 3).

(1) They give two reasons for this advice: That it would be an encouragement to those in and about Jerusalem. They would have had the disciples there particularly countenanced, and thought the time he spent among his Galilean disciples wasted and thrown away, and his miracles turning to no account unless those at Jerusalem saw them. That it would be for the advancement of his name, There is no man that does anything in secret if he himself seeks to be known openly. They took it for granted that Christ sought to make himself known: "If thou do these things, venture abroad, and show thyself to the world. It is high time to think of being great."

(2) The evangelist notes it is an evidence of their infidelity: For neither did his brethren believe in him (v. 5). They that hear his word and keep it are the kindred he values. There were those who were akin to Christ according to the flesh who did believe in him, and yet others did not believe in him.

(3) What was there amiss in the advice which they gave him? It was a sign that they did not believe him able to guide them, when they did not think him sufficient to guide himself. They discovered a great carelessness about his safety, when they would have him go to Judæa, where they knew the Jews sought to kill him. Perhaps they were weary of his company in Galilee, and this was, in effect, a desire that he would depart out of their coasts. They tacitly reproach him as mean-spirited, that he durst not trust himself upon the stage of public action, which, if he had any courage and greatness of soul, he would do, and not sneak thus and skulk in a corner. They seem to question the truth of the miracles he wrought, in saying, "If thou do these things, if they will bear the test of a public scrutiny in the courts above, produce them there." They think Christ altogether such a one as themselves, and as desirous as they to make a fair show in the flesh. Self was at the bottom of all;

if he would make himself as great as he might, they, being his kinsmen, should share in his honour. Many go to public ordinances, only to show themselves, and all their care is to make a good appearance.

2. The prudence and humility of our Lord Jesus, v. 6–8. Though there were so many base insinuations in it, he answered them mildly. We should learn of our Master to reply with meekness, and where it is easy to find much amiss, to seem not to see it, and wink at the affront.

(1) He shows the difference between himself and them, in two things: [1] His time was set, so was not theirs: My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready. Those who live useless lives have their time always ready; they can go and come when they please. But those whose time is filled up with duty will often find themselves straitened, and they have not yet time for that which others can do at any time. The confinement of business is a thousand times better than the liberty of idleness. We, who are ignorant and short-sighted, are apt to prescribe to him. The present time is our time, but he is fittest to judge, and, it may be, his time is not yet come. Therefore wait with patience for his time. [2] His life was sought, so was not theirs, v. 7. They, in showing themselves to the world, did not expose themselves: "The world cannot hate you, for you are of the world." Unholy souls, whom the holy God cannot love, the world that lies in wickedness cannot hate; but Christ, in showing himself to the world, laid himself open to the greatest danger; for me it hateth. Christ was not only slighted, but hated. But why did the world hate Christ? "Because" (saith he), "I testify of it, that the works of it are evil." The works of an evil world are evil works; as the tree is, so are the fruits. It is a great uneasiness and provocation to the world to be convicted of the evil of its works. Whatever is pretended, the real cause of the world's enmity to the gospel is the testimony it bears against sin and sinners. It is better to incur the world's hatred, by testifying against its wickedness, than gain its goodwill by going down the stream with it.

(2) He dismisses them, with a design to stay behind for some time in Galilee (v. 8): Go you up to this feast, I go not up yet. He allows their going to the feast. He denies them his company. Those who go to ordinances for ostentation, or to serve some secular purpose, go without Christ, and will speed accordingly. If the presence of Christ go not with us, to what purpose should we go up? When we are going to, or coming from, solemn ordinances, it becomes us to be careful what company we have and choose, lest the coal of good affections be quenched by corrupt communications. I go not up yet to this feast; he does not say, I will not go up at all, but not yet. The reason he gives is, My time is not yet fully come.

3. Christ's continuance in Galilee till his full time was come, v. 9. He, saying these things to them, abode still in Galilee. He would not depart from his own purpose. It becomes the followers of Christ thus to be steady, and not to use lightness.

4. His going up to the feast when his time was come. (1) When he went: When his brethren were gone up. He went up after them. His carnal brethren went up first, and then he went. It is not, Who comes first? that will be the question, but, Who come fittest? If we bring our hearts with us, it is no matter who gets before us. (2) How he went, as if he were hiding himself: not openly, but as it were in secret. Provided the work of God be done effectually, it is best done when done with least noise. We may do the work of God privately, and yet not do it deceitfully.

5. The great expectation that there was of him among the Jews at Jerusalem, v. 11–14. They could not but think of him (v. 11): The Jews sought him at the feast, and said, Where is he? They hoped the feast would bring him to Jerusalem, and then they should see him. If an opportunity of acquaintance with Christ come to their door, they can like it well enough. They sought him at the feast. Those who would see Christ at a feast must seek him there. Perhaps it was his enemies that were thus waiting an opportunity to seize him. They said, Where is he?—where is that fellow? Thus scornfully and contemptibly do they speak of him. When they should have welcomed the feast as an opportunity of serving God, they were glad of it as an opportunity of persecuting Christ. The people differed much in their sentiments concerning him (v. 12): There was much murmuring, or muttering, rather among the people concerning him. The enmity of the rulers against Christ caused him to be so much the more talked of. This ground the gospel of Christ has got by the opposition made to it. By being everywhere spoken against, it has come to be everywhere spoken of, and by this means has been spread the further. This murmuring was not against Christ, but concerning him; some murmured at the rulers, because they did not countenance and encourage him: others murmured at them, because they did not silence and restrain him. Christ and his religion have been, and will be, the subject of much controversy, and debate, Luke xii. 51, 52. But the noise and rencounter of liberty and business are preferable, surely, to the silence and agreement of a prison. Some said, He is a good man. This was a truth, but it was far short of being the whole truth. He was the Son of God. Many who have no ill thoughts of Christ have yet low thoughts of him, they do not say enough. Even those who would not believe him to be the Messiah could not but own he was a good man. Others said, Nay, but he deceiveth the people; if this had been true, he had been a very bad man. It must be taken for granted that there was some undiscovered cheat at the bottom, because it was the interest of the chief priests to oppose him and run him down. They were frightened by their superiors from speaking much of him (v. 13): No man spoke openly of him, for fear of the Jews. Either, they durst not openly speak well of him. Or they durst not speak at all of him openly. Because nothing could justly be said against him, they would not suffer anything to be said of him.

Verses 14–36

I. Christ's public preaching in the temple (v. 14): He went up into the temple, and taught. His sermon is not recorded. But that which is observable here is that it was about the midst of the feast. Why did he not go to the temple sooner, to preach? Because the people would have more leisure to hear him when they had spent some days in their booths. Because he would choose to appear when both his friends and his enemies had done looking for him. But why did he appear thus publicly now? Surely it was to shame his persecutors. By showing that he did not fear them; by taking their work out of their hands. Their office was to teach the people in the temple. But they taught for doctrines the commandments of men, and therefore he goes up to the temple and teaches the people.

II. His discourse with the Jews hereupon.

1. Concerning his doctrine.

(1) How the Jews admired it (v. 15): They marvelled, saying, How knoweth this man letters, having never learned? Our Lord Jesus was not educated in the schools of the prophets, or at the feet of the rabbin. Having received the Spirit without measure, he needed not to receive any knowledge from man, or by man. Christ had letters, though he had never learned them. It is necessary that Christ's ministers should have learning, and since they cannot expect to have it by inspiration, they must take pains to get it in an ordinary way. Christ's having learning, though he had not been taught it, made him truly great and wonderful. Some, it is likely, took notice of it to his honour. Others, probably, mentioned it in disparagement and contempt of him: Whatever he seems to have, he cannot really have any true learning, for he was never at the university, nor took his degree. Some perhaps suggested that he had got his learning by magic arts. Since they know not how he could be a scholar, they will think him a conjuror.

(2) What he asserted concerning it; three things:

[1] That his doctrine is divine (v. 16): My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. They were offended because he undertook to teach though he had never learned, in answer to which he tells them that his doctrine was such as was not to be learned. It was a divine revelation. "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me; it does not centre in myself, nor lead ultimately to myself, but to him that sent me."

[2] That the most competent judges are those that with a sincere and upright heart desire and endeavour to do the will of God (v. 17): If any man be willing to do the will of God he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God or whether I speak of myself. First, What the question is, concerning the doctrine of Christ, whether it be of God or no. Christ himself was willing to have his doctrine enquired into, much more should his ministers. Secondly, Who are likely to succeed in this search: those that do the will of God, at least are desirous to do it. Who they are that will do the will of God. Such as are resolved by the grace of God, when they find out what the will of God is, to conform to it. Whence it is that such a one shall know of the truth of Christ's doctrine. Christ has promised to give knowledge to such; he hath said, He shall know. Those who improve the light they have shall be secured by divine grace. He that is inclined to submit to the rules of the divine law is disposed to admit the rays of divine light.

[3] That hereby it appeared that Christ, as a teacher, did not speak of himself, v. 18. See here the character of a deceiver: he seeketh his own glory, which is a sign that he speaks of himself. Here is the description of the cheat: they speak of themselves, and have no commission nor instructions from God; no warrant but their own will, no inspiration but their own imagination. They consult purely their own glory; self-seekers are self-speakers. Those who speak from God will speak for God, and for his glory. See the contrary character Christ gives of himself and his doctrine: He that seeks his glory that sent him, he is true. He was sent of God. Those teachers, and those only, who are sent of God, are to be received and entertained by us. He sought the glory of God. It was both the tendency of his doctrine and the tenor of his whole conversation to glorify God. This was a proof that he was true. False teachers are most unrighteous; they are unjust to God whose name they abuse, and unjust to the souls of men whom they impose upon. But Christ made it appear that he was true, that he was really what he said he was.

2. They discourse concerning the crime that was laid to his charge for curing the impotent man, and bidding him carry his bed on the sabbath day. He argues against them by way of recrimination, v. 19. How could they for shame censure him for a breach of the law of Moses, when they themselves were such notorious breakers of it? Did not Moses give you the law? But it was their wickedness that none of them kept the law. Their neglect of the law was universal: None of you keepeth it. They boasted of the law, and pretended a zeal for it, and yet none of them kept it; like those who say that they are for the church, and yet never go to church. It was an aggravation of their wickedness, in persecuting Christ; "None of you keepeth the law, why then go ye about to kill me for not keeping it?" Those are commonly most censorious of others who are most faulty themselves. Those that support themselves and their interest by persecution and violence, whatever they pretend, are not keepers of the law of God.

Here the people rudely interrupted him (v. 20): Thou hast a devil; who goes about to kill thee? This intimates the good opinion they had of their rulers, who, they think, would never attempt so atrocious a thing as to kill him. The ill opinion they had of our Lord Jesus: "Thou hast a devil, thou art possessed with a lying spirit, and art a bad man for saying so"; so some: or rather, "Thou art melancholy, and art a weak man; thou frightenest thyself with causeless fears." Not only open frenzies, but silent melancholies were then commonly imputed to the power of Satan. "Thou art crazed, hast a distempered brain." Let us not think it strange if the best of men are put under the worst of characters. Those who would be like Christ must put up with affronts, must not regard them, much less resent them, and least of all revenge them. He argues by way of appeal and vindication.

(1) He appeals to their own sentiments of this miracle: "I have done one work, and you all marvel, v. 21. You cannot choose but marvel at it as truly great."

(2) He appeals to their own practice in other instances: "I have done one work on the sabbath, and you all marvel, you make a mighty strange thing of it, that a religious man should dare do such a thing. If it be lawful for you, nay, and your duty, to circumcise a child on the sabbath day, much more was it lawful and good for me to heal a diseased man on that day."

First, The rise and origin of circumcision: Moses gave you circumcision. Circumcision is said to be given, and (v. 23) they are said to receive it. The ordinances of God, and particularly those which are seals of the covenant, are gifts given to men, and are to be received as such. Moses did not give it them, but God; nay, it was not of Moses first, but of the fathers, v. 22. It was ordained long before, for it was a seal of the righteousness of faith, and was part of that blessing of Abraham which was to come upon the Gentiles.

Secondly, The respect paid to the law of circumcision above that of the sabbath. If a child was born one sabbath day it was without fail circumcised the next.

Thirdly, The inference Christ draws hence in justification of himself (v. 23): A man-child on the sabbath day receives circumcision, that the law of circumcision might not be broken. "Now, if this be allowed by yourselves, how unreasonable are you, who are angry with me because I have made a man every whit whole on the sabbath day!" It was a spiteful anger, anger with gall in it. It is very absurd and unreasonable for us to condemn others for that in which we justify ourselves. Observe the comparison Christ here makes between their circumcising a child and his healing a man on the sabbath day. Circumcision was but a ceremonial institution. What Christ did was a good work by the law of nature. Circumcision made sore; but what Christ did made whole. Whereas, when they had circumcised a child, their care was only to heal up that part which was circumcised, which might be done and yet the child remain under other illnesses, Christ had made this man every whit whole. I have made the whole man healthful and sound. The whole body was healed. Nay, Christ not only healed his body, but his soul too, by that admonition, Go, and sin no more, and so indeed made the whole man sound.

He concludes this argument with that rule (v. 24): Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment. This may be applied, either,

First, In particular, to this work. Be not partial in your judgment; judge not with respect of persons. Or, Secondly, In general, to Christ's person and preaching, which they were offended at. Those things that are false commonly appear best when they are judged of according to the outward appearance, they appear most plausible prima facie—at the first glance. It was this that gained the Pharisees such an interest and reputation, that they appeared right unto men (Matt. xxiii. 27, 28), and men judged of them by that appearance. "But," saith Christ, "be not too confident that all are real saints who are seeming ones." Those who undertook to judge whether he was the Son of God or no by his outward appearance were not likely to judge righteous judgment. If a divine power accompanied him, and God bore him witness, and the scriptures were fulfilled in him, they ought to receive him, and to judge by faith, and not by the sight of the eye. We must not judge concerncerning any by their outward appearance, not by their titles, the figure they make in the world, and their fluttering show, but by their intrinsic worth, and the gifts and graces of God's Spirit in them.

3. Christ discourses with them here concerning himself, whence he came, and whither he was going, v. 25 36.

(1) Whence he came, v. 25–31.

[1] The objection concerning this stated by some of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, who seem to have been of all others most prejudiced against him, v. 25. Our Lord Jesus has often met with the least welcome from those that one would expect the best from. But it was not without some just cause that it came into a proverb. The nearer the church the further from God.

First, Reflecting on the rulers, because they let him alone: Is not this he whom they seek to kill? "Why do they not do it then? Lo, he speaketh boldly, and they say nothing to him; do the rulers know indeed that this is the very Christ?" v. 26. Here they slyly and maliciously insinuate two things, to exasperate the rulers against Christ. a. That by conniving at his preaching they brought their authority into contempt. "If our rulers will suffer themselves to be thus trampled upon, they may thank themselves if none stand in awe of them." The worst of persecutions have often been carried on under colour of the necessary support of authority and government. b. That hereby they brought their judgment into suspicion: Do they know that this is the Christ? It is spoken ironically. "How came they to change their mind?" When religion and the profession of Christ's name are out of fashion, and consequently out of repute, many are strongly tempted to persecute and oppose them, only that they may not be thought to favour them and incline to them. It was strange that the rulers, thus irritated, did not seize Christ; but his hour was not yet come; and God can tie men's hands to admiration, though he should not turn their hearts.

Secondly, By their exception against his being the Christ, in which appeared more malice than matter, v. 27. "We have this argument against it, that we know this man, whence he is; but when Christ comes no man knows whence he is." They despised him because they knew whence he was. Familiarity breeds contempt, and we are apt to disdain the use of those whom we know the rise of. Christ's own received him not, because he was their own, for which very reason they should the rather have loved him.

[2] Christ's answer to this objection, v. 28, 29. He spoke freely and boldly, he cried in the temple, as he taught; to express his earnestness, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts. There may be a vehemency in contending for the truth where yet there is no intemperate heat nor passion. We may instruct gainsayers with warmth, and yet with meekness. Whoever has ears to hear, let him hear this. His answer to their cavil is, a. By way of concession, "You both know me, and you know whence I am. You know me, you think you know me; but you are mistaken; you take me to be the carpenter's son, and born at Nazareth, but it is not so." b. By way of negation, denying that that which they did see in him, and know of him, was all that was to be known. He will tell them what they knew not, from whom he came. (a) That he did not come of himself. (b) That he was sent of his Father; this is twice mentioned. (c) That he was from his Father as the beams from the sun. (d) That the Father who sent him is true; he had promised to give the Messiah. He that made the promise is true, and has performed it. He is true, and will fulfil the promise in the calling of the Gentiles. (e) That these unbelieving Jews did not know the Father: He that sent me, whom you know not. There is much ignorance of God even with many that have a form of knowledge; and the true reason why people reject Christ is because they do not know God. (f) Our Lord Jesus was intimately acquainted with the Father that sent him: but I know him. He was not at all in doubt concerning his mission from him, nor at all in the dark concerning the work he had to do.

[3] The provocation which this gave to his enemies, v. 30. They sought therefore to take him. But nobody touched him, because his hour was not yet come. God has wicked men in a chain. The malice of persecutors is impotent even when it is most impetuous, and, when Satan fills their hearts, yet God ties their hands. God's servants are sometimes wonderfully protected by indiscernible unaccountable means. Christ had his hour set. So have all his people and all his ministers. Nor can all the powers of hell and earth prevail against them, until they have finished their testimony.

[4] The good effect which Christ's discourse had upon some of his hearers (v. 31): Many of the people believed on him. Even where the gospel meets with opposition there may yet be a great deal of good done. Who they were that believed; not a few, but many, more than one would have expected when the stream ran so strongly the other way. But these many were of the people. We must not measure the prosperity of the gospel by its success among the great ones; nor must ministers say that they labour in vain, though none but the poor receive the gospel. What induced them to believe: the miracles which he did. How weak their faith was: they do not positively assert, as the Samaritans did, This is indeed the Christ, but they only argue, When Christ comes will he do more miracles than these? "Therefore why may not this be he?" They believe it, but have not courage to own it. Even weak faith may be true faith, and so accepted, by the Lord Jesus.

(2) Whither he was going, v. 32–36.

[1] The design of the Pharisees and chief priests against him, v. 32. The provocation given them was that they had information brought them by their spies, that the people murmured such things concerning him, that there were many who had a respect and value for him. Though the people did but whisper these things, yet the Pharisees were enraged at it. The Pharisees were sensible that if Christ did thus increase they must decrease. The project they laid hereupon was to seize Jesus, and take him into custody: They sent officers to take him. The most effectual way to disperse the flock is to smite the shepherd. The Pharisees as such, had no power, and therefore they got the chief priests to join with them. As the world by wisdom knew not God, so the Jewish church by their wisdom knew not Christ.

[2] The discourse of our Lord Jesus hereupon (v. 33, 34): Yet a little while I am with you, and then

I go to him that sent me; you shall seek me, and shall not find me; and where I am, thither you cannot come. These words, like the pillar of cloud and fire, have a bright side and a dark side.

First, They have a bright side towards our Lord Jesus himself. Three things Christ here comforted himself with: That he had but a little time to continue here in this troublesome world. His warfare will shortly be accomplished. Whomsoever we are with in this world, friends or foes, it is but a little while that we shall be with them. We must be awhile with those that are pricking briars and grieving thorns; but thanks be to God, it is but a little while, and we shall be out of their reach. That he should go to him that sent him. When I have done my work with you, then, and not till then, I go to him that sent me. Let those who suffer for Christ comfort themselves with this, that they have a God to go to, and are going to him, to be for ever with him. That none of their persecutions could follow him to heaven: You shall seek me, and shall not find me. It adds to the happiness of glorified saints that they are out of the reach of the devil and all his wicked instruments.

Secondly, These words have a black and dark side towards those that hated and persecuted Christ. They now longed to be rid of him. According to their choice so shall their doom be. He will not trouble them long, yet a little while and he will depart from them. They that are weary of Christ need no more to make them miserable than to have their wish. They would certainly repent their choice when it was too late. They should in vain seek the presence of the Messiah: "You shall seek me, and shall not find me." Those who now seek Christ shall find him, but the day is coming when those who now refuse him shall seek him, and shall not find him. They should in vain expect a place in heaven: Where I am, and where all believers shall be with me, thither ye cannot come. They are disabled by their own iniquity and infidelity: You cannot come, because you will not. Indeed heaven would be no heaven to them.

[3] Their descant upon this discourse (v. 35, 36): They said among themselves; Whither will he go? First, Their wilful ignorance and blindness. He had expressly said whither he would go—to him that sent him, to his Father in heaven, and yet they ask, Whither will he go? and, What manner of saying is this? Secondly, Their daring contempt of Christ's threatenings. Instead of trembling at that terrible word, You shall seek me, and not find me, they banter it and make a jest of it. Thirdly, Their inveterate malice and rage against Christ. All they dreaded in his departure was that he would be out of the reach of their power: "Whither will he go, that we shall not find him?" Fourthly, Their proud disdain of the Gentiles, whom they here call the dispersed of the Gentiles. Will he make his court to them? "Will he go and teach the Gentiles? Will he carry his doctrine to them?" So common is it for those who have lost the power of religion to be very jealous for the monopoly of the the name. They now made a jest of his going to teach the Gentiles; but not long after he did it in good earnest by his apostles and ministers.

I. Christ's discourse, with the explication of it, v. 37–39. It is probable that these are only short hints of what he enlarged upon, but they have in them the substance of the whole gospel; here is a gospel invitation to come to Christ, and a gospel promise of comfort and happiness in him.

1. When he gave this invitation: On the last day of the feast of tabernacles, that great day. Much people were gathered together, and, if the invitation were given to many, it might be hoped that some would accept of it. The people were now returning to their homes, and he would give them this to carry away with them as his parting word. When a great congregation is about to scatter, it is affecting to think that in all probability they will never come all together again in this world, and therefore, if we can say or do anything to help them to heaven, that must be the time. It is good to be lively at the close of an ordinance. Christ made this offer on the last day of the feast. He will try them once more, and, if they will yet hear his voice, they shall live. It would be half a year before there would be another feast, and in that time they would many of them be in their graves. Behold now is the accepted time.

2. How he gave this invitation: Jesus stood and cried, which denotes his great earnestness and importunity. Love to souls will make preachers lively. His desire was that all might take notice, and take hold of this invitation. He stood, and cried, that he might the better be heard. The heathen oracles were delivered privately by them that peeped and muttered; but the oracles of the gospel were proclaimed by one that stood, and cried.

3. The invitation itself is very general: If any man thirst, whoever he be, he is invited to Christ. It is also very gracious: "If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink. If any man desires to be truly and eternally happy, let him apply himself to me."

(1) The persons invited are such as thirst, which may be understood, either, [1] Of the indigence of their cases; either as to their outward condition (let his poverty and afflictions draw him to Christ for that peace which the world can neither give nor take away), or as to their inward state: "If any man want spiritual blessings, he may be supplied by me." Or, [2] Of the inclination of their souls and their desires towards a spiritual happiness. If any man hunger and thirst after righteousness.

(2) The invitation itself: Let him come to me. Let him go to Christ as the fountain of living waters.

(3) The satisfaction promised: Let him come and drink, he shall have that which will not only refresh, but replenish.

4. A gracious promise annexed to this gracious call (v. 38): He that believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow: (1) See here what it is to come to Christ: It is to believe on him, as the scripture hath said. We must not frame a Christ according to our fancy, but believe in a Christ according to the scripture. (2) See how thirsty souls, that come to Christ, shall be made to drink. Israel drank of the rock that followed them, but believers drink of a rock in them, Christ in them. Provision is made not only for their present satisfaction, but for their continual perpetual comfort. Living water, running water, which the Hebrew language calls living, because still in motion. The graces and comforts of the Spirit are compared to living (meaning running) water: Rivers of living water. The comfort flows in both plentifully and constantly as a river; strong as a stream to bear down the oppositions of doubts and fears. These flow out of his heart or soul. There gracious principles are planted; and out of the heart, in which the Spirit dwells, flow the issues of life. Where there are springs of grace and comfort in the soul they will send forth streams. Grace and comfort will evidence themselves. A holy heart will be seen in a holy life; the tree is known by its fruits, and the fountain by its streams. They will communicate themselves for the benefit of others; a good man is a common good.

Those words, as the scripture hath said, seem to refer to some promise in the Old Testament to this purport, and there are many. It was a custom of the Jews which they received by tradition, the last day of the feast of tabernacles to have a solemnity, which they called the pouring out of water. They fetched a golden vessel of water from the pool of Siloam, brought it into the temple with sound of trumpet and other ceremonies, and, upon the ascent to the altar, poured it out before the Lord with all possible expressions of joy. It is thought that our Saviour might here allude to this custom. Believers shall have the comfort, not of a vessel of water fetched from a pool, but of a river flowing from themselves.

5. Here is the evangelist's exposition of this promise (v. 39): This spoke he of the Spirit, of the gifts, graces, and comforts of the Spirit. It is promised to all that believe on Christ that they shall receive the Holy Ghost. Some received his miraculous gifts; all receive his sanctifying graces. The Spirit dwelling and working in believers is as a fountain of living running water, out of which plentiful streams flow, cooling and cleansing as water, mollifying and moistening as water, making them fruitful, and others joyful. This plentiful effusion of the Spirit was yet the matter of a promise; for the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified. It was certain that he should be glorified, but he was as yet in a state of humiliation and contempt. And, if Christ must wait for his glory, let not us think it much to wait for ours. The Holy Ghost was not yet given. If we compare the clear knowledge and strong grace of the disciples of Christ themselves, after the day of Pentecost, with their darkness and weakness before, we shall understand in what sense the Holy Ghost was not yet given; the earnests and first-fruits of the Spirit were given, but the full harvest was not yet come. The Holy Ghost was not yet given in such rivers of living water as should issue forth to water the whole earth, even the Gentile world. The reason why the Holy Ghost was not given was because Jesus was not yet glorified. The death of Christ is sometimes called his glorification; for in his cross he conquered and triumphed. The gift of the Holy Ghost was purchased by the blood of Christ: the Holy Ghost was not given. There was not so much need of the Spirit, while Christ himself was here upon earth, as there was when he was gone. Though the Holy Ghost was not yet given, yet he was promised. Though the gifts of Christ's grace are long deferred, while we are waiting for the good promise, we have the promise to live upon.

II. The consequents of this discourse. In general, it occasioned differences: There was a division among the people because of him, v. 43. There were diversities of opinions, and those managed with heat and contention; various sentiments, and those such as set them at variance. Think we that Christ came to send peace. No, the effect of the preaching of his gospel would be division, for, while some are gathered to it others will be gathered against it. This is no more the fault of the gospel than it is the fault of a wholesome medicine that it stirs up the peccant humours in the body, in order to the discharge of them.

1. Some were taken with him: Many of the people, when they heard this saying, could not but think highly of him. Some of them said, Of a truth this is the prophet, the harbinger and forerunner of the Messiah. Others went further, and said, This is the Christ (v. 41), the Messiah himself. We do not find that these people became his disciples and followers; a good opinion of Christ is far short of a lively faith in Christ; many give Christ a good word that give him no more.

2. Others were prejudiced against him. No sooner was this great truth started, that Jesus is the Christ, than immediately it was contradicted and argued against. That his rise and origin were (as they took it for granted) out of Galilee, was thought enough to answer all the arguments for his being the Christ. For, shall Christ come out of Galilee? Has not the scripture said that Christ comes of the seed of David? See here, (1) A laudable knowledge of the scripture. This even the common people knew by the traditional expositions which their scribes gave them. Many that espouse some corrupt notions, seem to be very ready in the scriptures, when indeed they know little more than those scriptures which they have been taught to pervert. (2) A culpable ignorance of our Lord Jesus. They speak of it as certain and past dispute that Jesus was of Galilee, whereas by enquiring they might have known that he was the Son of David, and a native of Bethlehem.

3. Others were enraged against him, and they would have taken him, v. 44. Though what he said was most sweet and gracious, yet they were exasperated against him for it. They would have taken him; but no man laid hands on him, because his hour was not come. As the malice of Christ's enemies is always unreasonable, so sometimes the suspension of it is unaccountable.

Verses 45-53

The chief priests and Pharisees are here contriving how to suppress Christ; though this was the great day of the feast, they attended not the religious services of the day. They sat in the council-chamber, expecting Christ to be brought a prisoner to them, as they had issued out warrants for apprehending him, v. 32.

I. What passed between them and their own officers, who returned without him.

1. The reproof they gave the officers for not executing the warrant they gave them: Why have you not brought him? It vexed them that those who were their own creatures should thus disappoint them.

2. The reason which the officers gave: Never man spoke like this man, v. 46. This was a very great truth, that never any man spoke with that wisdom, and power, and grace, that convincing clearness, and that charming sweetness, wherewith Christ spoke. The very officers that were sent to take him were taken with him, and acknowledged this. They could not but prefer him before all those that sat in Moses's seat. Thus Christ was preserved by the power God has upon the consciences even of bad men. They said this to their lords and masters, who could not endure to hear anything that tended to the honour of Christ and yet could not avoid hearing this. Their own officers, who could not be suspected to be biassed in favour of Christ, are witnesses against them.

3. The Pharisees endeavour to secure their officers to their interest, and to beget in them prejudices against Christ. They suggest two things: (1) That if they embrace the gospel of Christ they will deceive themselves (v. 47): Are you also deceived? Christianity has, from its first rise, been represented to the world as a great cheat upon it, and they that embraced it as men deceived, then when they began to be undeceived, observe what a compliment the Pharisees paid to these officers: "Are you also deceived? What! men of your sense?" They endeavour to prejudice them against Christ by persuading them to think well of themselves. (2) That they will disparage themselves. Most men, even in their religion, are willing to be governed by the example of those of the first rank; these officers therefore, are desired to consider,

(1) That, if they become disciples of Christ, they go contrary to those who were persons of quality and reputation: "Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on him?" Some of the rulers did embrace Christ and more believed in him, but wanted courage to confess him (ch. xii. 42); but, when the interest of Christ runs low in the world, it is common for its adversaries to represent it as lower than really it is. The cause of Christ has seldom had rulers and Pharisees on its side. Self-denial and the cross are hard lessons to rulers and Pharisees. This has confirmed many in their prejudices against Christ, that the rulers and Pharisees have been no friends. If rulers and Pharisees do not believe in Christ, they that do believe in him will be the most singular, unfashionable, ungenteel people in the world. Thus are people foolishly willing to be damned for fashion-sake.

(2) That they will link themselves with the despicable vulgar sort of people (v. 43): But this people, who know not the law, are cursed. First, How scornfully and disdainfully they speak of them: This people. As the wisdom of God has often chosen base things, and things which are despised, so the folly of men has commonly debased and despised those whom God has chosen. Secondly, How unjustly they reproach them: They know not the law. Perhaps many of those whom they thus despised knew the law, and the prophets too, better than they did. Many a plain, honest, unlearned disciple of Christ attains to a more clear, sound, and useful knowledge of the word of God, than some great scholars with all their wit and learning. Whose fault was it but theirs, who should have taught them better? Thirdly, How magisterially they pronounce sentence upon them: they are cursed. We are unable to try, and therefore unfit to condemn, and our rule is, Bless, and curse not. They use this odious word, they are cursed, to express their own indignation, and to frighten their officers from having anything to do with them.

II. What passed between them and Nicodemus, v. 50, &c.

1. The just and rational objection which Nicodemus made against their proceedings.

(1) Who it was that appeared against them; it was Nicodemus, he that came to Jesus by night, being one of them, v. 50. Though he had been with Jesus, and taken him for his teacher, yet he retained his place in the council, and his vote among them. Some impute this to his weakness and cowardice. It seems rather to have been his wisdom not immediately to throw up his place, because there he might have opportunity of serving Christ, and stemming the tide of the Jewish rage. God has his remnant among all sorts, and many times finds, or puts, or makes, some good in the worst places and societies. Though at first he came to Jesus by night, for fear of being known; yet, when there was occasion, he boldly appeared in defence of Christ, and opposed the whole council. Thus many believers who at first were timorous have at length, by divine grace, grown courageous. Let none justify the disguising of their faith by the example of Nicodemus, unless, like him, they be ready openly to appear in the cause of Christ, though they stand alone in it; for so Nicodemus did here, and ch. xix. 39.

(2) What he alleged against their proceedings (v. 51): Doth our law judge any man before it hear him and know what he doeth? He prudently argues from the principles of their own law, and an incontestable rule of justice, that no man is to be condemned unheard. Whereas they had reproached the people, as ignorant of the law, he here tacitly retorts the charge upon themselves. The law is here said to judge, and hear, and know. It is highly fit that none should come under the sentence of the law, till they have first undergone the scrutiny of it. Judges have two ears, to remind them to hear both sides. Persons are to be judged, not by what is said of them, but by what they do. Facts, and not faces, must be known in judgment; and the scale of justice must be used before the sword of justice.

2. What was said to this objection. Here is no direct reply given to it. What was lacking in reason they made up in railing and reproach. Whoever are against reason give cause to suspect that reason is against them. See how they taunt him: Art thou also of Galilee? (v. 52).

(1) How false the grounds of their arguing were. They suppose that Christ was of Galilee, and this was false. They suppose that because most of his disciples were Galileans they were all such. They suppose that out of Galilee no prophet had risen, yet this was false too.

(2) How absurd their arguings were upon these grounds. Is any man of worth and virtue ever the worse for the poverty and obscurity of his country? Supposing no prophet had risen out of Galilee, yet it is not impossible that any should arise thence.

3. The hasty adjournment of the court hereupon. They broke up the assembly in confusion, and with precipitation, and every man went to his own house. All the policy of the close cabal was broken to pieces with one plain honest word. They were not willing to hear Nicodemus, because they could not answer him.

CHAP. VIII

I. Christ's evading the snare which the Jews laid for him, in bringing to him a woman taken in adultery, ver. 1–11. II. Divers discourses or conferences of his with the Jews. 1. Concerning his being the light of the world, ver. 12–20. 2. Concerning the ruin of the unbelieving Jews, ver. 21–30. 3. Concerning liberty and bondage, ver. 31–37. 4. Concerning his Father and their father, ver. 38–47. 5. Here is his discourse in answer to their blasphemous reproaches, ver. 48–50. 6. Concerning the immortality of believers, ver. 51–59.

Verses 1–11

I. His retirement in the evening out of the town (v. 1): He went unto the mount of olives. He went out of Jerusalem, perhaps because he had no friend there that had either kindness or courage enough to give him a night's lodging; while his persecutors had houses of their own to go to (ch. vii. 53). In the daytime, when he had work to do in the temple, he willingly exposed himself. But in the night, he withdrew into the country, and sheltered himself there.

II. His return in the morning to the temple, and to his work there, v. 2.

1. What a diligent preacher Christ was: Early in the morning he came again, and taught. Three things were taken notice of here concerning Christ's preaching. (1) The time: Early in the morning. When a day's work is to be done for God and souls it is good to take the day before us. (2) The place: In the temple; not so much because it was a consecrated place as because it was not a place of concourse. (3) His posture: He sat down, and taught, as one having authority.

2. How diligently his preaching was attended upon: All the people came unto him. Though the rulers were displeased at those that came to hear him, yet they would come; and he taught them, though they were angry at him too.

III. His dealing with those that brought to him the woman taken in adultery, tempting him.

1. The case proposed to him by the scribes and Pharisees, who herein contrived to pick a quarrel with him, v. 3–6.

(1) They set the prisoner to the bar (v. 3): they brought him a woman taken in adultery. Those that were taken in adultery were by the Jewish law to be put to death. The scribes and Pharisees bring her to Christ, and set her in the midst of the assembly, as if they would leave her wholly to the judgment of Christ.

(2) They prefer an indictment against her: Master, this woman was taken in adultery, v. 4. Here they call him Master whom but the day before they had called a deceiver. The crime for which the prisoner stands indicted is no less than adultery. The Pharisees seemed to have a great zeal against the sin, when it appeared afterwards that they themselves were not free from it. It is common for those that are indulgent to their own sin to be severe against the sins of others. The proof of the crime, an incontestable proof; she was taken in the act. Sometimes it proves a mercy to sinners to have their sin brought to light. Better our sin should shame us than damn us.

(3) They produce the statute in this case upon which she was indicted, v. 5. Moses in the law commanded that such should be stoned. Adultery is an exceedingly sinful sin. It is the violation of a divine institution in innocency, by the indulgence of one of the basest lusts of man in his degeneracy.

(4) They pray his judgment in the case: "But what sayest thou, who pretendest to be a teacher come from God to repeal old laws and enact new ones?" If they had asked this question in sincerity, it had been very commendable. But this they said tempting him, that they might have to accuse him, v. 6. If he should confirm the sentence of the law, they would censure him as inconsistent with himself (he having received publicans and harlots) and with the character of the Messiah, who should be meek, and have salvation. If he should acquit her they would represent him, First, As an enemy to the law of Moses. Secondly, As a friend to sinners and, consequently a favourer of sin; than which no reflection could be more invidious upon one that professed the strictness, purity, and business of a prophet.

2. The method he took to resolve this case, and so to break this snare.

(1) He seemed to slight it, and turned a deaf ear to it: He stooped down, and wrote on the ground. It is impossible to tell, and therefore needless to ask, what he wrote; but this is the only mention made in the gospels of Christ's writing. Christ by this teaches us to be slow to speak when difficult cases are proposed to us, not quickly to shoot our bolt. Think twice before we speak once. But, when Christ seemed as though he heard them not, he made it appear that he not only heard their words, but knew their thoughts.

(2) He turned the conviction of the prisoner upon the prosecutors, v. 7.

[1] They continued asking him, and his seeming not to take notice of them made them the more vehement; for now they thought sure enough that they had run him aground. Therefore they pushed on their appeal to him with vigour; whereas they should have construed his disregard of them as a check to their design, and an intimation to them to desist.

[2] At last he put them all to shame and silence with one word: He lifted up himself and said unto them, He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. He neither reflected upon the law nor excused the prisoner's guilt, nor did he on the other hand encourage the prosecution or countenance their heat. When we cannot make our point by steering a direct course, it is good to fetch a compass. They came with design to accuse him, but they were forced to accuse themselves. He here refers to that rule which the law of Moses prescribed in the execution of criminals, that the hand of the witnesses must be first upon them (Deut. xvii. 7), as in the stoning of Stephen, Acts vii. 58. Christ puts it to them whether, according to their own law, they would dare to be the executioners. Durst they take away that life with their hands which they were now taking away with their tongues? He builds upon an uncontested maxim in morality. They are not better than self-condemned who judge others, and yet themselves do the same thing: "If there be any of you who is without sin, let him cast the first stone at her." Whenever we find fault with others, we ought to reflect upon ourselves, and to be more severe against sin in ourselves than in others. We ought to be favourable, though not to the sins, yet to the persons, of those that offend, considering ourselves and our own corrupt nature. Let this restrain us from throwing stones at our brethren. Those that are any way obliged to animadvert upon the faults of others are concerned to look well to themselves, and keep themselves pure. If you are without sin, stand to the charge, and let the adulteress be executed; but, if not, though she be guilty, while you that present her are equally so, according to your own rule she shall be free. He aimed to bring, not only the prisoner to repentance, by showing her his mercy, but the prosecutors too, by showing them their sins. They sought to ensnare him; he sought to convince and convert them.

[3] Having given them this startling word, he left them to consider of it, and again stooped down, and wrote on the ground, v. 8. The matter was lodged in their own breasts, let them make the best of it there. Some Greek copies here read, He wrote on the ground, the sins of everyone of them. But he does not write men's sins in the sand; no, they are written as with a pen of iron (Jer. xvii. 1), never to be forgotten till they are forgiven.

[4] The scribes and Pharisees were so strangely thunderstruck with the words of Christ that they let fall their persecution of Christ, whom they durst no further tempt, and their prosecution of the woman, whom they durst no longer accuse (v. 9): They went out one by one. Perhaps his writing on the ground frightened them, as the handwriting on the wall frightened Belshazzar. Happy they who have no reason to be afraid of Christ's writing! What he said frightened them by sending them to their own consciences; he had shown them to themselves, and they were afraid his next word would show them to the world. They went out one by one, that they might go out softly; they went away by stealth, as people being ashamed. The order of their departure is taken notice of, beginning at the eldest. If the eldest quit the field, and retreat ingloriously, no marvel if the younger follow them. 1. The force of the word of Christ for the conviction of sinners: They who heard it were convicted by their own consciences. Conscience is God's deputy in the soul, and one word from him will set it on work, Heb. iv. 12. Even scribes and Pharisees are by the power of Christ's word made to retire with shame. 2. The folly of sinners under these convictions. It is folly for those that are under convictions to make it their principal care to avoid shame. Our care should be more to save our souls than to save our credit. The scribes and Pharisees had the wound opened, and now they should have been desirous to have it searched, and then it might have been healed. It is folly for those that are under convictions to get away from Jesus Christ, for he is the only one that can heal the wounds of conscience. To whom will they go?

[5] When the self-conceited prosecutors quitted the field, the self-condemned prisoner stood her ground: Jesus was left alone and the woman standing in the midst, where they set her, v. 3. She did not seek to make her escape. Her prosecutors had appealed unto Jesus, and to him she would go. Those whose cause is brought before our Lord Jesus will never have occasion to remove it into any other court. Our cause is lodged in the gospel court; we are left with Jesus alone, it is with him only that we have now to deal. Let his gospel rule us, and it will infallibly save us.

[6] Here is the conclusion of the trial: Jesus lifted up himself, and he saw none but the woman, v. 10, 11. The woman, it is likely, stood trembling at the bar, as one doubtful of the issue. Christ was without sin, and might cast the first stone; but though none more severe than he against sin, none more compassionate than he to sinners, for he is infinitely gracious and merciful, and this poor malefactor finds him so. The prosecutors are called: Where are those thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee? He asked, that he might shame them, who declined his judgment, and encourage her who resolved to abide by it. They do not appear when the question is asked: Hath no man condemned thee? She said, No man, Lord. She speaks respectfully to Christ, calls him Lord, but is silent concerning her prosecutors. She does not triumph in their retreat nor insult over them as witnesses against themselves, not against her. But she answered the question which concerned herself. Has no man condemned thee? True penitents find it enough to give an account of themselves to God, and will not undertake to give account of other people. The prisoner is therefore discharged: Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more. 1. Her discharge from the temporal punishment: "If they do not condemn thee to be stoned to death, neither do I." Christ would not condemn this woman, (a) Because it was none of his business; would not intermeddle in secular affairs. (b) Because she was prosecuted by those that were more guilty than she and could not for shame insist upon their demand of justice against her. When Christ dismissed her, it was with this caution, Go, and sin no more. The fairer the escape was, the fairer the warning was to go and sin no more. Those who help to save the life of a criminal should, as Christ here, help to save the soul with this caution. 2. Her discharge from the eternal punishment. For Christ to say, I do not condemn thee is, in effect, to say, I do forgive thee; and the Son of man had power on earth to forgive sins. He knew the tenderness and sincere repentance of the prisoner, and therefore said that which would comfort her. Those are truly happy whom Christ doth not condemn. Christ will not condemn those who, though they have sinned, will go and sin no more. Christ's favour to us in the remission of the sins that are past should be a prevailing argument with us to go and sin no more.

Verses 12–20

The rest of the chapter is taken up with debates between Christ and contradicting sinners. There were other Pharisees (v. 13) to confront Christ, who had brass enough in their foreheads to keep them in countenance.

I. A great doctrine laid down, with the application of it.

1. The doctrine is, That Christ is the light of the world (v. 12): Then spoke Jesus again unto them. They had turned a deaf ear to what he said, and yet he spoke again to them, saying, I am the light of the world. He was expected to be a light to enlighten the Gentiles (Luke ii. 32), and so the light of the world. The visible light of the world is the sun. One sun enlightens the whole world, so does one Christ, and there needs no more. What a dungeon would the world be without the sun. So would it be without Christ by whom light came into the world. 2. The inference from this doctrine is, He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life. It is our duty to follow him. Christ is the true light. It is not enough to look at this light, and to gaze upon it, but we must follow it, believe in it, and walk in it, for it is a light to our feet, not our eyes only. It is the happiness of those who follow Christ that they shall not walk in darkness. They shall have the light of life, the light of spiritual life in this world and of everlasting life in the other world. Follow Christ, and we shall follow him to heaven.

II. The objection which the Pharisees made against this doctrine: Thou bearest record of thyself; thy record is not true, v. 13. The objection was very unjust, for they made that his crime which in the case of one who introduced a divine revelation was necessary and unavoidable. Did not Moses and all the prophets bear witness of themselves when they avouched themselves to be God's messengers? Futhermore they overlooked the testimony of all the other witnesses. Had he only borne record of himself, his testimony had indeed been suspicious, and the belief of it might have been suspended.

III. Christ's reply to this objection, v. 14. He is the light of the world, and it is the property of light to be self-evidencing. First principles prove themselves. He urges three things to prove that his testimony, though of himself, was true and cogent.

1. That he was conscious to himself of his own authority. He did not speak as one at uncertainty. I know whence I came, and whither I go. He knew that he came from the Father, and was going to him, came from glory, and was going to glory.

2. That they are very incompetent judges of him. Because they were ignorant: You cannot tell whence I came, and whither I go. He had told them of his coming from heaven and returning to heaven, but it was foolishness to them, they received it not. They took upon them to judge of that which they did not understand. Because they were partial (v. 15): You judge after the flesh. The judgment cannot be right when the rule is wrong. The Jews judged of Christ and his gospel by outward appearances, and thought it impossible he should be the light of the world; as if the sun under a cloud were no sun. Because they were unjust and unfair towards him, intimated in this "I judge no man; I neither make nor meddle with your political affairs." He thus judged no man. It was very unreasonable for them to judge him after the flesh.

3. That his testimony of himself was sufficiently supported and corroborated by the testimony of his Father with him and for him (v. 16): And yet, if I judge, my judgment is true. Consider him then,

(1) As a judge: "If I judge, my judgment is true. If I should judge, my judgment must be true, and then you would be condemned." Now that which makes his judgment unexceptionable is his Father's concurrence with him: I am not alone, but I and the Father. He did not act separately, but in his own name and his Father's. His Father's commission was to him: "It is the Father that sent me." No doubt his judgment was true and valid.

(2) Look upon him as a witness. As such his testimony was true and unexceptionable; this he shows, v. 17, 18. He quotes a maxim of the Jewish law, v. 17: That the testimony of two men is true. If nothing appear to the contrary it is taken for granted to be true. He applies this to the case in hand (v. 18): I am one that bear witness of myself, and the Father that sent me bears witness of me. Behold two witnesses! Now if the testimony of two distinct persons, that are men, and therefore may deceive or be deceived, is conclusive, much more ought the testimony of the Son of God concerning himself, backed with the testimony of his Father concerning him, to command assent. In conclusion, we are told how their tongues were let loose, and their hands tied.

First, How their tongues were let loose, v. 19. They set themselves to cross question with him.

a. How they evaded the conviction. Then said they unto him, Where is thy Father? They might easily have understood that when he spoke of his Father he meant no other than God himself; yet they pretend to understand him of a common person. They bid him call his witness, and challenge him, if he can, to produce him: Where is thy Father? Thus, as Christ said of them (v. 15), they judge after the flesh. Thus they turned it off with a taunt.

b. How he evaded the cavil with a further conviction; he charged them with wilful ignorance: "You neither know me nor my Father. It is to no purpose to discourse to you about divine things, who talk of them as blind men do of colours." He charges them with ignorance of God: "You know not my Father." Their eyes were darkened that they could not see the light of his glory shining in the face of Jesus Christ. The little children of the Christian church know the Father, but these rulers of the Jews did not, because they would not so know him. He shows them the true cause of their ignorance of God: If you had known me, you would have known my Father also. The reason why men are ignorant of God is because they are unacquainted with Jesus Christ. In knowing him we should know the Father. If we knew Christ better, we should know the Father better.

Secondly, See how their hands were tied, though their tongues were thus let loose. These words spoke Jesus in the treasury. Now the priests might easily, with the assistance of the janizaries that were at their beck, either have seized him and exposed him to the rage of the mob, or, at least, have silenced him. Yet even in the temple, where they had him in their reach, no man laid hands on him, for his hour was not yet come. 1. The restraint laid upon his persecutors by an invisible power. God can set bounds to the wrath of men, as he does to the waves of the sea. 2. The reason of this restraint: His hour was not yet come. The frequent mention of this, intimates how much the time of our departure out of the world depends upon the fixed counsel and decree of God. It will come, it is coming; not yet come, but it is at hand. My times are in thy hands; and better there than in our own.

Verses 21–30

Christ here gives fair warning to the careless unbelieving Jews to consider what would be the consequence of their infidelity.

I. The wrath threatened (v. 21): Jesus said again unto them. He continued to teach, in kindness to those few who received his doctrine, which is an example to ministers to go on with their work, notwithstanding opposition, because a remnant shall be saved. Here Christ changes his voice; he had piped to them in the offers of his grace, and they had not danced; now he mourns to them in the denunciations of his wrath, to try if they would lament. He said I go my way, and you shall seek me, and shall die in your sins. Whither I go you cannot come. Every word is terrible, and bespeaks spiritual judgments, which are the sorest of all judgments. Four things are here threatened against the Jews.

1. Christ's departure from them: I go my way. But woe to those from whom Christ departs. He bade often farewell, as one loth to depart, and willing to be invited.

2. Their enmity to the true Messiah, and their infatuated enquiries after another Messiah when he was gone away. You shall seek me, which intimates either, (1) Their enmity to the true Christ: "You shall seek to ruin my interest, by persecuting my doctrine and followers." Or, (2) Their enquiries after false Christs: "You shall continue your expectations of the Messiah, of a Christ to come, when he is already come."

3. Their final impenitency: You shall die in your sins. Here it is meant especially of the sin of unbelief. Those that live in unbelief are for ever undone if they die in unbelief. Many that have long lived in sin are, through grace, saved by a timely repentance from dying in sin.

4. Their eternal separation from Christ. Whither I go you cannot come. When Christ left the world he went to paradise. Thither he took the penitent thief with him, that did not die in his sins; but the impenitent not only shall not come to him, but they cannot; for heaven would not be heaven to those that die unsanctified and unmeet for it.

II. The jest they made of this threatening. They turned it into ridicule (v. 22): Will he kill himself? What slight thoughts they had of Christ's threatenings; they could make themselves and one another merry with them. What ill thoughts they had of Christ's meaning, as if he had an inhuman design upon his own life. They had put a much more favourable construction upon this word of his (ch. vii. 34, 35): Will he go to the dispersed among the Gentiles? But see how indulged malice grows more and more malicious.

III. The confirmation of what he had said.

1. He had said, Whither I go you cannot come (v. 23): You are from beneath, I am from above; you are of this world, I am not of this world. You are of those things which are beneath. You are in with these things, how can you come where I go, when your spirit and disposition are so directly contrary to mine? The spirit of the Lord Jesus was—not of this world, but from above. None shall be with him but those who are born from above and have their conversation in heaven. How contrary to this their spirit was: "You are from beneath." What communion could Christ have with them?

2. He had said, You shall die in your sins, and here he stands to it. He gives this further reason for it, If you believe not that I am he, you shall die in your sins, v. 34. (1) What we are required to believe: that I am he; he that should come, he that you expect the Messias to be. I do not only call myself so, but I am he. True faith does not amuse the soul with an empty sound of words, but affects it. (2) How necessary it is that we believe this. If we have not this faith, we shall die in our sins. We cannot be saved from the power of sin while we live, and therefore shall certainly continue in it to the last. None but the Spirit of Christ's grace will be an agent powerful enough to turn us from sin to God. If Christ do not cure us, our case is desperate, and we shall die in our sins. Without faith we cannot be saved from the punishment of sin when we die. This implies the great gospel promise: If we believe that Christ is he, and receive him accordingly, we shall not die in our sins. Believers die in Christ, in his love, in his arms.

IV. Here is a further discourse concerning himself, v. 25–29.

1. The question which the Jews put to him (v. 25): Who art thou? He had said, You must believe that I am he. His not saying expressly who he was, they turned to his reproach, as if he knew not what to say of himself: "Who art thou?"

2. His answer to this question, wherein he directs them three ways for information:

(1) He refers them to what he had said all along: "Do you ask who I am? Even the same that I said unto you from the beginning." I am the same that I said to you from the beginning of time in the scriptures of the Old Testament; from the beginning of my public ministry. The account he had already given of himself he resolved to abide by. To this he refers them for an answer to their question.

(2) He refers them to his Father's judgment (v. 26): "I have many things to say, and to judge of you. I speak to the world (to which I am sent as an ambassador) those things which I have heard of him."

[1] He suppresses his accusation of them. He had many things to charge them with, but for the present he had said enough.

[2] He enters his appeal against them to his Father: He that sent me. Here two things comfort him: First, That he had been true to his Father, and to the trust reposed in him: I speak to the world (for his gospel was to be preached to every creature) those things which I have heard of him. Secondly, That his Father would be true to him. Though he should not accuse them to his Father, yet the Father, who sent him, would undoubtedly reckon. Christ would not accuse them; "for," saith he, "he that sent me is true, and will pass judgment on them." Upon this part of our Saviour's discourse the evangelist has a melancholy remark (v. 27): They understood not that he spoke to them of the Father. Though Christ spoke so plainly of God as his Father in heaven, yet they did not understand whom he meant. Day and night are alike to the blind.

(3) He refers them to their own convictions hereafter, v. 28, 29. Now observe here,

[1] What they should ere long be convinced of: "You shall know that I am he. You shall be made to know it in your own consciences, the convictions of which, though you may stifle, yet you cannot baffle." Two things they should be convinced of, First, That he did nothing of himself, of himself without the Father. Of false prophets it is said that they prophesied out of their own hearts, and followed their own spirits. Secondly, That as his Father taught him so he spoke these things, that he was not self-taught, but taught of God.

[2] When they should be convinced of this: When you have lifted up the Son of man, lifted him up upon the cross, as the brazen serpent upon the pole (ch. iii. 14). Or the expression denotes that his death was his exaltation. They lifted him up to the cross, but then he lifted up himself to his Father. Observe with what tenderness and mildness Christ here speaks to those who he certainly knew would put him to death. Christ speaks of his death as that which would be a powerful conviction of the infidelity of the Jews. When you have lifted up the Son of man, then shall you know this. Careless and unthinking people are often taught the worth of mercies by the want of them. The guilt of their sin would so awaken their consciences that they would be put upon serious enquiries after a Saviour, and then would know that Jesus was he who alone could save them. And so it proved, when, being told that with wicked hands they had crucified and slain the Son of God, they cried out, What shall we do? (Acts ii. 36). There would be such signs and wonders attending his death as would give a stronger proof of his being the Messiah than any that had been yet given. By the death of Christ the pouring out of the Spirit was purchased, who would convince the world that Jesus is he. The judgments which the Jews brought upon themselves, by putting Christ to death, were a sensible conviction to the most hardened among them that Jesus was he.

[3] What supported our Lord Jesus in the mean time (v. 29): He that sent me is with me, for the Father hath not left me alone, for I do always those things that please him. The assurance which Christ had of his Father's presence with him: He that sent me is with me. This greatly emboldens our faith in Christ and our reliance upon his word. The King of kings accompanied his own ambassador, and never left him alone, either solitary or weak; it also aggravated the wickedness of those that opposed him. The ground of this assurance: For I do always those things that please him. His whole undertaking is called the pleasure of the Lord (Isa. liii. 10). His management of that affair was in nothing displeasing to his Father. Our Lord Jesus never offended his Father in anything, he fulfilled all righteousness. God's servants may then expect God's presence with them when they choose and do those things that please him.

V. Here is the good effect which this discourse of Christ's had upon some of his hearers (v. 30): As he spoke these words many believed on him. There is a remnant who believe to the saving of the soul. If Israel, the whole body of the people, be not gathered, yet there are those of them in whom Christ will be glorious. When Christ told them that if they believed not they should die in their sins, they thought it was time to look about them. Sometimes there is a wide door opened, and an effectual one, even where there are many adversaries. The gospel sometimes gains great victories where it meets with great opposition. Let this encourage God's ministers to preach the gospel, though it be with much contention, for they shall not labour in vain. Many may be secretly brought home to God by those endeavours which are openly contradicted.

Verses 31–37

I. A comfortable doctrine laid down concerning the spiritual liberty of Christ's disciples. Christ, knowing that his doctrine began to work upon some of his hearers addressed himself to those weak believers.

1. How graciously the Lord Jesus looks to those that tremble at his word, and are ready to receive it; and will not pass by those who set themselves in his way, without speaking to them.

2. How carefully he cherishes the beginnings of grace. In what he said to them, we have two things, which he saith to all that should at any time believe: (1) The character of a true disciple of Christ: If you continue in my word, then are you my disciples indeed. He lays down this for a settled rule, that he would own none for his disciples but those that continued in his word. It highly concerns those that are not strong in faith to see to it that they be sound in the faith. Let those who have thoughts of covenanting with Christ have no thoughts of reserving a power of revocation. Children are sent to school, and bound apprentices, only for a few years; but those only are Christ's who are willing to be bound to him for the term of life. Those only that continue in Christ's word shall be accepted as his disciples indeed. It is to dwell in Christ's word, as a man does at home, which is his centre, and rest, and refuge.

(2) The privilege of a true disciple of Christ. Here are two precious promises, v. 32. "You shall know the truth." Even those who are true believers may be, and are, much in the dark concerning many things which they should know. God's children are but children, and understand and speak as children. Did we not need to be taught, we should not need to be disciples. It is a very great privilege to know the truth. Christ's scholars are sure to be well taught. The truth shall make you free; that is, First, The truth which Christ teaches tends to make men free, Isa. lxi. 1. It makes us free from our spiritual enemies, free in the service of God, free to the privileges of sons. Secondly, The knowing, entertaining, and believing, of this truth does actually make us free, free from prejudices, mistakes, and false notions, free from the dominion of lust and passion; and restores the soul to the government of itself. The mind, by admitting the truth of Christ is vastly enlarged, and has scope and compass given it and never acts with so true a liberty as when it acts under a divine command, 2 Cor. iii. 17.

II. The offence which the carnal Jews took at this doctrine. They cavilled at it, v. 33. With a great deal of pride and envy they answered him, "We Jews are Abraham's seed, and therefore are free-born; we were never in bondage to any man; how sayest thou then, You shall be made free?"

1. What it was that they were grieved at; it was an innuendo in those words, You shall be made free, as if the Jewish nation were in some sort of bondage. 2. What it was that they alleged against it. (1) "We are Abraham's seed." It is common for a sinking decaying family to boast of the glory and dignity of its ancestors, and to borrow honour from that name to which they repay disgrace; so the Jews here did. It is the common fault and folly of those that have pious parentage and education to trust to their privilege, and boast of it, as if it would atone for the want of real holiness. Saving benefits are not conveyed by entail to us and our issue, nor can a title to heaven be made by descent. They are not all Israel that are of Israel. (2) We were never in bondage to any man. How false this allegation was. I wonder how they could have the assurance to say a thing in the face of a congregation which was so notoriously untrue. Were they not at this time tributaries to the Romans, and, though not in a personal, yet in a national bondage to them, and groaning to be made free? How foolish the application was. Christ had spoken of a liberty wherewith the truth would make them free, which must be meant of a spiritual liberty, for truth as it is the enriching, so it is the enfranchising of the mind, and the enlarging of that from the captivity of error and prejudice; and yet they plead against the offer of spiritual liberty that they were never in corporal thraldom. Carnal hearts are sensible of no other grievances than those that molest the body and injure their secular affairs. Discourse to them of the bondage of sin, a captivity to Satan, and a liberty by Christ—and you bring certain strange things to their ears.

III. Our Saviour's vindication of his doctrine, v. 34–37, where he does these four things:

1. He shows that it was possible that they might be in a state of bondage (v. 34): Whosoever commits sin is the servant of sin. Christ further explains what he had said for their edification. (1) The preface is very solemn: Verily, verily, I say unto you. The style of the prophets was, Thus saith the Lord, for they were faithful as servants; but Christ, being a Son, speaks in his own name: I say unto you. He pawns his veracity upon it.

(2) The truth is of universal concern: Whosoever commits sin is the servant of sin, and sadly needs to be made free. See who it is on whom this brand is fastened—on him that commits sin. There is not a just man upon earth, that lives, and sins not; yet every one that sins is not a servant of sin, for then God would have no servants; but he that makes sin, that makes choice of sin, who walks after the flesh, and makes a trade of sin. See what the brand is which Christ fastens upon those that thus commit sin. He stigmatizes them, gives them a mark of servitude. They are servants of sin. He does the work of sin, supports its interest, and accepts its wages, Rom. vi. 16.

2. He shows them that their having a place in the house of God would not entitle them to the inheritance of sons: for (v. 35) the servant abideth not in the house for ever, but the son of the family abideth ever. (1) This points primarily at the rejection of the Jewish church and nation. Israel had been God's son, his first-born. Christ tells them that having made themselves servants they should not abide in the house for ever. "Think not to be made free from sin by the rites and ceremonies of the law of Moses, for Moses was but a servant. But, if the Son make you free, it is well," v. 36. (2) It looks further, to the rejection of all that are the servants of sin. True believers only are accounted free, and shall abide for ever in the house.

3. He shows them the way of deliverance. The case of those that are the servants of sin is sad, but thanks be to God it is not helpless, it is not hopeless. He who is the Son has a power both of manumission and of adoption (v. 36): If the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed.

(1) Jesus Christ in the gospel offers us our freedom. [1] To discharge prisoners; this he does in justification, by making satisfaction for our guilt, and for our debts. Christ, as our surety, compounds with the creditor, answers the demands of injured justice with more than an equivalent. [2] He has a power to rescue bond-slaves, and this he does in sanctification; by the powerful operations of his Spirit, he breaks the power of corruption in the soul, rallies the scattered forces of reason and virtue, and so the soul is made free. [3] He has a power to naturalize strangers and foreigners, and this he does in adoption. This is a further act of grace. There is a charter of privileges as well as pardon.

(2) Those whom Christ makes free are free indeed. It is not the word used (v. 31) for disciples indeed, but really. The truth and certainty of the promise, the liberty which the Jews boasted of was an imaginary liberty; but the liberty which Christ gives is a certain thing, it is real. The servants of sin promise themselves liberty and fancy themselves free, but they cheat themselves. None are free indeed but those whom Christ makes free. The singular excellency of the freedom promised; it is a freedom that deserves the name. It is a glorious liberty. It is substance, while the things of the world are shadows.

4. He applies this in answer to their boasts of relation to Abraham (v. 37): "I know that you are Abraham's seed, but now you seek to kill me, because my word hath no place in you."

(1) The dignity of their extraction admitted: "I know that you are Abraham's seed." They boasted of their descent from Abraham, as that which aggrandized their names; whereas really it did but aggravate their crimes.

(2) The inconsistency of their practice with this dignity: But you seek to kill me. They had attempted it several times, and were now designing it, which quickly appeared (v. 58), when they took up stones to cast at him.

(3) The reason of this inconsistency. It is because my word hath no place in you. Some of the critics read it, My word does not penetrate into you; it descended as the rain, but it came upon them as the rain upon the rock, which it runs off, and did not soak into their hearts, as the rain upon the ploughed ground. Our translation is very significant: It has no place in you. The words of Christ ought to have a place in us, the innermost and uppermost place,—a dwelling place, as a man at home, and not as a stranger or sojourner,—a working place; it must have room to operate, to work sin out of us, and to work grace in us; it must have a ruling place, its place must be upon the throne. There are many that make a profession of religion in whom the word of Christ has no place; they will not allow it a place, for they do not like it. Other things possess the place it should have in us. Where the word of God has no place no good is to be expected, for room is left there for all wickedness.

Verses 38–47

Here Christ and the Jews are still at issue.

I. He here traces the difference between his sentiments and theirs to a different rise and origin (v. 38): I speak that which I have seen with my Father, and you do what you have seen with your father.

1. Christ's doctrine was from heaven. I speak that which I have seen. The discoveries Christ has made to us of God and another world are not grounded upon guess and hearsay. It is what I have seen with my Father. The doctrine of Christ is not a plausible hypothesis, supported by probable arguments. It was not only what he had heard from his Father, but what he had seen with him. It was Christ's prerogative to have seen what he spoke, and to speak what he had seen.

2. Their doings were from hell: "You do that which you have seen with your father." As a child that is trained up with his father learns his father's words and fashions, and grows like him by imitation as well as by a natural image, so these Jews made themselves as like the devil as if they had industriously set him before them for their pattern.

II. He answers their vain-glorious boasts of relation to Abraham and to God as their fathers.

1. They pleaded relation to Abraham, and he replies to this plea. They said, Abraham is our father, v. 39. In this they intended, (1) To do honour to themselves, and to make themselves look great. (2) They designed to cast an odium upon Christ as if he reflected upon the patriarch Abraham, in speaking of their father as one they had learned evil from. Now Christ overthrows this plea by a plain and cogent argument: "Abraham's children will do the works of Abraham, but you do not do Abraham's works, therefore you are not Abraham's children." The proposition is plain: If you were Abraham's children then you would do the works of Abraham. Those only are reckoned the seed of Abraham, who tread in the steps of his faith and obedience. Those who would approve themselves Abraham's seed must not only be of Abraham's faith, but do Abraham's works (James ii. 21, 22). The assumption is evident likewise: But you do not do the works of Abraham, for you seek to kill me, a man that has told you the truth, which I have heard of God; this did not Abraham, v. 40. He shows them what their work was which they were now about; they sought to kill him. They were so unnatural as to seek the life of a man who had done them no harm, nor given them any provocation. They were so ungrateful as to seek the life of one who had told them the truth. They were so ungodly as to seek the life of one who told them the truth which he had heard from God. He shows them that this did not become the children of Abraham; for this did not Abraham. "He did nothing like this." He was famous for his humanity, and for his picty. Abraham believed God; they were obstinate in unbelief. "He would not have done thus if he had lived now, or I had lived then." The conclusion follows of course (v. 41): "You are not Abraham's children, but father yourselves upon another family (v. 41); there is a father whose deeds you do." He does not yet say plainly that he means the devil. He tried whether they would suffer their own consciences to infer from what he said that they were the devil's children.

2. So far were they from owning their unworthiness of relation to Abraham that they pleaded relation to God himself as their Father: "We are not born of fornication, we have one Father, even God."

(1) Some understand this literally. They were Hebrews of the Hebrews; and, being born in lawful wedlock, they might call God Father.

(2) Others take it figuratively. They begin to be aware now that Christ spoke of a spiritual father, of the father of their religion. They deny themselves to be a generation of idolaters: "We are not born of fornication, are not the children of idolatrous parents." If they meant no more than that they themselves were not idolaters, what then? A man may be free from idolatry, and yet perish in another iniquity. They boast themselves to be true worshippers of the true God. We have not many fathers, as the heathens had. The Lord our God is one Lord and one Father, and therefore it is well with us. Now our Saviour gives a full answer to this fallacious plea (v. 42, 43), and proves, by two arguments, that they had no right to call God Father.

First, They did not love Christ: if God were your Father, you would love me. He had disproved their relation to Abraham by their going about to kill him (v. 40), but here he disproves their relation to God by their not loving and owning him. All that have God for their Father have a true love to Jesus Christ. God has taken various methods to prove us, and this was one: he sent his Son into the world, concluding that all that called him Father would bid him welcome. By this our adoption will be proved or disproved—Did we love Christ, or no? If they were God's children they would love him. He was the Son of God. Now this could not but recommend him to the affections of all that were born of God. He was sent of God. Observe the emphasis he lays upon this: I came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me. He came to gather together in one the children of God (ch. xi. 52). And would not all God's children embrace with both arms a messenger sent from their Father on such errands?

Secondly, They did not understand him. They did not understand the language and dialect of the family: You do not understand my speech (v. 43). Those that had made the word of the Creator familiar to them needed no other key to the dialect of the Redeemer. And the reason why they did not understand Christ's speech made the matter much worse: Even because you cannot hear my word, that is, "You cannot persuade yourselves to hear it without prejudice, as it should be heard." The meaning of this cannot is an obstinate will not. They do not like it nor love it, and therefore they will not understand it. You cannot hear my words, for you have stopped your ears.

III. He comes next to tell them plainly whose children they were: You are of your father the devil, v. 44. If they were not God's children, they were the devil's.

This is a high charge, and sounds very harsh and horrid, and therefore our Saviour fully proves it,

1. By a general argument: The lusts of your father you will do. (1) "You do the devil's lusts, the lusts which he would have you to fulfil, and are led captive by him at his will." The peculiar lusts of the devil are spiritual wickedness; pride and envy, and wrath and malice; enmity to that which is good, and enticing others to that which is evil; these are lusts which the devil fulfils. (2) You will do the devil's lusts. The more there is of the will in these lusts, the more there is of the devil in them. "The lusts of your father you delight to do," they are rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel.

2. By two particular instances, wherein they manifestly resembled the devil—murder and lying.

(1) He was a murderer from the beginning. He was a hater of man, and so in disposition a murderer of him. He was man's tempter to that sin which brought death into the world. The great tempter is the great destroyer. The Jews called the devil the angel of death If the devil had not been very strong in Cain, he could not have done such an unnatural thing as to kill his own brother. Now herein these Jews were followers of him, and were murderers, like him; murderers of souls, sworn enemies of Christ, and now ready to be his betrayers and murderers. Now you seek to kill me.

(2) He was a liar. He is a deserter from the truth; he abode not in the truth. The truth which Christ was now preaching, and which the Jews opposed; herein they did like their father the devil. He is destitute of the truth: There is no truth in him. There is no truth, nothing you can confide in, in him, nor in anything he says or does. He is a friend and patron of lying: When he speaketh a lie he speaketh of his own. Three things are here said of the devil with reference to the sin of lying: First, That he is a liar; his oracles were lying oracles, his prophets lying prophets. All his temptations are carried on by lies, calling evil good and good evil. Secondly, That when he speaks a lie he speaks of his own. It is the proper idiom of his language. Thirdly, That he is the father of it. He is the author and founder of all lies. He is the father of every liar. God made men with a disposition to truth. It is congruous to reason and natural light, that we should speak truth; but the devil, the author of sin, is the father of liars, who begat them, who trained them up in the way of lying, whom they resemble and obey.

IV. Christ, having thus proved all murderers and all liars to be the devil's children, comes in the following verses to assist them in the application of it to themselves. Two things he charges upon them:

1. That they would not believe the word of truth (v. 45).

(1) Two ways it may be taken: [1] "Though I tell you the truth, yet you will not believe me." They would not believe that he told them the truth. The greatest truths with some gained not the least credit; for they rebelled against the light. Or, [2] Because I tell you the truth (so we read it) therefore you believe me not. They would not receive him, nor entertain him as a prophet, because he showed them their faces in a glass that would not flatter them. Miserable is the case of those to whom the light of divine truth is become a torment.

(2) Now, to show them the unreasonableness of their infidelity, he condescends to put the matter to this fair issue, v. 46. If he were in an error, why did they not convince him? But (saith Christ) which of you convinceth me of sin? Their accusations were malicious groundless calumnies, and utterly false. The very judge that condemned him owned he found no fault in him. The only way not to be convicted of sin is not to sin. If they were in an error, why were they not convinced by him? "If I say the truth, why do you not believe me? If you cannot convince me of error, you must own that I say the truth, and why do you not then give me credit?" It will be found that the reason why we believe not in Jesus Christ is because we are not willing to part with our sins, and deny ourselves, and serve God faithfully.

2. Another thing charged upon them is that they would not hear the words of God (v. 47).

(1) A doctrine laid down: He that is of God heareth God's words. He is willing and ready to hear them, is sincerely desirous to know what the mind of God is, and cheerfully embraces whatever he knows to be so. He apprehends and discerns them, he so hears them as to perceive the voice of God in them, as they of the family know the master's tread, and the master's knock, as the sheep know the voice of their shepherd from that of a stranger.

(2) The application of this doctrine: You therefore hear them not, because you are not of God. Your being thus deaf and dead to the words of God is a plain evidence that you are not of God. Or, their not being of God was the reason why they did not profitably hear the words of God, which Christ spoke. If the word of the kingdom do not bring forth fruit, the blame is to be laid upon the soil, not upon the seed.

I. Hitherto they had cavilled at his doctrine, but, having shown themselves uneasy when he complained (v. 43, 47) that they would not hear him, now at length they fall to downright railing, v. 48. The scribes and Pharisees scornfully turned off the conviction with this: Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?

1. The blasphemous character commonly given of our Lord Jesus among the wicked Jews. (1) That he was a Samaritan. Thus they exposed him to the ill will of the people, with whom you could not put a man into a worse name than to call him a Samaritan. They had often enough called him a Galilean—a mean man; they will have him a Samaritan —a bad man. Great endeavours have in all ages been used to make good people odious by putting them under black characters, and it is easy to run that down with a crowd and a cry which is once put into an ill name. (2) That he had a devil; that he was in league with the devil. That he was possessed with a devil, that he was a melancholy man, whose brain was clouded, or a mad man, whose brain was heated, and that which he said was no more to be believed than the extravagant rambles of a distracted man.

2. How they undertook to justify this character: Say we not well that thou art so? Their hearts were more hardened and their prejudices confirmed. They value themselves on their enmity to Christ, as if they had never spoken better than when they spoke the worst they could of Jesus Christ. It is bad to say and do ill, but it is worse to stand to it.

II. The meekness and mercifulness of Heaven shining in Christ's reply, v. 49, 50.

1. He denies their charge against him: I have not a devil. The imputation is unjust; "I am neither actuated by a devil, nor in compact with one."

2. He asserts the sincerity of his own intentions: But I honour my Father. It also proves that he had not a devil; for, if he had, he would not honour God.

3. He complains of the wrong they did him by their calumnies: You do dishonour me. By this it appears that, as man, he had a tender sense of the disgrace and indignity done him. Christ honoured his Father so as never man did, and yet was himself dishonoured so as never man was; for, though God has promised that those who honour him he will honour, he never promised that men should honour them.

4. He clears himself from the imputation of vain glory, v. 50. His contempt of worldly honour: I seek not mine own glory. He did not aim at this nor covet preferment in the world. "You do dishonour me, but cannot disturb me, for I seek not my own glory." Those who are dead to men's praise can safely bear their contempt. His comfort under worldly dishonour: There is one that seeketh and judgeth. In two things Christ made it appear that he sought not his own glory. (1) He did not court men's respect. In reference to this he saith, "There is one that seeketh." God will seek their honour that do not seek their own; for before honour is humility. (2) He did not revenge men's affronts, and in reference to this he saith, "There is one that judgeth, that will vindicate my honour." If we be humble appellants and patient expectants, we shall find, to our comfort, there is one that judgeth.

Verses 51–59

I. The doctrine of the immortality of believers laid down, v. 51. It is ushered in with the usual solemn preface, Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my sayings, he shall never see death. 1. The character of a believer: he is one that keeps the sayings of the Lord Jesus—my word. This we must not only receive, but keep; not only have, but hold. We must keep it in mind and memory, keep it in love and affection, keep in it as our way, keep to it as our rule. 2. The privilege of a believer: He shall by no means see death for ever; so it is in the original. Not as if the bodies of believers were secured from the stroke of death. How then is this promise made good that they shall not see death? The property of death is so altered to them that they do not see it as death, they do not see the terror of death. Their sight does not terminate in death, they look so clearly, so comfortably, through death, and beyond death, that they overlook death, and see it not. They shall not see death for ever. The day will come when death shall be swallowed up in victory. They are perfectly delivered from eternal death. They shall have their everlasting lot where there will be no more death, where they cannot die any more.

II. The Jews cavil at this doctrine. They lay hold of this occasion to reproach him that makes them so kind an offer: Now we know that thou hast a devil. Abraham is dead.

1. Their railing: "Now we know that thou hast a devil." If he had not abundantly proved himself a teacher come from God, his promises of immortality to his credulous followers might justly have been ridiculed, and charity itself would have imputed them to a crazed fancy; but his doctrine was evidently divine, his miracles confirmed it, and the Jews' religion taught them to expect such a prophet, and to believe in him.

2. Their reasoning. They look upon him as guilty of an insufferable piece of arrogance, in making himself greater than Abraham and the prophets: Abraham is dead, and the prophets, they are dead too. It is true that Abraham and the prophets were great men, great in the favour of God, and great in the esteem of all good men. It is true that they kept God's sayings. It is true that they died; they never pretended to have, much less to give, immortality. It was their honour that they died in faith, but die they must. Why should a good man be afraid to die when Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead? They have tracked the way through that darksome valley, which should reconcile us to death and help to take off the terror of it. Now they think Christ talks madly when he saith, If a man keep my sayings, he shall never taste death. Now their arguing goes upon two mistakes: [1] They understood Christ of an immortality in this world. God is still the God of Abraham and the God of the holy prophets. God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; therefore Abraham and the prophets are still alive, and, as Christ meant it, they had not seen nor tasted death. [2] They thought none could be greater than Abraham and the prophets, whereas they could not but know that the Messiah would be greater than Abraham or any of the prophets. Instead of inferring from Christ's making himself greater than Abraham that he had a devil, they should have inferred that he was the Christ; but their eyes were blinded. They scornfully asked, Whom makest thou thyself?

III. Christ's reply; still he vouchsafes to reason with them. This was the day of his patience.

1. In his answer he insists not upon his own testimony concerning himself, but waives it as not sufficient nor conclusive (v. 54): If I honour myself, my honour is nothing. Honour of our own creating is a mere chimera, has nothing in it, and therefore is called vain-glory. Self-admirers are self-deceivers.

2. He refers himself to his Father, God; and to their father, Abraham.

(1) To his Father, God: It is my Father that honoureth me. He derived from his Father all the honour he now claimed. He depended upon his Father for all the honour he further looked for. Christ and all that are his depend upon God for their honour; and he that is sure of honour where he is known cares not though he be slighted where he is in disguise.

First, He here takes occasion to show the reason of their incredulity, and this was their unacquaintedness with God; You say of him that he is your God, yet you have not known him. The profession they made of relation to God: "You say that he is your God." Many pretend to have an interest in God, and say that he is theirs, who yet have no just cause to say so. What will it avail us to say, He is our God, if we be not in sincerity his people. Their ignorance of him: Yet you have not known him. You know him not at all. Or, You know him not aright; and this is as bad as not knowing him at all, or worse. Men may be able to dispute subtly concerning God, and not know him. It is only the name of God which they have learned to talk of. They knew not God; and therefore perceived not the image of God, nor the voice of God in Christ. The reason why men receive not the gospel of Christ is because they have not the knowledge of God.

Secondly, He gives them the reason of his assurance that his Father would honour him and own him: But I know him; and again, I know him; which bespeaks his confidence in him. He professes his knowledge of his Father, with the greatest certainty: If I should say I know him not, I should be a liar like unto you. He would not deny his relation to God, to humour the Jews. If he should, he would be found a false witness against God and himself. He proves his knowledge of his Father: I know him and keep his sayings, or his word. He kept his Father's word, and his own word with the Father. Christ requires of us (v. 51) that we keep his sayings; and he has set before us a copy of obedience: he kept his Father's sayings; well might he who learned obedience teach it. Christ by this evinced that he knew the Father.

(2) Christ refers them to their father, and that was Abraham.

[1] Christ asserts Abraham's prospect of him, and respect to him: Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad, v. 56. Two things he here speaks of as instances of that patriarch's respect to the promised Messiah:

First, The ambition he had to see his day: He rejoiced—he leaped at it. The word must here signify a transport of desire rather than of joy, for otherwise the latter part of the verse would be a tautology; he saw it, and was glad. The notices he had received of the Messiah to come had raised in him an expectation of something great, which he earnestly longed to know more of. Those who rightly know anything of Christ cannot but be earnestly desirous to know more of him. Those who discern the dawning of the light of the Sun of righteousness cannot but wish to see his rising. Abraham desired to see Christ's day, though it was at a great distance; but this degenerate seed of his discerned not his day, nor bade it welcome when it came.

Secondly, The satisfaction he had in what he did see of it: He saw it, and was glad.

a. How God gratified the pious desire of Abraham; he longed to see Christ's day, and he saw it. He saw something of it, more afterwards than he did at first. To him that desires and prays for more of the knowledge of Christ, God will give more. But how did Abraham see Christ's day? Some understand it of the sight he had of it in the other world. The longings of gracious souls after Jesus Christ will be fully satisfied when they come to heaven, and not till then. It is more commonly understood of some sight he had of Christ's day in this world. They that received not the promises, yet saw them afar off. There is room to conjecture that Abraham had some vision of Christ and his day, which is not recorded in his story.

b. How Abraham entertained these discoveries of Christ's day: He saw, and was glad. He was glad of what he saw of God's favour to himself, and glad of what he foresaw of the mercy God had in store for the world. A believing sight of Christ and his day will put gladness into the heart. No joy like the joy of faith; we are never acquainted with true pleasure till we are acquainted with Christ.

[2] The Jews cavil at this, and reproach him for it (v. 57): Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham? They suppose it a very absurd thing for him to pretend to have seen Abraham, who was dead so many ages before he was born. Now this gave them occasion to despise his youth, as if he were but of yesterday, and knew nothing: Thou art not yet fifty years old.

[3] Our Saviour gives an effectual answer to this cavil, by a solemn assertion of his own seniority even to Abraham himself (v. 58): "Verily, verily, I say unto you; I say it to your faces, take it how you will: Before Abraham was, I am. Before Abraham was made or born, I am." The change of the word is observable, and bespeaks Abraham a creature, and himself the Creator. Before Abraham he was, as God. I am, is the name of God. He does not say, I was, but I am, for he is the first and the last. He was the appointed Messiah, long before Abraham.

[4] This great word ended the dispute abruptly: they could bear to hear no more from him, and he needed to say no more to them. Their inveterate prejudice against the holy spiritual doctrine and law of Christ, baffled all the methods of conviction. They were enraged at Christ for what he said: They took up stones to cast at him, v. 59. Perhaps they looked upon him as a blasphemer, and such were indeed to be stoned, but they must be first legally tried and convicted. Farewell justice and order if every man pretend to execute a law at his pleasure. Who would think that ever there should be such wickedness as this in men? Thus everyone has a stone to throw at his holy religion. He made his escape out of their hands. Jesus hid himself. Not that Christ was afraid or ashamed to stand by what he had said, but his hour was not yet come, and he would countenance the flight of his ministers and people in times of persecution. He departed, he went out of the temple, going through the midst of them, undiscovered, and so passed by. This was not a cowardly inglorious flight, nor such as argued either guilt or fear. It was an instance of his power over his enemies, and that they could do no more against him than he gave them leave to do. They now thought they had made sure of him and yet he passed through the midst of them, and thus he left them to fume. It was an instance of his prudent provision for his own safety. Thus he gave an example to his own rule, When they persecute you in one city flee to another. It was a righteous deserting of those who stoned him from among them. Christ will not long stay with those who bid him be gone. Christ now went through the midst of the Jews, and none of them courted his stay, nor stirred up himself to take hold of him, but were even content to let him go. God never forsakes any till they have first provoked him to withdraw, and will have none of him. When Christ left them it is said that he passed by silently and unobserved; so that they were not aware of him. Christ's departures from a church, or a particular soul, are often secret. As the kingdom of God comes not, so it goes not, with observation. Thus it was with these forsaken Jews, God left them, and they never missed him.

CHAP. IX

In this chapter we have, I. The miraculous cure of a man that was born blind, ver. 1–7. II. The discourses which were occasioned by it. 1. A discourse of the neighbours among themselves, and with the man, ver. 8–12. 2. Between the Pharisees and the man, ver. 13–34. 3. Between Christ and the poor man, ver. 35–38. 4. Between Christ and the Pharisees, ver. 39 to the end.

Verses 1–7

I. The notice which our Lord Jesus took of the piteous case of this poor blind man (v. 1): As Jesus passed by he saw a man which was blind from his birth. Though the Jews had so basely abused him, yet he did not miss any opportunity of doing good among them. The cure of this blind man was a kindness to the public, enabling him to work for his living who before was a charge and burden to the neighbourhood. It is noble, and generous, and Christ-like, to be willing to serve the public. Though he was in his flight from a threatening danger, and escaping for his life, yet he willingly halted and stayed awhile to show mercy to this poor man. We make more haste than good speed when we out-run opportunities of doing good. Christ took this poor blind man in his way, and cured him as he passed by. Thus should we take occasions of doing good, even as we pass by, wherever we are. The condition of this poor man was very sad. He was blind, and had been so from his birth. He that is blind has no enjoyment of the light, but he that is born blind has no idea of it. Methinks such a one would give a great deal to have his curiosity satisfied with but one day's sight of light and colours, shapes and figures, though he were never to see them more. Let us bless God that it was not our case. The eye is one of the most curious parts of the body, its structure exceedingly nice and fine. What a mercy is it that there was no miscarriage in the making of ours! Christ cured many that were blind by disease or accident, but here he cured one that was born blind; that he might give an instance of his power to help in the most desperate cases. That he might give a specimen of the work of his grace, upon the souls of sinners, which gives sight to those that were by nature blind. The compassions of our Lord Jesus towards him were very tender. He saw him; and looked upon him with concern. Others saw him, but not as he did. Christ is often found of those that seek him not, nor see him.

II. The discourse between Christ and his disciples concerning this man.

1. The question which the disciples put to their Master, v. 2. When Christ looked upon him, they had an eye to him too; Christ's compassion should kindle ours. But they did not move Christ to heal him. Instead of this, they started a very odd question concerning him: Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind? Now this question of theirs was,

(1) Uncharitably censorious. They take it for granted that this extraordinary calamity was the punishment of some uncommon wickedness. The greatest sufferers are not therefore to be looked upon as the greatest sinners. The grace of repentance calls our own afflictions punishments, but the grace of charity calls the afflictions of others trials.

(2) It was unnecessarily curious. They ask, Who were the criminals, this man or his parents? And what was this to them? Or what good would it do them to know it? We are apt to be more inquisitive concerning other people's sins than concerning our own. To judge ourselves is our duty, but to judge our brother is our sin. They enquire, [1] Whether this man was punished thus for some sin of his own, either committed or foreseen before his birth. The Pharisees seem to have had the same opinion of his case when they said, Thou wast altogether born in sin (v. 34). Or, [2] Whether he was punished for the wickedness of his parents, which God sometimes visits upon the children. It is a good reason why parents should take heed of sin, lest their children smart for it when they are gone. Being at a loss what construction to put upon this providence, they desire to be informed. The equity of God's dispensations is always certain, but not always to be accounted for, for his judgments are a great deep.

2. Christ's answer to this question.

(1) He gives the reason of this poor man's blindness: "Neither has this man sinned nor his parents, but he was born blind, that now at last the works of God should be made manifest in him," v. 3. Here Christ told them two things concerning such uncommon calamities: That they are not always inflicted as punishments of sin. Many are made much more miserable than others in this life who are not at all more sinful. It was not any uncommon guilt that God had an eye to in inflicting this upon him. Misfortunes are sometimes intended purely for the glory of God, and the manifesting of his works. If God be glorified, either by us or in us, we were not made in vain. This man was born blind, that the works of God might be manifest in him. First, That the attributes of God might be made manifest in him, especially that his extraordinary power and goodness might be manifested in curing him. The difficulties of providence, otherwise unaccountable, may be resolved into this—God intends in them to show himself. Those who regard him not in the ordinary course of things are sometimes alarmed by things extraordinary. Secondly, That the counsels of God might be manifested in him. He was born blind that our Lord Jesus might prove himself sent of God to be the true light to the world. It was now a great while since this man was born blind, and yet it never appeared till now why he was so. The sentences in the book of providence are sometimes long, and you must read a great way before you can apprehend the sense of them.

(2) He gives the reason of his own forwardness and readiness to help and heal him, v. 4, 5. I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day; the night cometh, when no man can work. It was the sabbath day, on which works of necessity might be done, and he proves this to be a work of necessity.

[1] It was his Father's will: I must work the works of him that sent me. Whom God sends he employs, for he sends none to be idle. He was a worker together with God. He was pleased to lay himself under the strongest obligations to do the business he was sent about: I must work. Christ laid out himself with the utmost vigour and industry in his work. He worked the works he had to do. It is not enough to look at our work, and talk over it, but we must work it.

[2] Now was his opportunity. I must work while it is day, while the light lasts which is given to work by. Christ himself had his day. All the work he had to do in his own person here on earth was to be done before his death; the time of his living in this world is the day here spoken of. The time of our life is our day. Day-time is the proper season for work; during the day of life we must be busy, not waste day-time, nor play by daylight; it will be time enough to rest when our day is done.

[3] The period of his opportunity was at hand, and therefore he would be busy: The night comes when no man can work. It will come certainly, may come suddenly, is coming nearer and nearer. We cannot compute how nigh our sun is, it may go down at noon: nor can we promise ourselves a twilight between the day of life and the night of death. When the night comes we cannot work. When night comes, call the labourers; we must then show our work, and receive according to the things done. It is too late to bid when the inch of candle is dropped.

[4] His business in the world was to enlighten it (v. 5): As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world. He had said this before, ch. viii. 12. Christ would cure this blind man, the representative of a blind world, because he came to be the light of the world, not only to give light, but to give sight. Now this gives us a great encouragement to come to him. Which way should we turn our eyes, but to the light? We partake of the sun's light, and so we may of Christ's grace, without money and without price. A good example of usefulness in the world. What Christ saith of himself, he saith of his disciples: You are lights in the world, and, if so, Let your light shine. What were candles made for but to burn?

III. The manner of the cure of the blind man, v. 6, 7. The circumstances of the miracle are singular, and no doubt significant. When he had thus spoken he addressed himself to the opening of the blind man's eyes. He did not defer it till the sabbath was past, when it would give less offence. What good we have opportunity of doing we should do quickly; he that will never do a good work till there is nothing to be objected against it will leave many a good work for ever undone.

1. The preparation of the eye-salve. Christ spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle. He made clay of his own spittle, because there was no water near; and he would teach us to be willing to take up with that which is next hand, if it will but serve the turn. Why should we go about for that which may as well be had and done a nearer way?

2. The application of it to the place: He anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay. Like a tender physician; he did it himself with his own hand, though the patient was a beggar. Daubing clay on the eyes would close them up, but never open them. The power of God often works by contraries. The design of the gospel is to open men's eyes. Now the eye-salve that does the work is of Christ's preparing. We must come to Christ for the eye-salve. He only is able, and he only is appointed, to make it up. The means used in this work are very weak, and unlikely, and are made effectual only by the power of Christ. And the method Christ takes is first to make men feel themselves blind, and then to give them sight.

3. The directions given to the patient, v. 7. His physician said to him, Go, wash in the pool of Siloam. Christ would hereby try his obedience, and whether he would with an implicit faith obey the orders of one he was so much a stranger to. He would likewise try how he stood affected to the tradition of the elders, which taught that it was not lawful to wash the eyes on the sabbath day. He would hereby represent the method of spiritual healing, in which, though the effect is owing purely to his power and grace, there is duty to be done by us. Go, search the scriptures, attend upon the ministry, converse with the wise; this is like washing in the pool of Siloam. Promised graces must be expected in the way of instituted ordinances. Concerning the pool of Siloam observe that it was supplied with water from Mount Zion, living waters, which were healing. The evangelist takes notice of the signification of the name, its being interpreted sent. Christ is often called the sent of God, so that when Christ sent him to the pool of Siloam he did in effect send him to himself. Go, wash in the fountain opened, a fountain of life, not a pool

4. The patient's obedience to these directions: He went his way therefore, and he washed his eyes. In confidence of Christ's power, as well as in obedience to his command, he went, and washed.

5. The cure effected: He came seeing. So when the pangs and struggles of the new birth are over, the bands of sin fly off with them, and a glorious light and liberty succeed. Such is the power of Christ. What cannot he do who could do this, and do it thus? This man let Christ do what he pleased, and did what he appointed him to do, and so was cured. Those that would be healed by Christ must be ruled by him. He came back from the pool wondering and wondered at; he came seeing. This represents the benefit gracious souls find in attending on instituted ordinances, according to Christ's appointment; they have gone trembling, and come away triumphing; have gone blind, and come away seeing, come away singing.

Verses 8–12

Such a wonderful event as the giving of sight to a man born blind could not but be the talk of the town. Here we are told what the neighbours said of it, for the confirmation of the matter of fact. That which at first was not believed without scrutiny may afterwards be admitted without scruple.

I. Whether this was the same man that had before been blind, v. 8.

1. The neighbours could not but be amazed when they saw that he had his eyesight, and they said, Is not this he that sat and begged? When he could not labour, his parents not being able to maintain him, he begged. Those who cannot otherwise subsist must not be ashamed to beg; let no man be ashamed of anything but sin. There are some common beggars that are objects of charity, that should be distinguished; and we must not let the bees starve for the sake of the drones or wasps that are among them. The truth of the miracle was the better attested, and there were more to witness against those infidel Jews who would not believe that he had been blind than if he had been maintained in his father's house. Note, Christ's condescension. When it was for the advantage of his miracles that they should be wrought on those that were remarkable, he pitched upon those that were made so by their poverty and misery, not by their dignity.

2. Some said, This is he, the very same man; and these are witnesses to the truth of the miracle, for they had long known him stone-blind. Others said, He is not he, but is like him, and so, by their confession, if it be he, it is a great miracle that is wrought upon him. Think, [1] Of the wisdom and power of Providence in ordering such a universal variety of the faces of men and women, so that no two are so alike but that they may be distinguished, which is necessary to society, and commerce, and the administration of justice. [2] Of the wonderful change which the converting grace of God makes upon some who before were very wicked and vile, but are thereby so universally and visibly altered that one would not take them to be the same person.

3. This controversy was soon decided by the man himself: He said, I am he, "I am he that was blind, but now see, and am a monument of the mercy and grace of God." Those who are savingly enlightened by the grace of God should be ready to own what they were before.

II. How he came to have his eyes opened, v. 10–12. They will now turn aside, and see this great sight, and enquire further concerning it. Two things these neighbours enquire after:

1. The manner of the cure: How were thine eyes opened? It is good to observe the way and method of God's works, and they will appear the more wonderful. In answer to this enquiry the poor man gives them a plain and full account of the matter: A man that is called Jesus made clay—and I received sight, v. 11. Those who have experienced God's power and goodness, in temporal or spiritual things, should be ready upon all occasions to communicate their experiences. It is a debt we owe to our benefactor, and to our brethren. God's favours are lost upon us, when they are lost with us, and go no further.

2. The author of it (v. 12): Where is he? Some perhaps asked this question out of curiosity. "Where is he, that we may see him?" Others, perhaps, asked out of ill-will. "Where is he, that we may seize him?" The unthinking crowd will have ill thoughts of those that are put into an ill name. Some, we hope, asked this question out of goodwill. "Where is he, that we may be acquainted with him?" In answer to this, he could say nothing: I know not. As soon as Christ had sent him to the pool of Siloam, it should seem, he withdrew immediately. The man had never seen Jesus, for by the time that he had gained his sight he had lost his Physician. None of all the new and surprising objects that presented themselves could be so grateful to him as one sight of Christ, but as yet he knew no more of him than that he was called Jesus—a Saviour. Thus in the work of grace wrought upon the soul we see the change, but see not the hand that makes it.

One would have expected that such a miracle as Christ wrought upon the blind man would have silenced and shamed all opposition, but it had the contrary effect; instead of being embraced as a prophet for it, he is prosecuted as a criminal.

I. They brought to the Pharisees him that aforetime was blind, v. 13. Some think that those who brought this man to the Pharisees did it with a good design, to show them that this Jesus was not what they represented him, but one that gave considerable proofs of a divine mission. It should seem, rather, that they did it with an ill design.

II. That which is good was never maligned but under the imputation of something evil. And the crime objected here (v. 14) was that it was the sabbath day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes. The traditions of the Jews had made that to be a violation of the law of the sabbath which was far from being so. But it may be asked, "Why would Christ not only work miracles on the sabbath day, but work them in such a manner as he knew would give offence to the Jews? Could he not have cured this blind man without making clay?" He would not seem to yield to the usurped power of the scribes and Pharisees. Christ was made under the law of God, but not under their law. He did it that he might, both by word and action, expound the law of the fourth commandment. Works of necessity and mercy are allowed, and the sabbath-rest to be kept, not so much for its own sake as in order to the sabbath-work.

III. The trial and examination of this matter by the Pharisees, v. 15. So much passion, prejudice, and ill-humour, and so little reason, appear here, that the discourse is nothing but crossing questions. Their enmity to Christ had divested them of all manner of humanity, and divinity too. Let us see how they teased this man.

1. They interrogated him concerning the cure itself. They did not believe that he was born blind. This was not a prudent caution, but a prejudiced infidelity. However, it was a good way that they took for the clearing of this: They called the parents of the man who had received his sight. This they did in hopes to disprove the miracle. God so ordered and overruled this counsel of theirs that it turned to the more effectual proof of the miracle, and left them under a necessity of being either convinced or confounded. Now in this part of the examination we have the questions that were put to them (v. 19): They asked them, "Is this your son? Do you say he was born blind? How then doth he now see? That is impossible, and therefore you had better unsay it." Those who cannot bear the light of truth do all they can to eclipse it, and hinder the discovery of it. Their answers to these interrogatories. They fully attest that which they could safely say in this matter (v. 20): We know that this is our son, and we know that he was born blind. It had cost them many a sad thought, and many a careful troublesome hour, about him. Those who are ashamed of their children because of their bodily infirmities, may take a reproof from these parents, who freely owned, This is our son, though he was born blind. They cautiously decline giving any evidence concerning his cure. They were not themselves eye-witnesses of it, and could say nothing to it of their own knowledge. Observe how warily they express themselves (v. 21): "By what means he now seeth we know not, or who has opened his eyes we know not." Now these parents of the blind man were bound in gratitude to have borne their testimony to the honour of the Lord Jesus, who had done their son so great a kindness; but they had not courage to do it, and then thought it might serve to atone for their not appearing in favour of him that they said nothing to his prejudice. They refer themselves and the court to him: He is of age, ask him, he shall speak for himself. This man, though he was born blind, seems to have been of quick understanding above many. Thus God often by a kind providence makes up in the mind what is wanting in the body. His parents' turning them over to him was only to save themselves from trouble. See the reason why they were so cautious (v. 22, 23): Because they feared the Jews. Because they would shift trouble off from themselves. Near is my friend, and near is my child, and perhaps near is my religion, but nearer is myself. Note,

(1) The late law which the sanhedrim had made. If any man within their jurisdiction did confess that Jesus was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue. [1] The crime designed to be punished, and that was embracing Jesus of Nazareth as the promised Messiah, and confessing of him. They themselves did expect a Messiah, but they could by no means bear to think that this Jesus should be he. First, Because his precepts were all so contrary to their traditional laws. The spiritual worship he prescribed overthrew their formalities. Humility and mortification, repentance and self-denial, were lessons new to them and sounded harsh and strange in their ears. Secondly, Because his promises and appearances were so contrary to their traditional hopes. Now to hear of a Messiah whose outward circumstances were all mean and poor, and at the same time bade his followers expect the cross, and count upon persecution; this was such a disappointment to all their hopes, that they could never be reconciled to it. Right or wrong, it must be crushed.

[2] The penalty to be inflicted for this crime. If any should own himself a disciple of Jesus, he should therefore be put out of the synagogue, as one that had rendered himself unworthy of the honours, and incapable of the privileges, of their church. Nor was this merely an ecclesiastical censure. It was, in effect, an outlawry. Christ's holy religion, from its first rise, has been opposed by penal laws made against the professors of it. The church's artillery, when the command of it has fallen into ill hands, has often been turned against itself. It is no new thing to see those cast out of the synagogue that were the greatest ornaments and blessings of it. They had already agreed it. Thus early were they aware of his growing interest, and already agreed to do their utmost to suppress it.

(2) The influence which this law had upon the parents of the blind man. They declined saying anything of Christ, because they feared the Jews. Christ had incurred the frowns of the government to do their son a kindness, but they would not incur them to do him any honour. Let us now go on with the examination of the man himself.

(3) They enquired of him concerning the manner of the cure, v. 15, 16.

[1] The same question which his neighbours had put to him now again the Pharisees asked him, how he had received his sight. This they enquired not with any sincere desire to find out the truth, but with a desire to find an occasion against Christ.

[2] The same answer, in effect, which he had before given to his neighbours, he here repeats to the Pharisees: He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and do see. In the former account he said, I washed, and received sight; but lest they should think it was only a glimpse, he now says, "I do see; it is a complete and lasting cure."

[3] The remarks made upon this story were very different, and occasioned a debate in the court, v. 16.

First, Some took this occasion to censure and condemn Christ. Some of the Pharisees said, This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the sabbath day. The doctrine upon which this censure is grounded is very true—that those are not of God who do not keep the sabbath day. Those that are of God will keep the commandments of God; and this is his commandment, that we sanctify the sabbath. The application of it to our Saviour is very unjust, for he did religiously observe the sabbath day, never did otherwise than well on the sabbath day. He did not keep the sabbath according to the tradition of the elders, but he kept it according to the command of God. Much unrighteousness and uncharitable judging is occasioned by men's making the rules of religion more strict than God has made them, and adding their own fancies to God's appointments. Everything that we take for a rule of practice must not presently be made a rule of judgment.

Secondly, Others spoke in his favour, and very pertinently urged, How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles? There were some that were witnesses for Christ, even in the midst of his enemies. The matter of fact was plain, that this was a true miracle. Such things as these could never be done by a man that is a sinner. Such a one may indeed show some signs and lying wonders, but not such signs and true wonders as Christ wrought. Thus there was a division among them. Thus God defeats the counsels of his enemies by dividing them.

2. Their enquiry concerning the author of it.

(1) What the man said of him. They ask him (v. 17), "What sayest thou of him, seeing that he has opened thine eyes?" If he should speak slightly of Christ, in answer to this, as he might be tempted to do, to please them, they would have triumphed in it. Nothing confirms Christ's enemies in their enmity to him so much as the slights put upon him by those that have passed for his friends. But if he should speak honourably of Christ, they would prosecute him. They would make him an example. Or perhaps Christ's friends proposed to have the man's own sentiments concerning his physician, since he appeared to be a sensible man. Those whose eyes Christ has opened know best what to say of him. What think we of Christ? To this question the poor man makes a short, plain, and direct answer: He is a prophet. It should seem, this man had not any thoughts that Christ was the Messiah, the great prophet. This blind man thought well of Christ according to the light he had, though he did not think well enough of him. This poor blind beggar had a clearer judgment of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God than the masters in Israel.

(2) What they said of him, in reply to the man's testimony. Finding that indeed a notable miracle was wrought, and they could not deny it, they do all they can to shake the good opinion the man had of him that opened his eyes, and to convince him that Christ was a bad man (v. 24): Give God the praise, we know that this man is a sinner. Two ways this is understood: By way of advice, to take heed of ascribing the praise of his cure to a sinful man, but to give it all to God. When God makes use of men that are sinners as instruments of good to us, we must give God the glory, and yet there is gratitude owing to the instruments. It was a good word, Give God the praise, but here it was ill used. By way of adjuration; "We know that this man is a sinner; this we are sure of, therefore give God praise. In God's name, man, tell the truth." See how basely they speak of the Lord Jesus: We know that this man is a sinner, is a man of sin. Their insolence and pride. They know very well that he is a sinner, and nobody can convince them of the contrary. He had challenged them to their faces (ch. viii. 46) to convince him of sin, and they had nothing to say; but now behind his back they speak of him as a malefactor. Thus false accusers make up in confidence what is wanting in proof. The injury and indignity hereby done to the Lord Jesus. When he became man, he took upon him the form not only of a servant, but of a sinner. Being made sin for us, he despised even this shame.

3. The debate that arose between the Pharisees and this poor man concerning Christ. They say, He is a sinner; he says, He is a prophet. It is an encouragement to those who are called out to witness for Christ to find with what prudence and courage this man managed his defence, according to the promise, It shall be given you in that same hour what you shall speak. Now in the parley we may observe three steps:

(1) He sticks to the certain matter of fact the evidence of which they endeavour to shake. He adheres to that which to himself, at least, was past dispute (v. 25): "Whether he be a sinner or no I know not," or, as it might better be rendered, "If he be a sinner, I know it not, for this one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see, and therefore he is a prophet; I am both able and bound to speak well of him." He tacitly reproves their great assurance of the ill character they gave of the blessed Jesus: "I, who know him as well as you do, cannot give him any such character." He boldly relies upon his own experience of the power and goodness of the holy Jesus, and resolves to abide by it. There is no disputing against experience. As Christ's mercies are most valued by those that have felt the want of them, so the most powerful and durable affections to Christ are those that arise from an experimental knowledge of him. Thus in the work of grace in the soul, though we cannot tell when and how, the blessed change was wrought, yet we may take the comfort of it if we can say, through grace, "Whereas I was blind, now I see." A needless repetition of their enquiries into it (v. 26): What did he to thee? How opened he thine eyes? They asked these questions, because they wanted something to say, and would rather speak impertinently than seem to be silenced; because they hoped, by putting the man upon repeating his evidence, to catch him tripping in it.

(2) He upbraids them with their invincible prejudices, and they revile him as a disciple of Jesus, v. 27–29.

[1] Their wilful and unreasonable opposition to the evidence of this miracle, v. 27. He would not gratify them with a repetition of the story: I have told you already, and you did not hear, wherefore would you hear it again, will you also be his disciples? Some think that he spoke seriously, and really expecting that they would be convinced. But it rather seems to be spoken ironically: "Will you be his disciples? No, I know you abhor the thoughts of it." Those that wilfully shut their eyes against the light, as these Pharisees here did, First, Make themselves contemptible and base. Secondly, They forfeit all the benefit of further instruction. They that have been told once, and would not hear, why should they be told it again? Thirdly, They hereby receive the grace of God in vain. This is implied in that, "Will you be his disciples?" Those who will not see cause to embrace Christ, and join with his followers, yet, one would think, should see cause enough not to hate and persecute him and them.

[2] For this they scorn and revile him, v. 28. When they could not resist the wisdom and spirit by which he spoke, they broke out into a passion. The method commonly taken by unreasonable man is to make out with railing what is wanting in truth and reason.

First, They taunted this man for his affection to Christ; they said, Thou art his disciple. They reviled him. The Vulgate reads it, they cursed him; and what was their curse? It was this, Be thou his disciple. "May such a curse" (saith St. Austin here) "ever be on us and on our children!" They had no reason to call this man a disciple of Christ. He had spoken favourably of a kindness Christ had done him, and this they could not bear.

Secondly, They gloried in their relation to Moses as their Master: "We are Moses's disciples." These Pharisees had before boasted of their good parentage: We are Abraham's seed; here they boast of their good education, We are Moses's disciples; as if these would save them. There was a perfect harmony between Christ and Moses; they might be disciples of Moses and become the disciples of Christ too; and yet they here put them in opposition. If we rightly understand the matter, we shall see God's grace and man's duty meet together and kiss and befriend each other.

Thirdly, They gave some sort of reason for their adhering to Moses against Christ (v. 29): We know that God spoke unto Moses; as for this fellow, we know not whence he is. But did they not know that they must expect another prophet, and a further revelation of the mind of God? yet, when our Lord Jesus did appear, they not only forfeited, but forsook, their own mercies. In this argument of theirs observe, a. How impertinently they allege that which none of his followers ever denied: We know that God spoke unto Moses, and, thanks be to God, we know it too. Moses was a prophet, it is true, and might not Jesus be a prophet also? b. How absurdly they urge their ignorance of Christ as a reason to justify their contempt of him: As for this fellow. Thus scornfully do they speak of the blessed Jesus, as if they did not think it worth while to charge their memories with a name so inconsiderable. As for this fellow, this sorry fellow, we know not whence he is. It was not long ago that the Jews had made the contrary to this an objection against Christ (ch. vii. 27): We know this man whence he is, but when Christ comes no man knows whence he is. Thus they could with the greatest assurance either affirm or deny the same thing, according as they saw it would serve their turn. See the absurdity of infidelity. Men will not know the doctrine of Christ because they are resolved they will not believe it, and then pretend they do not believe it because they do not know it.

4. He reasons with them, and they excommunicate him.

(1) The poor man, finding that he had reason on his side, grows more bold. He wonders at their obstinate infidelity (v. 30). He bravely answered, "Why, herein is a marvellous thing, that you know not whence he is, and yet he has opened mine eyes." Two things he wonders at: [1] That they should be strangers to a man so famous. He that could open the eyes of the blind must certainly be a considerable man, and worth taking notice of. That they should talk as if they thought it below them to take cognizance of such a man as this, this is a strange thing indeed. There are many who pass for learned and knowing men, who have no concern, no, not so much as a curiosity, to acquaint themselves with that which the angels desire to look into. [2] That they should question the divine mission of one that had undoubtedly wrought a divine miracle. "Now this is strange," saith the poor man, "that the miracle wrought upon me has not convinced you, that you should thus shut your eyes against the light." Had Christ opened the eyes of the Pharisees, they would not have doubted his being a prophet. He argues strongly against them, v. 31–33. The man here proves not only that he was not a sinner (v. 31), but that he was of God, v. 33.

a. He argues here, (a) With great knowledge. Though he could not read a letter of the book, he was well acquainted with the scripture; he had wanted the sense of seeing, yet had well improved that of hearing, by which faith cometh. (b) With great zeal for the honour of Christ. (c) With great boldness, and courage. Those that are ambitious of the favours of God must not be afraid of the frowns of men.

b. His argument may be reduced into form, somewhat like that of David, Ps. lxvi. 18–20. If I regard iniquity in my heart, God will not hear me. But verily God hath heard me; blessed be God.

(a) He lays it down for an undoubted truth that none but good men are the favourites of heaven (v. 31): Now we know that God heareth not sinners but if any man be a worshipper of God, and does his will, him he heareth. The assertions, rightly understood, are true. Be it spoken to the terror of the wicked, God heareth not sinners. This bespeaks no discouragement to repenting returning sinners, but to those that go on still in their trespasses. God will not hear them. Be it spoken to the comfort of the righteous, If any man be a worshipper of God, and does his will, him he heareth. The complete character of a good man: he is one that worships God, and does his will. The unspeakable comfort of such a man: him God hears; hears his prayers, and answers them.

(b) He magnifies the miracles which Christ had wrought, to strengthen the argument the more (v. 32): Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind. It was a true miracle, and above the power of nature; it was never heard that any man, by the use of natural means, had cured one that was born blind. It was an extraordinary miracle, and beyond the precedents of former miracles. Moses wrought miraculous plagues, but Christ wrought miraculous cures.

(c) He therefore concludes, If this man were not of God, he could do nothing. What Christ did on earth sufficiently demonstrated what he was in heaven. We may each of us know by this whether we are of God or no: What do we? What do we more than others?

(2) The Pharisees fell foul upon him, and broke off the discourse, v. 34. What they said. Having nothing to reply to his argument, they reflected upon his person: Thou wast altogether born in sin, and dost thou teach it? [1] How they despised him: "Thou wast not only born in sin, as every man is, but altogether so, and bearing about with thee in thy body as well as in thy soul the marks of that corruption; thou waste one whom nature stigmatized." It was most unjust to take notice of it now that the cure had not only rolled away the reproach of his blindness, but had signalised him as a favourite of Heaven. [2] How they disdain to learn of him: Dost thou teach us? A mighty emphasis must be laid here upon thou and us. "What! wilt thou, a silly sorry fellow, ignorant and illiterate, wilt thou pretend to teach us, that sit in Moses's chair. Proud men scorn to be taught, especially by their inferiors, whereas we should never think ourselves too old, nor too wise, nor too good, to learn. Those that have much wealth would have more; and why not those that have much knowledge? What they did: They cast him out. Some understand it only of a rude and scornful dismission of him from their council-board. But it seems rather to be a judicial act; they excommunicated him.

Verses 35–38

I. The tender care which our Lord Jesus took of this poor man (v. 35): When Jesus heard that they had cast him out, then he found him, which implies his seeking him and looking after him, that he might encourage and comfort him, 1. Because he had spoken so very well, so bravely, so boldly, in defence of the Lord Jesus. Jesus Christ will be sure to stand by his witnesses, and own those that own him and his truth and ways. It shall redound not only to our credit hereafter, but our comfort now. 2. Because the Pharisees had cast him out. Here was one poor man suffering for Christ, and he took care that as his afflictions abounded his consolations should much more abound. Happy are they who have a friend from whom men cannot debar them. Jesus Christ will graciously find and receive those who for his sake are unjustly rejected and cast out by men.

II. The comfortable converse Christ had with him. Christ gives him further instruction; for he that is faithful in a little shall be entrusted with more, Matt. xiii. 12.

1. Our Lord Jesus examines his faith: "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" The Messiah is here called the Son of God. Christ, that he might give us an idea of his kingdom, as purely spiritual and divine, calls himself the Son of God.

2. The poor man solicitously enquires concerning the Messiah he was to believe in, professing his readiness to embrace him (v. 36): Who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him? Some think he did know that Jesus, who cured him, was the Son of God, but did not know which was Jesus, and therefore, supposing this person that talked with him to be a follower of Jesus, desired him to do him the favour to direct him to his master. Others think he did know that this person who talked with him was Jesus, whom he believed a great and good man and a prophet, but did not yet know that he was the Son of God. "Thou who hast given me bodily sight, tell me, O tell me, who and where this Son of God is." The question was rational and just: Who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him?

3. Our Lord Jesus graciously reveals himself to him as that Son of God: Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee, v. 37. We do not find that Christ did thus expressly, and in so many words, reveal himself to any other as to this man here and to the woman of Samaria. He left others to find out by arguments who he was. Christ here describes himself to this man by two things: (1) Thou hast seen him. Now he was made sensible, more than ever, what an unspeakable mercy it was to be cured of his blindness, that he might see the Son of God. The greatest comfort of bodily eyesight is its serviceableness to our faith and the interests of our souls. Can we say that by faith we have seen Christ, seen him in his beauty and glory? Let us give him the praise, who opened our eyes. (2) It is he that talketh with thee. Great princes are willing to be seen by those whom yet they will not vouchsafe to talk with. But Christ talks with those whose desires are towards him, and manifests himself to them, as he did to the two disciples, when he talked their hearts warm, Luke xxiv. 32. This poor man was solicitously enquiring after the Saviour, when at the same time he saw him, and was talking with him. Jesus Christ is often nearer the souls that seek him than they themselves are aware of.

4. The poor man readily entertains this surprising revelation and said, Lord, I believe, and he worshipped him. He professed his faith in Christ: Lord, I believe thee to be the Son of God. He would not dispute anything that he said who had shown such mercy to him, and wrought such a miracle for him. Believing with the heart, he thus confesses with the mouth; and now the bruised reed was become a cedar. He paid his homage to him: He worshipped him. In worshipping Jesus he owned him to be God. Those who believe in him will see all the reason in the world to worship him. We never read any more of this man.

Verses 39–41

I. The account Christ gives of his design in coming into the world (v. 39): For judgment I am come. What Christ spoke, he spoke not as a preacher in the pulpit, but as a king upon the throne, and a judge upon the bench.

1. His business in the world was great. He came for judgment. To preach a doctrine and a law which would try men, and effectually discover and distinguish them. To put a difference between men, by revealing the thoughts of many hearts, and laying open men's true characters.

2. This great truth he explains by a metaphor borrowed from the miracle which he had lately wrought. That those who see not might see, and that those who see might be made blind. (1) This is applicable to nations and people. The Gentiles see a great light, while blindness is happened unto Israel, and their eyes are darkened. (2) To particular persons. Christ came into the world, [1] Intentionally and designedly to give sight to those that were spiritually blind; by his word to reveal the object, and by his Spirit to heal the organ, that many precious souls might be turned from darkness to light. [2] Eventually, and in the issue, that those who see might be made blind; that those who have a high conceit of their own wisdom, and set up that in contradiction to divine revelation, might be sealed up in ignorance. The preaching of the cross was foolishness to those who by wisdom knew not God.

II. The Pharisees' cavil at this. They said, Are we blind also? When Christ said that those who saw should by his coming be made blind, they apprehended that he meant them, who were the seers of the people, and valued themselves on their insight and foresight. "We know that the common people are blind; but are we blind also?" Frequently those that need reproof most, and deserve it best, though they have wit enough to discern a tacit one, have not grace enough to bear a just one. These Pharisees took this reproof for a reproach.

III. Christ's answer to this cavil, which, if it did not convince them, yet silenced them: If you were blind you should have no sin; but now you say, We see, therefore your sin remaineth. They gloried that they were not blind, but would see with their own eyes, having abilities, as they thought, sufficient for their own guidance. This very thing which they gloried in, Christ here tells them, was their shame and ruin.

1. If you were blind, you would have no sin. If you were blind you would have had comparatively no sin. The times of ignorance God winked at. It will be more tolerable with those that perish for lack of vision than with those that rebel against the light. "If you had been sensible of your own blindness you would soon have accepted Christ as your guide, and then you would have had no sin." Those that are convinced of their disease are in a fair way to be cured, for there is not a greater hindrance to the salvation of souls than self-sufficiency.

2. "But now you say, We see; now that you have knowledge, and are instructed out of the law, and now that you think you see your way better than anybody can show it you, therefore your sin remains." And as those are most blind who will not see, so their blindness is most dangerous who fancy they do see. Hearest thou the Pharisees say, We see? There is more hope of a fool, of a publican and a harlot, than of such.

CHAP. X

I. Christ's parabolical discourse concerning himself as the door of the sheepfold and the shepherd of the sheep, ver. 1–18. II. The various sentiments of people upon it, ver. 19–21. III. The dispute Christ had with the Jews in the temple at the feast of dedication, ver. 22–39. IV. His departure into the country thereupon, ver. 40–42.

Verses 1–18

The Pharisees supported themselves in their opposition to Christ with this principle, that they were the pastors of the church, and that Jesus was an intruder and an imposter, and therefore the people were bound in duty to stick to them, against him. In opposition to this, Christ here describes who were the false shepherds, and who the true, leaving them to infer what they were.

I. Here is the parable or similitude proposed (v. 1–5). Verily, verily, I say unto you,—Amen, amen. This vehement asseveration intimates the certainty and weight of what he said.

1. In the parable we have, (1) A thief and a robber, that comes to do mischief to the flock, and damage to the owner, v. 1. He enters not by the door, as having no lawful cause of entry, but climbs up some other way. How industrious are wicked people to do mischief! This should shame us out of our slothfulness and cowardice in the service of God. (2) The character that distinguishes the rightful owner. He enters in by the door (v. 2), and he comes to do them some good office or other. Sheep need man's care, and, in return for it, are serviceable to man, they clothe and feed those by whom they are coted and fed. (3) The ready entrance that the shepherd finds: To him the porter openeth, v. 3. (4) The care he takes. The sheep hear his voice, and, which is more, he calls his own sheep by name, so exact is the notice he takes of them, and he leads them out from the fold to the green pastures (v. 4, 5). He does not drive them, but (such was the custom in those times) he goes before them, and they, being used to it, follow him, and are safe. (5) The strange attendance of the sheep upon the shepherd: They know his voice, and a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him, not knowing his voice.

2. Good men are fitly compared to sheep. Men, as creatures depending on their Creator, are called the sheep of his pasture. The church of God in the world is a sheepfold, into which the children of God that were scattered abroad are gathered together (ch. xi. 52). This sheepfold lies much exposed to thieves and robbers; wolves in sheep's clothing, Matt. vii. 15. The great Shepherd of the sheep takes wonderful care of the flock and of all that belong to it. God is the great Shepherd, Ps. xxiii. 1. The under-shepherds, who are entrusted to feed the flock of God, ought to be careful and faithful in the discharge of that trust. Ministers must serve them in their spiritual interests, must feed their souls with the word of God. They must know the members of their flocks by name, and watch over them; must lead them into the pastures of public ordinances, be their mouth to God and God's to them. Those who are truly the sheep of Christ will be very observant of their Shepherd, and very cautious and shy of strangers. They follow their Shepherd, for they know his voice, having both a discerning ear, and an obedient heart. They flee from a stranger, and dread following him, because they know not his voice.

II. The Jews' ignorance of the drift and meaning of this discourse (v. 6): Jesus spoke this parable to them, but they understood not what the things were which he spoke unto them. The Pharisees had a great conceit of their own knowledge, and yet they had not sense enough to understand the things that Jesus spoke of; they were above their capacity. Frequently the greatest pretenders to knowledge are most ignorant in the things of God.

III. Christ's explication of this parable. Christ, in the parable, had distinguished the shepherd from the robber by this, that he enters in by the door. He makes himself to be both the door by which the shepherd enters and the shepherd that enters in by the door.

1. Christ is the door. He saith it to the Jews, who would be thought God's only sheep, and to the Pharisees, who would be thought their only shepherds: I am the door of the sheepfold.

(1) In general, he is as a door shut, to keep out thieves and robbers, and such as are not fit to be admitted. He is as a door open for passage and communication. By Christ, as the door, we have our first admission into the flock of God. By him God comes to his church, visits it, and communicates himself to it. By him, as the door, the sheep are at last admitted into the heavenly kingdom.

(2) More particularly,

[1] Christ is the door of the shepherds, so that none who come not in by him are to be accounted pastors, but thieves and robbers (though they pretended to be shepherds); but the sheep did not hear them. The character given of them: they are thieves and robbers (v. 8); all that went before him, that assumed a precedency and superiority above him. They condemned our Saviour as a thief and a robber, because he did not come in by them as the door, but he shows that they ought to have been admitted by him. The care taken to preserve the sheep from them: But the sheep did not hear them. Those that were spiritual and heavenly could by no means approve of the traditions of the elders, nor relish their formalities.

[2] Christ is the door of the sheep (v. 9): By me if any man enter into the sheepfold, he shall be saved; he shall go in and out. First, Plain directions how to come into the fold: we must come in by Jesus Christ as the door. By faith in him we come into covenant and communion with God. Secondly, Precious promises to those who observe this direction. They shall be saved hereafter; this is the privilege of their home. They shall be for ever happy. In the meantime they shall go in and out and find pasture; this is the privilege of their way. True believers are at home in Christ; when they go out, they are not shut out as strangers, but have liberty to come in again; when they come in, they are not shut in as trespassers, but have liberty to go out. They go out to the field in the morning, they come into the fold at night; and they find pasture in both: grass in the field, fodder in the fold.

2. Christ is the shepherd, v. 11, &c. God has constituted his Son Jesus to be our shepherd; and here again and again he owns the relation. He expects all that attendance and observance which the shepherds in those countries had from their flocks.

(1) Christ is a shepherd, and not as the thief. The mischievous design of the thief (v. 10): The thief cometh not but to steal, and to kill, and to destroy. Those whom they steal, whose hearts and affections they steal from Christ and his pastures, they kill and destroy spiritually. Deceivers of souls are murderers of souls. The gracious design of the shepherd; he is come,

First, To give life to the sheep. Christ saith, I am come among men, [1] That they might have life. He came to put life into the flock, the church in general, which had seemed rather like a valley full of dry bones than like a pasture covered over with flocks. He came to give life to particular believers. Life is inclusive of all good. [2] That they might have it more abundantly, that they might have a life more abundant than could have been expected or than we are able to ask or think. But it may be construed that they might have abundance. Christ came to give life and something more, something better, life with advantage. Life in abundance is eternal life, life and much more.

Secondly, To give his life for the sheep, and this that he might give life to them (v. 11): The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. It is the property of every good shepherd to hazard and expose his life for the sheep. It was the prerogative of the great Shepherd to give his life to purchase his flock.

(2) Christ is a good shepherd, and not as a hireling. There were many that were not thieves, yet were very careless in the discharge of their duty, and through their neglect the flock was greatly damaged. Christ here calls himself the good shepherd (v. 11), and again (v. 14). Jesus Christ is the best of shepherds, none so skilful, so faithful, so tender, as he. He proves himself so, in opposition to all hirelings, v. 12–14. The carelessness of the unfaithful shepherd described (v. 12, 13); he that is a hireling, whose own the sheep are not, sees the wolf coming, and leaves the sheep, for in truth he careth not for them. Evil shepherds, magistrates and ministers, are here described both by their bad principles and their bad practices. Their bad principles, the root of their bad practices. What makes those that have the charge of souls in trying times to betray their trust, and in quiet times not to mind it? It is because they are hirelings, and care not for the sheep. The wealth of the world is the chief of their good; it is because they are hirelings. They undertook the shepherds' office, as a trade to live and grow rich by. It is the love of money, and of their own bellies, that carries them on in it. Those are hirelings that love the wages more than the work. The work of their place is the least of their care. They value not the sheep, are unconcerned in the souls of others. They seek their own things. What can be expected but that they will flee when the wolf comes. He careth not for the sheep, for he is one whose own the sheep are not. Their bad practices, the effect of these bad principles, v. 12. How basely the hireling deserts his post; when he sees the wolf coming he leaves the sheep and flees. Those who mind their safety more than their duty are an easy prey to Satan's temptations. How fatal the consequences are! The wolf catches them, and scatters the sheep, and woeful havoc is made of the flock. See here the grace and tenderness of the good Shepherd. The Lord Jesus is, and will be, as he ever has been, the good Shepherd. Here are two great instances of the shepherd's goodness.

[1] His acquainting himself with his flock.

a. He is acquainted with all that are now of his flock (v. 14, 15), as the good Shepherd (v. 3, 4): I know my sheep and am known of mine. They know one another very well, and knowledge notes affection. Christ knows his sheep. He knows who are his sheep, and who are not; he knows the sheep under their many infirmities, and the goats under their most plausible disguises. He knows them, that is, he approves and accepts of them. He is known of them. They observe him with an eye of faith. It is not so much our knowing him as our being known of him that is our happiness. Upon this occasion Christ mentions (v. 15) the mutual acquaintance between his Father and himself: As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father. First, As the ground of that intimate acquaintance and relation which subsist between Christ and believers. The Lord Jesus knows whom he hath chosen, and is sure of them (ch. xiii. 18), and they also know whom they have trusted, and are sure of him (2 Tim. i. 12), and the ground of both is the perfect knowledge which the Father and the Son had of one another's mind. Secondly, As an apt similitude, illustrating the intimacy that is between Christ and believers. It may be connected with the foregoing words, thus: I know my sheep, and am known of mine, even as the Father knows me, and I know the Father. As the Father knew the Son, and loved him, so Christ knows his sheep, and has a watchful tender eye upon them. As the Son knew the Father, loved and obeyed him, so believers know Christ.

b. He is acquainted with those that are hereafter to be of this flock (v. 16): Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring.

(a) The eye that Christ had to the poor Gentiles. He had sometimes intimated his special concern for the lost sheep of the house of Israel, but, saith he, I have other sheep. Those who in process of time should believe in Christ, from among the Gentiles, are here called sheep. Christ has a right to many a soul of which he has not yet the possession. Christ speaks of those other sheep to take off the contempt that was put upon him, as having but a little flock, and therefore, if a good shepherd, yet a poor shepherd: "But," saith he, "I have more sheep than you see."

(b) The purposes and resolves of his grace concerning them: "Them also I must bring." But why must he bring them? What was the necessity? The necessity of their case required it. Like sheep, they will never come back, of themselves. The necessity of his own engagements required it; he must bring them, or he would not be faithful to his trust.

(c) The happy effect and consequence of this. "They shall hear my voice. It shall be heard by them; I will speak, and give to them to hear." Faith comes by hearing. There shall be one fold and one shepherd. As there is one shepherd, so there shall be one fold. Both Jews and Gentiles shall be incorporated in one church. Being united to Christ, they shall unite in him; two sticks shall become one in the hand of the Lord.

[2] Christ's offering up himself for his sheep v. 15, 17, 18.

a. He declares his purpose of dying for his flock (v. 15): I lay down my life for the sheep. He laid down his life not only for the good of the sheep, but in their stead. Thousands of sheep had been offered in sacrifice for their shepherds, as sin-offerings, but here, by a surprising reverse, the shepherd is sacrificed for the sheep. Though the smiting of the shepherd be for the present the scattering of the flock, it is in order to the gathering of them in.

b. He takes off the offence of the cross by four considerations:

(a) That his laying down his life for the sheep entitled him to the honours and powers of his exalted state (v. 17): "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life." He was therefore beloved of the Father because he undertook to die for the sheep. Did he think God's love recompence sufficient for all his services and sufferings, and shall we think it too little for ours, and court the smiles of the world to make it up?

(b) That his laying down his life was in order to his resuming it: I lay down my life, that I may receive it again. God loved him too well to leave him in the grave. He yielded to death, as if he were smitten before it, that he might the more gloriously conquer death, and triumph over the grave.

(c) That he was perfectly voluntary in his sufferings and death (v. 18). "I freely lay it down of myself, for I have power to lay it down, and to take it again." See here the power of Christ, as the Lord of life. He had power to keep his life against all the world. Though Christ's life seemed to be taken by storm, yet really it was surrendered, otherwise it had been impregnable. No man taketh my life from me. He had power to lay down his life. [a] He had ability to do it. He could, when he pleased, slip the knot of union between soul and body. Having voluntarily taken up a body, he could voluntarily lay it down again. [b] He had authority to do it. We are not at liberty to do it; but Christ had a sovereign authority to dispose of his own life as he pleased. He had power to take it again; we have not. Our life, once laid down, is as water spilt upon the ground; but Christ, when he laid down his life, still had it within reach, and could resume it. See here the grace of Christ; he laid it down of himself for our redemption. He offered himself to be the Saviour.

(d) That he did all this by the express order and appointment of his Father: This commandment have I received of my Father.

Verses 19–21

The people's different sentiments concerning Christ. There was a division, a schism, among them. Such a ferment as this they had been in before (ch. vii. 43; ix. 16); and where there has once been a division a little thing will make a division again. Rents are sooner made than made up or mended. But it is better that men should be divided about the doctrine of Christ than united in the service of sin.

I. Some upon this occasion spoke ill of Christ and of his sayings. They said, He has a devil, and is mad, why do you hear him? They reproach him as a demoniac. He is a distracted man, no more to be heard than the rambles of a man in bedlam. They ridicule his hearers: "Why hear you him?" Men would not thus be laughed out of their necessary food, and yet suffer themselves to be laughed out of what is more necessary.

II. Others stood up in defence of him, and, though the stream ran strong, dared to swim against it. They could not bear to hear him thus abused. If they could say no more of him, this they would maintain, that he was a man in his wits, that he had not a devil, that he was neither senseless nor graceless. Two things they plead: 1. The excellency of his doctrine: "These are not the words of him that hath a devil. These are not the words of one that is either violently possessed with a devil or voluntarily in league with the devil." So much of holiness there is in the words of Christ that we may conclude they are not the words of one that has a devil, and therefore are the words of one that was sent of God. 2. The power of his miracles: Can a devil open the eyes of the blind? Neither mad men nor bad men can work miracles. The devil will sooner put out men's eyes than open them. Therefore Jesus had not a devil.

It is hard to say which is more strange, the gracious words that came out of his mouth or the spiteful ones that came out of theirs.

I. It was at the feast of dedication, and it was winter, a feast that was annually observed by consent, in remembrance of the dedication of a new altar and the purging of the temple, by Judas Maccabæus. The return of their liberty was to them as life from the dead, and, in remembrance of it, they kept an annual feast about the beginning of December, and seven days after. The celebrating of it was not confined to Jerusalem, but every one observed it in his own place, not as a holy time, but as a good time.

II. The place where it was (v. 23): Jesus walked in the temple in Solomon's porch. He walked, ready to give audience to any that should apply to him, and to offer them his services. Those that have anything to say to Christ may find him in the temple and walk with him there.

III. The conference itself.

1. A weighty question put to him by the Jews, v. 24. They came round about him, to tease him; he was waiting for an opportunity to do them a kindness. Ill-will for good-will is no rare and uncommon return. They came about him pretending an impartial and importunate enquiry after truth, but intending a general assault upon our Lord Jesus: How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ tell us. They quarrel with him, as if he had unfairly held them in suspense hitherto. "How long dost thou keep us in suspense? How long are we kept debating whether thou be the Christ or no?" It was the effect of their infidelity, and powerful prejudices. The struggle was between their convictions, which told them he was Christ, and their corruptions, which said, No, because he was not such a Christ as they expected. They laid the blame of their doubting upon Christ himself, as if he made them to doubt by inconsistency with himself. Christ would make us to believe; we make ourselves to doubt. They challenge him to give a direct and categorical answer: "If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly, in so many words, either that thou art the Christ, or, as John Baptist, that thou art not," ch. i. 20. Now this pressing query of theirs was seemingly good; but it was really bad, and put with an ill design. Everyone knew the Messiah was to be a king, and therefore whoever pretended to be the Messiah would be prosecuted as a traitor, which was the thing they would have been at.

2. Christ's answer to this question.

(1) He justifies himself, referring them, [1] To what he had said: I have told you. He had told them that he was the Son of God, the Son of man. And is not this the Christ then? You believed not. They pretended that they only doubted, but Christ tells them that they did not believe. It is not for us to teach God how he should teach us, but to be thankful for divine revelation as we have it. [2] He refers them to his works, to the example of his life, and especially to his miracles. No man could do those miracles except God were with him, and God would not be with him to attest a forgery.

(2) He condemns them for their obstinate unbelief: "You believed not." But the reason he gives is very surprising: "You believed not, because you are not of my sheep. You are not disposed to be my followers, you will not herd yourselves with my sheep, will not come and see, come and hear my voice." Rooted antipathies to the gospel of Christ are the bonds of iniquity and infidelity.

(3) He takes this occasion to describe both the gracious disposition and the happy state of those that are his sheep.

[1] To convince them that they were not his sheep, he tells them what were the characters of his sheep. They hear his voice (v. 27), for they know it to be his (v. 4), and he has undertaken that they shall hear it, v. 16. They discern it. They delight in it. They do according to it. Christ will not account those his sheep that are deaf to his calls, deaf to his charms. They follow him. The word of command has always been, Follow me. We must tread in his steps—follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes. In vain do we hear his voice if we do not follow him.

[2] To convince them that it was their great unhappiness and misery not to be of Christ's sheep, he here describes the blessed state and case of those that are. Our Lord Jesus takes cognizance of his sheep: They hear my voice, and I know them. He distinguishes them from others (2 Tim. ii. 19), has a particular regard to every individual (Ps. xxxiv. 6). He has provided a happiness for them: I give unto them eternal life, v. 28. Man has a living soul; therefore the happiness provided is life. Man has an immortal soul: therefore the happiness provided is eternal life. Life eternal is the felicity and chief good of a soul immortal. I give it to them; it is given by the free grace of Jesus Christ. Not I will give it, but I do give it; it is a present gift. He gives the assurance of it, heaven in the seed, in the bud, in the embryo. He has undertaken for their security and preservation to this happiness. They shall by no means perish for ever; so the words are. As there is an eternal life, so there is an eternal destruction. They shall not come into condemnation. Shepherds that have large flocks often lose some of the sheep and suffer them to perish; but Christ has engaged that none of his sheep shall perish, not one. They cannot be kept from their everlasting happiness. His own power is engaged for them: Neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand. The Shepherd is so careful of their welfare that he has them not only within his fold, but in his hand, and taken under his special protection. Yet their enemies are so daring that they attempt to pluck them out of his hand; but they cannot, they shall not do it. Those are safe who are in the hands of the Lord Jesus. His Father's power is likewise engaged for their preservation, v. 29. a. The power of the Father: My Father is greater than all; greater than all the other friends of the church, all the other shepherds, magistrates or ministers. Those shepherds slumber and sleep, but he keeps his flock day and night. He is greater than all the enemies of the church. He is greater than all the combined force of hell and earth. The devil and his angels have had many a push, many a pluck for the mastery, but have never yet prevailed. b. The interest of the Father in the sheep: "It is my Father that gave them to me," and therefore God will still look after them. All the divine power is engaged for the accomplishment of all the divine counsels. c. The safety of the saints inferred from these two. None (neither man nor devil) is able to pluck them out of the Father's hand. Christ had himself experienced the power of his Father upholding and strengthening him, and therefore puts all his followers into his hand too. He that secured the glory of the Redeemer will secure the glory of the redeemed. Further to corroborate the security, he asserts: "I and my Father are one." The Jews understood him as hereby making himself God (v. 33), and he did not deny it. None could pluck them out of his hand because they could not pluck them out of the Father's hand.

IV. The rage of the Jews. The Jews took up stones again, v. 31. It is not the word that is used before (ch. viii. 59), but they carried stones—great stones, such as they used in stoning malefactors. The absurdity of this insult will appear if we consider that they had imperiously, not to say impudently, challenged him to tell them plainly whether he was the Christ or no; and yet now they condemned him as a malefactor. If the preachers of the truth propose it modestly, they are branded as cowards; if boldly, as insolent. When they had before made a similar attempt it was in vain; he escaped through the midst of them (ch. viii. 59); yet they repeat their baffled attempt. Daring sinners will throw stones at heaven, though they return upon their own heads.

V. Christ's tender expostulation with them (v. 32): Jesus answered what they did, for we do not find that they said anything. He mildly replied, Many good works have I shown you from my Father: for which of those works do you stone me? Words so very tender that one would think they should have melted a heart of stone. In dealing with his enemies he still argued from his works (men evidence what they are by what they do), his good works; the expression signifies both great works and good works.

1. The divine power of his works convicted them of the most obstinate infidelity. They were works from his Father. These works he showed them; he did them openly before the people. He did not show his works by candle-light, as those that are concerned only for show, but he showed them at noon-day before the world, ch. xviii. 20. His works were an incontestable demonstration of the validity of his commission.

2. The divine grace of his works convicted them of the most base ingratitude. The works he did among them were not only works of wonder to amaze them, but works of love and kindness to do them good, and so make them good. "Now, for which of these do you stone me? If therefore you will pick a quarrel with me, it must be for some good work; tell me for which." When he asks, For which of these do you stone me? as he intimates the abundant satisfaction he had in his own innocency, so he puts his persecutors upon considering what was the true reason of their enmity, and asking: Why persecute we him?

VI. Their vindication of the attempt they made upon Christ, v. 33.

1. They would not be thought such enemies to their country as to persecute him for a good work: For a good work we stone thee not. For indeed they would scarcely allow any of his works to be so. But, if he had done any good works, they would not own that they stoned him for them. Thus, though most absurd, they could not be brought to own their absurdities.

2. They would be thought such friends to God as to prosecute him for blasphemy: Because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God.

(1) A pretended zeal for the law. They seem mightily concerned for the honour of the divine majesty. A blasphemer was to be stoned, Lev. xxiv. 16. The vilest practices are often varnished with plausible pretences. As nothing is more courageous than a well-informed conscience, so nothing is more outrageous than a mistaken one.

(2) A real enmity to the gospel by representing Christ as a blasphemer. It is no new thing for the worst of characters to be put upon the best of men, by those that resolve to give them the worst of treatment. The crime laid to his charge is blasphemy. The proof of the crime: Thou, being a man, makest thyself God. As it is God's glory that he is God, so it is his glory that besides him there is no other. Thus far they were in the right, that what Christ said of himself amounted to this—that he was God, for he had said that he was one with the Father and that he would give eternal life; and Christ does not deny it. They were much mistaken when they looked upon him as a mere man, and that the Godhead he claimed was of his own making.

VII. Christ's reply to their accusation and his making good those claims which they imputed to him as blasphemous (v. 34, &c.), by two arguments:

1. By an argument taken from God's word. It is written (Ps. lxxxii. 6), I have said, You are gods. If they were gods, much more am I.

(1) How he explains the text (v. 35): He called them gods to whom the word of God came, and the scripture cannot be broken. We are sure that the scripture cannot be broken or found fault with. Every word of God is right.

(2) How he applies it. Say you of him whom the Father hath sanctified, Thou blasphemest? [1] The honour done him by the Father: He sanctified him, and sent him into the world. Our Lord Jesus was himself the Word, and had the Spirit without measure. He was sent into the world as Lord of all. The Father's sanctifying and sending him is here vouched as a sufficient warrant for his calling himself the Son of God. [2] The dishonour done him by the Jews, that he was a blasphemer, because he called himself the Son of God: "Say you of him so and so? Dare you say so? Have you brow and brass enough to tell the God of truth that he lies? What! say you of the Son of God that he is a blasphemer?" If devils, whom he came to condemn, had said so of him, it had not been so strange; but that men, whom he came to teach and save, should say so of him, be astonished, O heavens! at this.

2. By an argument taken from his own works. He here makes out his own claims, and proves that he and the Father are one (v. 37, 38): If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not.

(1) From what he argues—from his works. As he proved himself sent of God by the divinity of his works, so we must prove ourselves allied to Christ by the Christianity of ours. [1] The argument is very cogent; for the works he did were the works of his Father, which the Father only could do, and which could not be done in the ordinary course of nature. The miracles which the apostles wrought in his name corroborated this argument, and continued the evidence of it when he was gone. [2] It is proposed as fairly as can be desired, and put to a short issue. If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. He does not demand an assent to his divine mission further than he gave proof of it. Christ is no hard master, who expects to reap in assents where he has not sown in arguments. "But if I do the works of my Father, though you believe not me, yet believe the works; believe your own eyes, your own reason." The invisible things of the Redeemer were seen by his miracles, and by all his works both of power and mercy; so that those who were not convinced by these works were without excuse.

(2) For what he argues—that you may know and believe that the Father is in me and I in him; which is the same with what he had said (v. 30): I and my Father are one. This we must know; not know and explain, but know and believe it; acknowledging and adoring the depth, when we cannot find the bottom.

Verses 39–42

We have here the issue of the conference with the Jews. Here we are told,

I. How they attacked him by force. Therefore they sought again to take him, v. 39. Because he persevered in the same testimony concerning himself, they persisted in their malice against him. They express the same resentment, and justify their attempt to stone him by another attempt to take him.

II. How he avoided them by flight. He escaped out of their hands, not by the interposal of any friend that helped him, but by his own wisdom he got clear of them. And he who knew how to deliver himself no doubt knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to make a way for them to escape.

III. How he disposed of himself in his retirement: He went away again beyond Jordan, v. 40.

1. What shelter he found there. He went into a private part of the country, and there he abode; there he found some rest and quietness, when in Jerusalem he could find none. Christ and his gospel have often found better entertainment among the plain country-people than among the wise, the mighty, the noble, 1 Cor. i. 26, 27.

2. What success he found there. He chose to go thither, where John at first baptized (ch. i. 28), because there could not but remain some impressions of John's ministry and baptism thereabouts, which would dispose them to receive Christ. The event in some measure answered expectation; for we are told,

(1) That they flocked after him (v. 41): Many resorted to him. The return of the means of grace to a place, commonly occasions a great stirring of affections.

(2) That they reasoned in his favour as much as those at Jerusalem sought objections against him. They said, John did no miracle, but all things that John spoke of this man were true. Two things they considered: That Christ far exceeded John Baptist's power, for John did no miracle, but Jesus does many; whence it is easy to infer that Jesus is greater than John. How great then is this Jesus! Christ is best known and acknowledged by such a comparison with others as sets him superlatively above others. That Christ exactly answered John Baptist's testimony. All things that John said of this man were true. Great things John had said of him, which raised their expectations. They acknowledged him as great as John had said he would be. When we get acquainted with Christ, and come to know him experimentally, we find that the reality exceeds the report, 1 Kings x. 6, 7. John Baptist was now dead and gone, and yet his hearers profited by what they had heard formerly. They were confirmed in their belief that John was a prophet, who foretold such things. They were prepared to believe that Jesus was the Christ. The success and efficacy of the words preached are not confined to the life of the preacher, nor do they expire with his breath.

(3) That many believed on him there. They gave up themselves to him as his disciples, v. 42. They were many. It was where John had had great success; there many believed on the Lord Jesus. Where the preaching of the doctrine of repentance has had success, there the preaching of the doctrine of reconciliation is most likely to be prosperous. Where John had been acceptable, Jesus will not be unacceptable.

CHAP. XI

The raising of Lazarus to life, which is recorded only by this evangelist; for the other three confine themselves to what Christ did in Galilee, and scarcely ever carried their history into Jerusalem till the passion-week: whereas John's memoirs relate chiefly to what passed at Jerusalem. It is more largely recorded than any other of Christ's miracles because it was an earnest of that which was to be the crowning proof of all—Christ's own resurrection. I. The tidings sent to our Lord Jesus of the sickness of Lazarus, ver. 1–16. II. The visit he made to Lazarus's relations when he had heard of his death, ver. 17–32. III. The miracle, ver. 33–44. IV. The effect wrought by this miracle upon others, ver. 45–57.

Verses 1-16

I. A particular account of the parties principally concerned in this story, v. 1, 2. They lived at Bethany, a village not far from Jerusalem, where Christ usually lodged when he came up to the feasts. It is here called the town of Mary and Martha. Here was a brother named Lazarus. Here were two sisters, Martha and Mary, who seem to have been the housekeepers. Here was a decent, happy, well-ordered family, and a family that Christ was very much conversant with. One of the sisters is particularly described to be that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, v. 2. It refers to that anointing of Christ which this evangelist relates (ch. xii. 3). This was she whose brother Lazarus was sick; and the sickness of those we love is our affliction. The more friends we have the more frequently we are thus afflicted by sympathy. The multiplying of our comforts is but the multiplying of our cares and crosses.

II. The tidings that were sent to our Lord Jesus of the sickness of Lazarus, v. 3. His sisters knew where Jesus was, and they sent a special messenger to him, in which they manifest, 1. The affection and concern they had for their brother. They showed their love to him now that he was sick, for a brother is born for adversity, and so is a sister too. 2. The regard they had to the Lord Jesus, whom they were willing to make acquainted with all their concerns. The message they sent was very short, barely relating the case with the tender insinuation of a powerful plea, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick. They do not say, Lord, behold, he who loveth thee, but he whom thou lovest. Our love to him is not worth speaking of, but his to us can never be enough spoken of. It is no new thing for those whom Christ loves to be sick: all things come alike to all. It is a great comfort to us, when we are sick, to have those about us that will pray for us. We have reason to love and pray for those whom we have reason to think Christ loves and cares for.

III. An account how Christ entertained the tidings brought him.

1. He prognosticated the event and issue of the sickness. Two things he prognosticates:

(1) This sickness is not unto death. It was mortal, proved fatal, and no doubt but Lazarus was truly dead for four days. It came not, as in a common case, to be a summons to the grave. That was not the final effect of this sickness. He died, and yet it might be said he did not die. Death is an everlasting farewell to this world; and in this sense it was not unto death. The sickness of good people, how threatening soever, is not unto death. The body's death to this world is the soul's birth into another world.

(2) But it is for the glory of God. The afflictions of the saints are designed for the glory of God. The sweetest mercies are those which are occasioned by trouble. Let this reconcile us to the darkest dispensations of Providence, they are all for the glory of God; and, if God be glorified, we ought to be satisfied. It was that the Son of God might be glorified thereby, as it gave him occasion to work that glorious miracle, the raising of him from the dead. Let this comfort those whom Christ loves under all their grievances that the design of them all is that the Son of God may be glorified thereby.

2. He deferred visiting his patient, v. 5, 6. They had pleaded, Lord, it is he whom thou lovest, and the plea is allowed (v. 5): Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus. Now one would think it should follow, When he heard therefore that he was sick he made all the haste that he could to him. But he took the contrary way to show his love. Instead of coming post to him, he abode two days still in the same place where he was. (1) He loved them and therefore he deferred coming to them, that he might try them, that their trial might at last be found to praise and honour. (2) He loved them, that is, he designed to do something great and extraordinary for them. Therefore he delayed coming to them, that Lazarus might be dead and buried before he came. Deferring his relief so long, he had an opportunity of doing more for him than for any. God hath gracious intentions even in seeming delays. Christ's friends at Bethany were not out of his thoughts, though he made no haste to them.

IV. The discourse he had with his disciples, v. 7 16. Two things he discourses about—his own danger and Lazarus's death.

1. His own danger in going into Judæa, v. 7–10.

(1) He saith (v. 7): "Let us go into Judæa again." Now this may be considered, [1] As a purpose of his kindness to his friends at Bethany. When he knew they were brought to the last extremity, "Now," saith he, "let us go to Judæa." Christ will arise in favour of his people when the time to favour them, yea, the set time, is come; and the worst time is commonly the set time. In the depths of affliction, let this therefore keep us out of the depths of despair, that man's extremity is God's opportunity. [2] As a trial of the courage of the disciples, whether they would venture to follow him thither. To go to Judæa, which was so lately made too hot for them, was a saying that proved them. Let us go. Christ never brings his people into any peril but he accompanies them in it.

(2) Their objection against this journey (v. 8): Master, the Jews of late sought to stone thee, and goest thou thither again? They remind him of the danger he had been in there not long since. Christ's disciples are apt to make a greater matter of sufferings than their Master does. The remembrance of the fright was fresh in their minds. They marvel that he will go thither again. "Wilt thou favour those with thy presence that have expelled thee out of their coasts? Goest thou thither again, where thou hast been so ill used?" Had Christ been inclined to shift off suffering, he did not want friends to persuade him to it. They discover at the same time a distrust of his power, as if he could not secure both himself and them now in Judæa as well as he had done formerly; a secret fear of suffering themselves, for they count upon this if he suffer.

(3) Christ's answer to this objection (v. 9, 10): Are there not twelve hours in the day? Divine Providence has given us daylight to work by. Man's life is a day; this day is divided into divers ages, states, and opportunities, as into hours; the consideration of this should make us not only very busy, as to the work of life, but also very easy as to the perils of life; our day shall be lengthened out till our work be done. He shows the comfort and satisfaction which a man has while he keeps in the way of his duty: If any man walk in the day, he stumbles not. He does not hesitate in his own mind, but, walking uprightly, walks surely. As he that walks in the day stumbles not, but goes on steadily and cheerfully in his way, because he sees the light of this world, and by it sees his way before him; so a good man, relies upon the word of God as his rule, and regards the glory of God as his end, because he sees those two great lights. He is furnished with a faithful guide in all his doubts, and a powerful guard in all his dangers. Christ, wherever he went, walked in the day, and so shall we, if we follow his steps. He shows the pain and peril a man is in who walks not according to this rule (v. 10): If a man walk in the night, he stumbles. If a man walk in the way of his heart, and according to the course of this world—he falls into temptations and snares. He stumbles, because there is no light in him, for light in us is that to our moral actions which light about us is to our natural actions.

2. The death of Lazarus v. 11–16.

(1) The notice Christ gave his disciples of the death of Lazarus, v. 11. He then gives them plain intelligence of the death of Lazarus: Our friend Lazarus sleepeth. See here how Christ calls a believer and a believer's death. He calls a believer his friend: Our friend Lazarus. Those whom Christ is pleased to own as his friends all his disciples should take for theirs. Christ speaks of Lazarus as their common friend: Our friend. Death itself does not break the bond of friendship between Christ and a believer. Lazarus is dead, and yet he is still our friend. He calls the death of a believer a sleep: he sleepeth. It is good to call death by such names and titles as will help to make it more familiar and less formidable to us. Why should not the believing hope of that resurrection to eternal life make it as easy to us to put off the body and die as it is to put off our clothes and go to sleep? A good Christian, when he dies, does but sleep: he rests from the labours of the day past, and is refreshing himself for the next morning. To the godly it is a bed, and all its bands as the soft and downy fetters of an easy quiet sleep. It is but putting off our clothes to be mended and trimmed up for the marriage day. Particular intimations of his favourable intentions concerning Lazarus: but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep. Christ had no sooner said, Our friend sleeps, but presently he adds, I go, that I may awake him. When Christ tells his people at any time how bad the case is he lets them know in the same breath how easily, how quickly, he can mend it. Christ's telling his disciples that this was his business to Judæa might help to take off their fear of going with him thither; and, besides, it was to do a kindness to a family to which they were all obliged.

(2) Their mistake, and the blunder they made about it (v. 12, 13): They said, Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. This intimates, [1] Some concern they had for their friend Lazarus; they hoped he would recover. Now that they heard he slept they concluded the worst was past. Sleep is often nature's physic. This is true of the sleep of death: if a good Christian so sleep, he shall do well. [2] A greater concern for themselves. It was now needless for Christ to go to him, and expose himself and them. Thus we are willing to hope that the good work which we are called to do will do itself if there be peril in the doing of it.

(3) This mistake of theirs rectified (v. 13): Jesus spoke of his death. How dull of understanding Christ's disciples as yet were. Frequently death is called a sleep in the Old Testament. They should have understood Christ when he spoke scripture language. What Christ undertakes to do, we may be sure, is something great and uncommon, and a work worthy of himself. How carefully the evangelist corrects this error: Jesus spoke of his death.

(4) The plain and express declaration which Jesus made to them of the death of Lazarus, and his resolution to go to Bethany, v. 14, 15. He gives them notice of the death of Lazarus; what he had before said darkly he now says plainly: Lazarus is dead, v. 14. He gives them the reason why he had delayed so long: I am glad for your sakes that I was not there. Now that he went and raised him from the dead, as there were many brought to believe on him who before did not (v. 45), so there was much done towards the perfecting of what was lacking in the faith of those that did, which Christ aimed at: To the intent that you may believe. He resolves now to go to Bethany, and take his disciples along with him: Let us go unto him. Death cannot separate us from the love of Christ, nor put us out of the reach of his calls. Perhaps those who said, If he sleep there is no need to go, were ready to say, If he be dead it is to no purpose to go.

(5) Thomas exciting his fellow-disciples cheerfully to attend their Master's motions (v. 16): Thomas, who is called Didymus. Thomas in Hebrew and Didymus in Greek signify a twin. Probably Thomas was a twin. He said to his fellow-disciples very courageously, Let us also go that we may die with him; with him, that is,

[1] With Lazarus, who was now dead; so some take it. Perhaps Thomas had a particular intimacy with him. "If we survive, we know not how to live without him." Thus we are sometimes ready to think our lives bound up in the lives of some that were dear to us: but God will teach us to live, and to live comfortably, upon himself, when those are gone without whom we thought we could not live. "If we die, we hope to be happy with him." Such a firm belief he has of a happiness on the other side death that he is willing they should all go and die with him. The more of our friends are translated hence, the fewer cords we have to bind us to this earth, and the more to draw our hearts heavenwards.

[2] "Let us go and die with our Master," and so I rather think it is meant. "If he will go into danger, let us also go, according to the command we received, Follow me." Thomas knew so much of the malice of the Jews against Christ that it was no foreign supposition that he was now going to die. Thomas manifests a gracious readiness to die with Christ himself, flowing from strong affections to him. A zealous desire to help his fellow-disciples into the same frame: "Let us go and die with him; who would desire to survive such a Master?" Thus, in difficult times, Christians should animate one another.

Verses 17–32

The matter being determined, that Christ will go to Judæa, and his disciples with him, they address themselves to their journey.

At length, he comes near to Bethany, which is said to be about fifteen furlongs from Jerusalem, v. 18. Notice is taken of this, that this miracle was in effect wrought in Jerusalem.

I. What posture he found his friends there in. When we part from our friends we know not what changes may affect us or them before we meet again.

1. He found his friend Lazarus in the grave, v. 17. Lazarus had been four days buried. Promised salvations, though they always come surely, yet often come slowly.

2. He found his friends that survived in grief. Many of the Jews came to Martha and Mary to comfort them. Ordinarily, where death is there are mourners. Here was Martha's house, a house where the fear of God was, and on which his blessing rested, yet made a house of mourning. Grace will keep sorrow from the heart (ch. xiv. 1), not from the house. Where there are mourners there ought to be comforters. It is a duty we owe to those that are in sorrow to mourn with them, and to comfort them. They comforted them concerning their brother, that is, by speaking to them of him, not only of the good name he left behind, but of the happy state he was gone to. We have reason to be comforted concerning those who are gone before us to a happiness where they have no need of us. This visit which the Jews made to Martha and Mary is an evidence that they were persons of distinction. There was also a providence in it, that so many Jews should come together, just at this time, that they might be unexceptionable witnesses of the miracle.

II. What passed between him and his surviving friends. His departures endear his returns, and his absence teaches us how to value his presence.

1. The interview between Christ and Martha.

(1) We are told that she went and met him, v. 20. It should seem that Martha was earnestly expecting Christ's arrival, and enquiring for it. However it was, she heard of his coming before he arrived. Martha, when the good news was brought that Jesus was coming, threw all aside, and went and met him. When Martha went to meet Jesus, Mary sat still in the house. Some think she did not hear the tidings, while Martha, who was busied in the household-affairs, had early notice of it. Others think she did hear that Christ was come, but was so overwhelmed with sorrow that she did not care to stir. Comparing this story with that in Luke x. 38, &c., we may observe the different tempers of these two sisters. Martha's natural temper was active and busy; she loved to be here and there, and at the end of everything; and this had been a snare to her when by it she was not only careful and cumbered about many things, but hindered from the exercises of devotion: but now in a day of affliction this active temper did her a kindness, kept the grief from her heart, and made her forward to meet Christ, and so she received comfort from him the sooner. On the other hand, Mary's natural temper was contemplative and reserved. This had been formerly an advantage to her, when it was placed at her Christ's feet, to hear his word, and enabled her there to attend upon him without those distractions with which Martha was cumbered; but now in the day of affliction that same temper proved a snare to her, made her less able to grapple with her grief, and disposed her to melancholy. See here how much it will be our wisdom carefully to watch against the temptations, and improve the advantages, of our natural temper.

(2) Here is fully related the discourse between Christ and Martha.

[1] Martha's address to Christ, v. 21, 22.

First, She complains of Christ's long absence and delay. Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Here is, 1. Some evidence of faith. She believed Christ's power, that he could have prevented his death. She believed his pity, that if he had but seen Lazarus in his extreme illness, he would have had compassion. 2. Here are sad instances of unbelief. Her faith was true, but weak as a bruised reed, for she limits the power of Christ, in saying, If thou hadst been here; whereas she ought to have known that Christ could cure at a distance. She reflects likewise upon the wisdom and kindness of Christ, that he did not hasten to them when they sent for him, and now might as well have stayed away.

Secondly, Yet she corrects and comforts herself. At least, she blames herself for blaming her Master, and for suggesting that he comes too late: for I know that even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it to thee. 1. How willing her hope was. She humbly recommends the case to the wise and compassionate consideration of the Lord Jesus. When we know not what in particular to ask or expect, let us in general refer ourselves to God. 2. How weak her faith was. She should have said, "Lord, thou canst do whatsoever thou wilt"; but she only says, "Thou canst obtain whatsoever thou prayest for." His power is always predominant, his intercession always prevalent.

[2] The comfortable word which Christ gave to Martha (v. 23): Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again. Martha, in her complaint, looked back. We are apt, in such cases, to add to our own trouble, by fancying what might have been. Christ directs Martha, and us in her, to look forward, and to think what shall be. Thy brother shall rise again. This was true of Lazarus in a sense peculiar to him: he was now presently to be raised. It is applicable to all the saints. Think you hear Christ saying, "Thy parent, thy child, thy yoke-fellow, shall rise again."

[3] The faith which Martha mixed with this word, and the unbelief mixed with this faith, v. 24. She accounts it a faithful saying that he shall rise again at the last day. Yet she seems to think this saying not so well worthy of all acceptation as really it was. I know that he shall rise again at the last day; and is not this enough? She seems to think it is not. Thus, by our discontent under present crosses, we greatly undervalue our future hopes.

[4] The further instruction and encouragement which Jesus Christ gave her. He said to her, I am the resurrection and the life, v. 25, 26. Two things Christ possesses her with the belief of.

First, The power of Christ, his sovereign power: I am the resurrection and the life. Martha believed that at his prayer God would give any thing, but he would have her know that by his word he could work anything. It is an unspeakable comfort to all good Christians that Jesus Christ is the resurrection and the life, and will be so to them. Resurrection is a return to life; Christ is the author of that return, and of that life to which it is a return.

Secondly, The promises of the new covenant. To whom these promises are made—to those that believe in Jesus Christ. The condition of the latter promise is thus expressed: Whosoever liveth and believeth in me, which may be understood, either, of natural life: Whosoever lives in this world, whether he be Jew or Gentile, if he believes in Christ, he shall live by him. Or, of spiritual life. He that lives and believes is he that by faith is born again to a heavenly and divine life. What the promises are (v. 25): Though he die, yet shall he live, nay, he shall never die, v. 26.

a. For the body; here is the promise of a blessed resurrection. Though the body be dead because of sin yet it shall live again. The body shall be raised a glorious body.

b. For the soul; here is the promise of a blessed immortality. He that liveth and believeth shall never die. That spiritual life shall never be extinguished, but perfected in eternal life. The mortality of the body shall at length be swallowed up of life; but the life of the soul shall be immediately at death swallowed up of immortality. Christ asks her, "Believest thou this? Canst thou take my word for it?" Martha was doting upon her brother's being raised to life in this world; before Christ gave her hopes of this, he directed her thoughts to another life, another world. The crosses and comforts of this present time would not make such an impression upon us as they do if we did but believe the things of eternity as we ought.

[5] Martha's unfeigned assent yielded to what Christ said, v. 27. We have here Martha's creed, the good confession she witnessed. And it is the conclusion of the whole matter.

First, Here is the guide of her faith, and that is the word of Christ. She takes it entire as Christ had said it: Yea, Lord. Faith is an echo to divine revelation, returns the same words.

Secondly, The ground of her faith, and that is the authority of Christ. She has recourse to the foundation, for the support of the superstructure. "I have believed that thou art Christ, and therefore I do believe this." What she believed and confessed concerning Jesus. That he was the Christ; that he was the Son of God; that it was he who should come. That blessing of blessings she embraced as present. What she inferred hence. If she admits this, that Jesus is the Christ, there is no difficulty in believing that he is the resurrection and the life. He is the fountain of light and truth, and we may take all his sayings for faithful and divine. He is the fountain of life and blessedness, and we may therefore depend upon his ability.

2. The interview between Christ and Mary.

(1) The notice which Martha gave her of Christ's coming (v. 28): When she had so said, she went her way, and called Mary her sister. Time was when Martha would have drawn Mary from Christ, to come and help her in much serving (Luke x. 40). Here she is industrious to draw her to Christ. She called her secretly. She called her by order from Christ: The Master is come, and calleth for thee. She triumphs in his arrival: The Master is come. He whom we have long wished and waited for, he is come, he is come; this was the best cordial in the present distress. She invites her sister to go and meet him: "He calls for thee." When Christ our Master comes, he calls for us. He calls for thee in particular, for thee by name. If he calls thee, he will cure thee, he will comfort thee.

(2) The haste with which Mary made to Christ (v. 29): As soon as she heard that the Master was come, she arose quickly, and came to him. She little thought how near he was to her, for he is often nearer to them that mourn in Zion than they are aware of. The least intimation of Christ's gracious approaches is enough to a lively faith, which stands ready to take the hint, and answer the first call. She did not consult her neighbours, the Jews that were with her, comforting her; she left them all, to come to him.

(3) We are told (v. 30) where she found the Master; in that place where Martha met him. Christ's love to his work. He stayed near the place where the grave was, that he might be ready to go to it. Mary's love to Christ; still she loved much. Though Christ had seemed unkind in his delays, yet she could take nothing amiss from him.

(4) The misconstruction which the Jews made of her going away so hastily (v. 31): They said, She goes to the grave, to weep there. Martha bore up better under this affliction than Mary did, who was a woman of tender and sorrowful spirit; such was her natural temper. These comforters therefore concluded when she went out, it was to go to the grave and weep there. [1] What often is the folly and fault of mourners; they contrive how to aggravate their own grief, and to make bad worse. We are apt to fasten upon those things that aggravate the affliction, when it is our duty to reconcile ourselves to the will of God in it. [2] What is the wisdom and duty of comforters; and that is, to prevent as much as may be, the revival of the sorrow, and to divert it. Those Jews that followed Mary were thereby led to Christ, and became the witnesses of one of his most glorious miracles. It is good cleaving to Christ's friends in their sorrows, for thereby we may come to know him better.

(5) Mary's address to our Lord Jesus (v. 32): She came and fell down at his feet and said with many tears (as appears v. 33), Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died, as Martha said before. She fell down at his feet, which was more than Martha did, who had a greater command of her passions. This Mary had sat at Christ's feet to hear his word (Luke x. 39), and here we find her there on another errand. Those that in a day of peace place themselves at Christ's feet, to receive instructions from him, may with comfort and confidence in a day of trouble cast themselves at his feet with hope to find favour with him. Mary hereby made profession of the Christian faith as truly as Martha did, and in effect said, I believe that thou art the Christ. This she did in presence of the Jews that attended her, who, though friends to her and her family, yet were bitter enemies to Christ. Let them resent it as they pleased, she falls at his feet. Her address is very pathetic: Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Christ's delay was designed for the best, and proved so; yet both the sisters very indecently cast the same in his teeth, and in effect charge him with the death of their brother. Mary added no more, as Martha did. She said less than Martha, but wept more; and tears of devout affection have a voice, in the ears of Christ; no rhetoric like this.

I. Christ's tender sympathy with his afflicted friends, which appeared three ways:—

1. By the inward groans and troubles of his spirit (v. 33): Jesus saw Mary weeping and the Jews that came with her weeping; he groaned in the spirit, and was troubled. The griefs of the sons of men represented in the tears of Mary and her friends. What an emblem was here of this world, this vale of tears! Religion teaches us likewise to weep with them that weep, as these Jews wept with Mary. Those that truly love their friends will share with them in their joys and griefs; for what is friendship but a communication of affections? The grace of the Son of God and his compassion towards those that are in misery. In all their afflictions he is afflicted, Isa. lxiii. 9. When Christ saw them all in tears, He groaned in the spirit. This was an expression of his feeling sense of the calamitous state of human life, and the power of death. Having now to make a vigorous attack upon death and the grave, he thus stirred up himself to the encounter. It was an expression of his kind sympathy with his friends that were in sorrow. Christ not only seemed concerned, but he groaned in the spirit; he was inwardly and sincerely affected with the case. Christ's was a deep and a hearty sigh. He was troubled. He troubled himself; so the phrase is, very significantly. He was never troubled, but when he troubled himself, as he saw cause. He often composed himself to trouble, but was never discomposed or disordered by it.

2. His concern for them appeared by his kind enquiry, (v. 34): Where have you laid him? He would thus divert the grief of his mourning friends, by raising their expectations of something great.

3. It appeared by his tears. Those about him desired him to come and see.

(1) As he was going to the grave, Jesus wept, v. 35. A very short verse, but it affords many useful instructions. Jesus Christ was really and truly man, susceptible of the impressions of joy, and grief. Christ gave this proof of his humanity, in both senses of the word; that, as a man, he could weep, and, as a merciful man, he would weep, before he gave this proof of his divinity. He was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief, as was foretold, Isa. liii. 3. We never read that he laughed, but more than once we have him in tears. Tears of compassion well become Christians, and make them most to resemble Christ.

(2) Different constructions were put upon Christ's weeping. Some made a kind and candid interpretation of it (v. 36): Then said the Jews, Behold how he loved him! They seem to wonder that he should have so strong an affection for one to whom he was not related. It becomes us, according to this example of Christ, to show our love to our friends, both living and dying. Though our tears profit not the dead.

they embalm their memory. When he only dropped a tear over Lazarus, they said, See how he loved him! Much more reason have we to say so, for whom he hath laid down his life: See how he loved us! Others make a peevish unfair reflection upon it (v. 37): Could not this man, who opened the eyes of the blind, have prevented the death of Lazarus? If he could have prevented it he would, and therefore because he did not they incline to think that he could not. Therefore it might justly be questioned whether he did indeed open the eyes of the blind. His not working this miracle they thought enough to invalidate the former. Christ soon convinced these whisperers, by raising Lazarus from the dead, which was the greater work, that he could have prevented his death.

II. Christ's approach to the grave.

1. Christ repeats his groans (v. 38): Again groaning in himself, he comes to the grave; he groaned, (1) Being displeased at the unbelief of those who spoke doubtingly of his power, and blamed him for not preventing the death of Lazarus. He never groaned so much for his own pains and sufferings as for the sins and follies of men. (2) Being affected with the fresh lamentations which, it is likely, the mourning sisters made, when they came near the grave, his tender spirit was sensibly touched with their wailings. Ministers, when they are sent by the preaching of the gospel to raise dead souls, should be much affected with the deplorable condition of those they preach to and pray for, and groan in themselves to think of it.

2. The grave wherein Lazarus lay is here described: It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it; and such was the sepulchre in which Christ was buried. They reckoned the solemnity of the funeral ended when the stone was rolled to the grave, or, as here, laid upon it.

3. Orders are given to remove the stone (v. 39): Take away the stone. He would have this stone removed, that all the standers-by might see the body lie dead in the sepulchre, and that way might be made for its coming out, and it might appear to be a true body, and not a ghost or spectre. It is a good step towards the raising of a soul to spiritual life when prejudices are removed and got over and way made for the word to the heart.

4. An objection made by Martha against the opening of the grave: Lord, by this time he stinketh, for he has been dead four days. Probably Martha perceived the body to smell, as they were removing the stone, and therefore cried out thus.

(1) It is easy to observe hence the nature of human bodies: four days are but a little while, yet what a great change will this time make with the body of man. Christ rose the third day because he was not to see corruption.

(2) Some think she said it in a due tenderness to the dead body. She did not care that it should be thus publicly shown and made a spectacle of. Others think she said it out of a concern for Christ. If there were any thing noisome she would not have her Master near it; but he was none of those tender and delicate ones that cannot bear an ill smell; if he had, he would not have visited the world of mankind, which sin had made a perfect dunghill. It should seem, by Christ's answer, that it was the language of her unbelief and distrust: "Lord, it is too late now. It is impossible that this putrid carcase should live." She gives up his case as helpless and hopeless. This distrustful word of hers served to make the miracle both the more evident and the more illustrious. Her suggesting that it could not be done puts the more honour upon him that did it.

5. The gentle reproof Christ gave to Martha (v. 40): Said I not unto thee that if thou wouldest believe thou shouldest see the glory of God? Our Lord Jesus has given us all the assurances imaginable that a sincere faith shall at length be crowned with a blessed vision. If we will take Christ's word, and rely on his power and faithfulness, we shall see the glory of God, and be happy in the sight. We have need to be often reminded of these sure mercies with which our Lord Jesus hath encouraged us. We are apt to forget what Christ has spoken, and need him to put us in mind of it by his Spirit: "Said I not unto thee so and so? And dost thou think that he will ever unsay it?"

6. The opening of the grave, notwithstanding Martha's objection (v. 41): Then they took away the stone. If we will see the glory of God, we must let Christ take his own way. They took away the stone, and this was all they could do; Christ only could give life.

III. The miracle itself wrought.

1. He applies himself to his living Father in heaven. The gesture he used was very significant: He lifted up his eyes. What is prayer, but the ascent of the soul to God, and the directing of its affections and motions heavenward? He lifted up his eyes, looking beyond the grave where Lazarus lay, and overlooking all the difficulties that arose thence. His address to God was with great assurance: Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me. He has here taught us, by his own example, First, In prayer to call God Father. Secondly, In our prayers to praise him, and thankfully to acknowledge former favours. But our Saviour's thanksgiving here was intended to express the unshaken assurance he had of the effecting of this miracle. He speaks of this as his own act (v. 11): I go, that I may awake him; yet he speaks of it as what he had obtained by prayer, for his Father heard him. Christ speaks of this miracle as an answer to prayer. He was pleased thus to honour prayer, making it the key wherewith even he unlocked the treasures of divine power and grace. Christ, being assured that his prayer was answered, professes:

(1) His thankful acceptance of this answer: I thank thee that thou hast heard me. He triumphs before the victory. We may by faith in the promise have a prospect of mercy before it be actually given in, and give God thanks for it. Mercies in answer to prayer ought in a special manner to be acknowledged with thankfulness. Besides the grant of the mercy itself, we are to value it as a great favour to have our poor prayers taken notice of. As God answers us with mercy, even before we call, so we should answer him with praise even before he grants.

(2) His cheerful assurance of a ready answer at any time (v. 42): And I know that thou hearest me always. "I gave thanks" (saith he) "for being heard in this, because I am sure to be heard in every thing." The Father heard him always, which may encourage us to depend upon his intercession, and put all our petitions into his hand, for we are sure that him the Father hears always. The confidence he had: I knew it. We cannot have such a particular assurance as he had; but this we know, that whatsoever we ask according to his will he heareth us, 1 John v. 14, 15. But why should Christ give this public intimation of his obtaining this miracle by prayer? It is because of the people who stand by, that they may believe that thou hast sent me; for prayer may preach. It was to obviate the objections of his enemies. It was blasphemously suggested by the Pharisees that he wrought his miracles by compact with the devil; now, to evidence the contrary, he openly made his address to God, using prayers, and not charms, with elevated eyes and voice professing his dependence on Heaven. It was to corroborate the faith of those that were well inclined to him: That they may believe that thou hast sent me. Christ proves his mission by raising to life one that was dead.

2. He now applies himself to his dead friend. He cried with a loud voice, Lazarus come forth.

(1) He could have raised Lazarus by a silent exertion of his power and will, but he did it by a call, a loud call.

[1] To be significant of the power then put forth for the raising of Lazarus. The soul of Lazarus, which was to be called back, was at a distance, not hovering about the grave, as the Jews fancied, but removed to Hades. It is natural to speak loud when we call to those at a distance. The body of Lazarus, which was to be called up, was asleep, and we usually speak loud when we would awake any out of sleep.

[2] To be typical of other works of wonder which the power of Christ was to effect. This loud call was a figure, First, Of the gospel call, by which dead souls were to be brought out of the grave of sin. Secondly, Of the sound of the archangel's trumpet at the last day, with which they that sleep in the dust shall be awakened when Christ shall descend with a shout.

(2) This loud call was but short, yet mighty through God. He calls him by name, Lazarus, as we call those by their names whom we would wake out of a fast sleep. He calls him out of the grave. He does not say unto him, Live; but he saith to him, Move, for when by the grace of Christ we live spiritually we must stir up ourselves to move; the grave of sin and this world is no place for those whom Christ has quickened, and therefore they must come forth. The event was according to the intention: He that was dead came forth, v. 44. Power went along with the word of Christ to reunite the soul and body of Lazarus, and then he came forth. The miracle is described, not by its invisible springs, to satisfy our curiosity, but by its visible effects, to confirm our faith. If any ask whether Lazarus, after he was raised, could give an account or description of his soul's removal out of the body or return to it, or what he saw in the other world, I suppose both these changes were so unaccountable to himself that it was not lawful nor possible to express it. Let us not covet to be wise above what is written, and this is all that is written concerning the resurrection of that Lazarus, that he that was dead came forth.

(3) This miracle was wrought, [1] Speedily. Nothing intervenes between the command, Come forth, and the effect, He came forth. [2] Perfectly. He was so thoroughly revived that he got up out of his grave as strongly as ever he got up out of his bed, and returned not only to life, but health. He was not raised to serve a present turn, but to live as other men. He came out of his grave, though he was fettered with his grave-clothes, with which he was bound hand and foot, and his face bound about with a napkin (for so the manner of the Jews was to bury); and he came forth in the same dress wherein he was buried, that it might appear that it was he himself and not another. The standers-by, in unbinding him, would handle him, and see him, that it was he himself, and so be witnesses of the miracle. How little we carry away with us, when we leave the world—only a winding-sheet and a coffin; there is no change of raiment in the grave, nothing but a single suit of grave-clothes. Lazarus being come forth, hampered and embarrassed with his grave-clothes, we may well imagine that those about the grave were exceedingly surprised and frightened at it. Christ, to make the thing familiar, sets them to work: "Loose him, slacken his grave-clothes, that they may serve for day-clothes till he comes to his house."

We have here an account of the consequences of this glorious miracle.

I. Some were invited by it, and induced to believe. Many of the Jews, when they saw the things that Jesus did, believed on him. They had often heard of his miracles, and yet evaded the conviction of them, by calling in question the matter of fact; but now that they had themselves seen this done their unbelief was conquered. These were some of those Jews that came to Mary, to comfort her. When we are doing good offices to others we put ourselves in the way of receiving favours from God.

II. Others were irritated by it, and hardened in their unbelief.

1. The informers were so (v. 46): Some of them went to the Pharisees and told them what things Jesus had done, with a spiteful design to excite those who needed no spur the more vigorously to prosecute him. A most obstinate infidelity, refusing to yield to the most powerful means of conviction. A most inveterate enmity. If they would not be satisfied that he was to be believed in as the Christ, yet one would think they should have been mollified, and persuaded not to persecute him.

2. The judges, the blind leaders, of the people were no less exasperated by the report made to them.

(1) A special council is called and held (v. 47): Then gathered the chief priests and Pharisees a council. This council was called, not only for joint advice, but for mutual irritation; that so they might exasperate and inflame one another with enmity and rage against Christ.

(2) The case is proposed, and shown to be weighty and of great consequence.

[1] The matter to be debated was what course they should take with this Jesus; they said, What do we? For this man doeth many miracles. They own the truth of Christ's miracles, and that he had wrought many of them; they are therefore witnesses against themselves, for they acknowledge his credentials and yet deny his commission. They consider what is to be done, and chide themselves that they have not done something sooner effectually to crush him. They do not take it at all into their consideration whether they shall not receive him and own him as the Messiah; but they take it for granted that he is an enemy, and as such is to be run down: "What do we? Shall we be always talking, and bring nothing to pass?"

[2] That which made this matter weighty was the peril they apprehended their church and nation to be in from the Romans (v. 48): "If we do not silence him, all men will believe on him; and, this being the setting up of a new king, the Romans will come and take away our place and nation." See what an opinion they have of their own power. They speak as if they thought Christ's progress depended upon their connivance; as if it were in their power to conquer him who had conquered death.

a. They take on them to prophecy that if he have liberty to go on, all men will believe on him. Thus do they now make his interest formidable, though, to serve another turn, these same men strove to make it contemptible, ch. vii. 48, Have any of the rulers believed on him? This was the thing they were afraid of, that men would believe on him.

b. They foretell that if the generality of the nation be drawn after him, the rage of the Romans will be drawn upon them. They will come and take away our place. Here appeared a cowardice. Had they kept their integrity, they needed not to have feared the Romans; but they speak like a dispirited people. When men lose their piety they lose their courage. It was false that there was any danger of the Romans' being irritated against their nation by the progress of Christ's gospel. He taught men to give tribute to Cæsar, and not to resist evil. The Roman governor, at his trial, could find no fault in him. Pretended fears are often the colour of malicious designs. The enemies of Christ and his gospel have often coloured their enmity with a seeming care for the public good and the common safety, and have branded his prophets and ministers as men that turn the world upside down.

Carnal policy commonly sets up reasons of state, in opposition to rules of justice. That calamity which we seek to escape by sin we take the most effectual course to bring upon our own heads.

(3) Caiaphas makes a malicious but mystical speech in the council.

[1] The malice of it appears evident at first view, v. 49, 50. He, being the high priest, took upon him to decide the matter. "You know nothing at all. It is soon determined, if you consider that received maxim, That it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people."

First, The counsellor was Caiaphas, who was high priest that same year.

Secondly, the drift of the advice was, in short, this, That some way or other must be found out to put Jesus to death. Caiaphas does not say, Let him be silenced, but die he must.

Thirdly, This is plausibly insinuated. He suggests his own sagacity. How scornfully does he say, "You know nothing, who are but common priests. Thus it is common for those in authority to impose their corrupt dictates by virtue of that; and, because they should be the wisest and best, to expect that everybody should believe they are so. He takes it for granted that the case is plain and past dispute. Reason and justice are often run down with a high hand. Truth is fallen in the streets, and, when it is down, down with it; and equity cannot enter, and, when it is out, out with it. He insists upon a maxim in politics, That the welfare of communities is to be preferred before that of particular persons. It is expedient for us that one man die for the people. Caiaphas craftily insinuates that the greatest and best man ought to think his life well spent, nay well lost, to save his country from ruin. The case ought to have been put thus: Was it expedient for them to bring upon themselves and upon their nation the guilt of blood, for the securing of their civil interests? Carnal policy, while it thinks to save all by sin, ruins all at last.

[2] The mystery that was in this counsel of Caiaphas does not appear at first view, but the evangelist leads us into it (v. 51, 52): This spoke he not of himself. In these words he prophesied, though he himself was not aware of it, that Jesus should die for that nation. Here is a precious comment upon a pernicious text. Charity teaches us to put the most favourable construction upon men's words and actions that they will bear; but piety teaches us to make a good improvement of them. If wicked men are God's hand to humble and reform us, why may they not be God's mouth to instruct and convince us? As the hearts of all men are in God's hand, so are their tongues.

(4) The evangelist explains and enlarges upon Caiaphas's words.

[1] He explains what he said. He did not speak it of himself. As it was an artifice to stir up the council against Christ, he spoke it of himself, but as it was an oracle, declaring it the purpose and design of God, he did not speak it of himself.

First, He prophesied, and those that prophesied did not, in their prophecying, speak of themselves. But is Caiaphas also among the prophets? He is so, this once. God can and often does make wicked men instruments to serve his own purposes, even contrary to their own intentions. Words of prophecy in the mouth are no infallible evidence of a principle of grace in the heart. Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? will be rejected as a frivolous plea.

Secondly, He prophesied, being high priest that year; not that his being high priest did at all dispose or qualify him to be a prophet. Being high priest, God was pleased to put this significant word into his mouth rather than into the mouth of any other, that it might be the more observed or the non-observance of it the more aggravated.

Thirdly, The matter of his prophecy was that Jesus should die for that nation. He meant by that nation those in it that obstinately adhered to Judaism, but God meant those in it that would receive the doctrine of Christ, and become followers of him. It is a great thing that is here prophesied: That Jesus should die, die for others, not only for their good, but in their stead. If the whole nation of the Jews had unanimously believed in Christ, and received his gospel, they had been not only saved eternally, but saved as a nation from their grievances.

[2] The evangelist enlarges upon this word of Caiaphas (v. 52), not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad.

First, The persons Christ died for: Not for the nation of the Jews only. He must die for the children of God that were scattered abroad. Some understand it of the children of God that were then in being, scattered abroad in the Gentile world, devout men of every nation that feared God and worshipped him. Christ died to incorporate these in one great society. Others take in with these all that belong to the election of grace, who are called the children of God. There are those that fear him throughout all generations; to all these he had an eye in the atonement he made. As he prayed, so he died, for all that should believe on him.

Secondly, The purpose and intention of his death: he died to gather in those who wandered, and to gather together in one those who were scattered. Christ's dying is, 1. The great attractive of our hearts; for this end he is lifted up, to draw men to him. His love in dying for us is the great lodestone of our love. 2. The great centre of our unity. He gathers them together in one. All the saints in all places and ages meet in Christ.

(5) The result of this debate (v. 53): From that day they took counsel together, to put him to death. They now understood one another's minds, and so each was fixed in his own, that Jesus must die. What before they had thought of severally now they jointly concurred in, and so strengthened the hands one of another in this wickedness. Evil men confirm and encourage themselves and one another in evil practices, by comparing notes; then the wickedness which before seemed impracticable appears not only possible, but easy to be effected. What before they wished done, but wanted a colour for, now they are furnished with a plausible pretence to justify themselves in.

(6) Christ hereupon absconded, v. 54. He walked no more openly among the Jews. He withdrew into an obscure part of the country, so obscure that the name of the town he retired to is scarcely met with anywhere else. He went to a country near the wilderness. He entered into a city called Ephraim. Thither his disciples went with him; neither would they leave him in solitude, nor would he leave them in danger. But why would Christ abscond now? It was not because he either feared the power of his enemies or distrusted his own power. He retired to put a mark of his displeasure upon Jerusalem and the people of the Jews. They rejected him and his gospel; justly therefore did he remove himself and his gospel from them. It was a sad presage of that thick darkness which was shortly to come upon Jerusalem, because she knew not the day of her visitation. It was to render the cruelty of his enemies the more inexcusable. He would try whether their anger would be turned away by his retirement into privacy. His hour was not yet come, and therefore he declined danger. His retirement, for awhile, was to make his return into Jerusalem the more remarkable and illustrious. This swelled the acclamations of joy with which his well-wishers welcomed him when he rode triumphantly into the city.

(7) The strict enquiry made for him during his recess, v. 55–57.

[1] The occasion of it was the approach of the passover, at which they expected his presence, according to custom (v. 55): The Jews' passover was nigh at hand, a festival which shone bright in their calendar. Now the passover being at hand, many went out of all parts of the country to Jerusalem, to purify themselves. This was either: A necessary purification of those who had contracted any ceremonial pollution. Or: A voluntary purification, by fasting and prayer, and other religious exercises, which many spent some time in before the passover.

[2] The enquiry was very solicitous: They said, What think you, that he will not come to the feast? v. 56. Some think this was said by those who wished well to him, and expected his coming. Those who came early out of the country, that they might purify themselves, were very desirous to meet with Christ, and perhaps came up the sooner with that expectation. They enquired what news of Christ? It should rather seem that they were his enemies who made this enquiry after him. When they should have been assisting those that came to purify themselves, according to the duty of their place, they were plotting against Christ. Their asking, What think you? Will he not come up to the feast? implies, a. An invidious reflection upon Christ, as if he would omit his attendance on the feast of the Lord for fear of exposing himself. It is sad to see holy ordinances prostituted to such unholy purposes. b. A fearful apprehension that they had of missing their game: "Will he not come up to the feast? If he do not, our measures are broken."

[3] The orders for the apprehending of him were very strict, v. 57. The great sanhedrim issued out a proclamation, strictly charging and requiring that if any person knew where he was they should show it, that he might be taken. See, First, How intent they were upon this prosecution. Secondly, How willing they were to involve others in the guilt with them. It is an aggravation of the sins of wicked rulers that they commonly make those that are under them instruments of their unrighteousness.

CHAP. XII

Let us see what honours were heaped on the head of the Lord Jesus, even in the depths of his humiliation. I. Mary did him honour, by anointing his feet at the supper in Bethany, ver. 1–11. II. The common people did him honour, with their acclamations of joy, when he rode in triumph into Jerusalem, ver. 12–19. III. The Greeks did him honour, by enquiring after him with a longing desire to see him, ver. 20–26. IV. God the Father did him honour, by a voice from heaven, ver. 27–36. V. He had honour done him by the Old Testament prophets, ver. 37–41. VI. He had honour done him by some of the chief rulers, though they had not courage to own it, ver. 42, 43. VII. He claimed honour to himself, by asserting his divine mission, ver. 44–50.

Verses 1–11

I. The kind visit our Lord Jesus paid to his friends at Bethany, v. 1. He came up out of the country, six days before the passover, and took up at Bethany. He lodged here with his friend Lazarus, whom he had lately raised from the dead. His coming to Bethany now may be considered.

1. As a preface to the passover he intended to celebrate, to which reference is made in assigning the date of his coming: Six days before the passover.

2. As a voluntary exposing of himself to the fury of his enemies; now that his hour was at hand he came within their reach. Our Lord Jesus was voluntary in his sufferings; his life was not forced from him, but resigned. As the strength of his persecutors could not overpower him, so their subtlety could not surprise him. As there is a time when we are allowed to shift for our own preservation, so there is a time when we are called to hazard our lives in the cause of God.

3. As an instance of his kindness to his friends at Bethany, whom he loved. This was a farewell visit. Bethany is here described to be the town where Lazarus was, whom he raised from the dead. The miracle wrought here put a new honour upon the place, and made it remarkable. Where he has sown plentifully, he observes whether it comes up again.

II. The kind entertainment which his friends there gave him: They made him a supper (v. 2). It is queried whether this was the same with that which is recorded, Matt. xxvi. 6, &c., in the house of Simon. Most commentators think it was. Let us see the account of this entertainment. They made him a supper; for with them, ordinarily, supper was the best meal. This they did in token of their respect and gratitude, for a feast is made for friendship; and that they might have an opportunity of free and pleasant conversation with him, for a feast is made for fellowship. Martha served. She did not think it below her to serve, when Christ sat at meat; nor should we think it a dishonour to stoop to any service whereby Christ may be honoured. Christ had formerly reproved Martha for being troubled with much serving. But she did not therefore leave off serving, as some, who, when they are reproved for one extreme, peevishly run into another; no, still she served. Better be a waiter at Christ's table than a guest at the table of a prince. Lazarus was one of those that sat at meat. It proved the truth of his resurrection, as it did of Christ's, that there were those who did eat and drink with him, Acts x. 41. He sat at meat, as a monument of the miracle Christ had wrought. Those whom Christ has raised up to a spiritual life are made to sit together with him.

III. The particular respect which Mary showed him, v. 3. She had a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and with this she anointed the feet of Jesus, and she wiped them with her hair, and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment. Doubtless she intended this as a token of her love to Christ. By this her love to Christ appears to have been a generous love. If she had anything more valuable than another, that must be brought out for the honour of Christ. Those who love Christ truly love him so much better than this world as to be willing to lay out the best they have for him. A condescending love; she not only bestowed her ointment upon Christ, but with her own hands poured it upon him. Nay, she did not, as usual, anoint his head with it, but his feet. True love, as it does not spare charges, so it does not spare pains, in honouring Christ. A believing love; there was faith working by this love, faith in Jesus as the Messiah, the Christ, the Anointed. God's Anointed should be our Anointed. Let us pour on him the ointment of our best affections. The filling of the house with the pleasant odour of the ointment. Those who entertain Christ in their hearts and houses bring a sweet odour into them.

IV. Judas's dislike of Mary's token of her respect to Christ, v. 4, 5.

1. The person that carped at it was Judas, one of his disciples; not one of their nature, but only one of their number. Judas was an apostle, a preacher of the gospel, and yet one that discouraged this instance of pious affection. It is sad to see the life of religion discountenanced by such as are bound by their office to assist and encourage it. But this was he that should betray Christ.

2. The pretence with which he covered his dislike (v. 5): "Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor?" Here is worldly wisdom passing a censure upon pious zeal. Those who value themselves upon their secular policy, and undervalue others for their serious piety, have more in them of the spirit of Judas than they would be thought to have. Here is charity to the poor secretly made a cloak for covetousness. Many excuse themselves from laying out in charity under pretence of laying up for charity. Judas asked, Why was it not given to the poor? We must not conclude that those do no acceptable piece of service who do not do it in our way. Proud men think all ill-advised who do not advise with them.

3. The detection and discovery of Judas's hypocrisy herein, v. 6. This he said, not that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief, and had the bag. It did not come from a principle of charity: Not that he cared for the poor. What were the poor to him any further than he might serve his own ends? Thus some warmly contend for the power of the church, as others for its purity, when perhaps it is all one to them whether its true interest sink or swim, but under the pretence of this they are advancing themselves. It did come from a principle of covetousness. The truth of the matter was, he would rather have had it in money, to be put in the common stock, and then he knew what to do with it.

(1) Judas was treasurer of Christ's household. See what estate Jesus and his disciples had to live upon. Only a bag, wherein they kept just enough for their subsistence, giving the overplus, if any were, to the poor. This bag was supplied by the contributions of good people, and the Master and his disciples had all in common; for our sakes he became poor. See who was the steward of the little they had; it was Judas, he was purse-bearer. He was the least and lowest of all the disciples; it was not Peter nor John that was made steward. Secular employments, as they are a digression, so they are a degradation to a minister of the gospel. He was desirous of the place. He loved in his heart to be fingering money, and therefore had the moneybag committed to him. The bag he chose, and the bag he had. Strong inclinations to sin within are often justly punished with strong temptations to sin without. We have little reason to be fond of the bag, or proud of it, for at the best we are but stewards of it.

(2) Being trusted with the bag, he was a thief. The reigning love of money is heart-theft as much as anger and revenge are heart-murder. Those to whom the management and disposal of public money is committed have need to be governed by steady principles of justice and honesty, that no blot cleave to their hands. Judas, who had betrayed his trust, soon after betrayed his Master.

V. Christ's justification of what Mary did (v. 7, 8): Let her alone. Hereby he intimated his acceptance of her kindness. As it was a token of her goodwill, he signified himself well-pleased with it. Christ would not have those censured nor discouraged who sincerely design to please him, though in their honest endeavours there be not all the discretion that may be. Christ puts a favourable construction upon what she did, which those that condemned it were not aware of: Against the day of my burying she has kept this. "The day of my burying is now at hand, and she has anointed a body that is already as good as dead." Providence does often so open a door of opportunity to good Christians, that the expressions of their pious zeal prove to be more seasonable, and more beautiful, than any foresight of their own could make them. He gives a sufficient answer to Judas's objection, v. 8. It is so ordered in the kingdom of Providence that the poor we have always with us. It is so ordered in the kingdom of grace that the church should not always have the bodily presence of Jesus Christ: "Me you have not always." Opportunities are to be improved, and those opportunities first and most vigorously which are likely to be of the shortest continuance. That good duty which may be done at any time ought to give way to that which cannot be done but just now.

VI. The public notice which was taken of our Lord Jesus here at this supper in Bethany (v. 9): Much people of the Jews knew that he was there, and they came flocking thither. They came to see Jesus, whose name was very much magnified by the late miracle he had wrought in raising Lazarus. They came, not to hear him, but to gratify their curiosity with a sight of him. It being known where Christ was, multitudes came to him. They came to see Lazarus and Christ together, which was a very inviting sight. Some came for the confirmation of their faith in Christ. Others came only for the gratifying of their curiosity, that they might say they had seen a man who had been dead and buried, and yet lived again; so that Lazarus served for a show.

VII. The indignation of the chief priests at the growing interest of our Lord Jesus (v. 10, 11): They consulted how they might put Lazarus also to death, because that by reason of him many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus. Here observe,

1. How vain and unsuccessful their attempts against Christ had hitherto been. They had done all they could to alienate the people from him, and yet many of the Jews were so overcome by the convincing evidence of Christ's miracles that they went away from the party of the priests, and believed on Jesus; and it was by reason of Lazarus; his resurrection put life into their faith. What was impossible to him that could raise the dead?

2. How absurd and unreasonable that Lazarus must be put to death. It was a sign that they neither feared God nor regarded man. If they had feared God, they would not have done such an act of defiance to him. God will have Lazarus to live by a miracle, and they will have him to die by malice. Lazarus is singled out to be the object of their special hatred, because God has distinguished him by the tokens of his peculiar love. One would think that they should rather have consulted how they might have joined in friendship with Lazarus and his family, and by their mediation have reconciled themselves to this Jesus whom they had persecuted. If they had regarded man, they would not have done such an act of injustice to Lazarus, an innocent man, to whose charge they could not pretend to lay any crime.

Verses 12–19

I. The respect that was paid to our Lord Jesus by the common people, v. 12, 13.

1. Who they were that paid him this respect: much people—a great crowd of those that came up to the feast; not the inhabitants of Jerusalem, but the country people. The nearer the temple of the Lord, the further from the Lord of the temple. They were such as came up to the feast. Perhaps they had been Christ's hearers in the country, and great admirers of him there, and therefore were forward to testify their respect to him at Jerusalem. Perhaps they were those more devout Jews that came up to the feast some time before, to purify themselves, that were more inclined to religion than their neighbours, and these were they that were so forward to honour Christ. They were not the rulers, nor the great men, that went out to meet Christ, but the commonalty. But Christ is honoured more by the multitude than by the magnificence of his followers; for he values men by their souls, not their names and titles of honour.

2. On what occasion they did it: They heard that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem. They had enquired for him (ch. xi. 55, 56): Will he not come up to the feast? Now when they heard he was coming, they bestirred themselves, to give him an agreeable reception.

3. In what way they expressed their respect. Such as they had they gave him; and even this despicable crowd was a faint resemblance of that glorious company which John saw before the throne, and before the Lamb, Rev. vii. 9, 10. Though these were not before the throne, they were before the Lamb. There it is said of that celestial choir,

(1) That they had palms in their hands, and so had these branches of palm-trees. The palm-tree has ever been an emblem of victory and triumph. Christ was now by his death to conquer principalities and powers. Though he was but girding on the harness, yet he could boast as though he had put it off.

(2) That they cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God (Rev. vii. 10); so did these here, they shouted before him, Hosanna, blessed is the king of Israel, that comes in the name of the Lord; and hosanna signifies salvation. [1] They acknowledge our Lord Jesus to be the king of Israel, that comes in the name of the Lord. They own him to be a king, which bespeaks both his dignity and honour, which we must adore; and his dominion and power, to which we must submit. A rightful king, coming in the name of the Lord. The promised and long-expected king, Messiah the prince, for he is king of Israel. [2] They heartily wish well to his kingdom, which is the meaning of hosanna. In crying hosanna they prayed for three things: That his kingdom might come in the light and knowledge of it, and in the power and efficacy of it. That it might conquer. That it might continue. Hosanna is, Let the king live for ever. [3] They bid him welcome in Jerusalem: "Welcome is he that cometh; come in thou blessed of the Lord." Thus we must every one of us bid Christ welcome into our hearts. Faith saith, Blessed is he that cometh.

II. The posture Christ puts himself into for receiving the respect that was paid him (v. 14): When he had found a young ass, he sat thereon. It was but a poor sort of figure he made, he alone upon an ass, and a crowd of people about him shouting Hosanna. This was much more of state than he used to take; he used to travel on foot, but now was mounted. Yet it was much less of state than the great ones of the world usually take. His kingdom was not of this world, and therefore came not with outward pomp.

III. The fulfilling of the scripture in this: As it is written, Fear not, daughter of Sion, v. 15.

1. It was foretold that Zion's king should come, should come thus, sitting on an ass's colt. Though he comes but slowly (an ass is slow-paced), yet he comes surely, and with such expressions of condescension as greatly encourage his loyal subjects. Humble supplicants may reach to speak with him.

2. The daughter of Zion is therefore called upon to behold her king. Fear not. In the prophecy, Zion is told to rejoice greatly, and to shout, but here it is rendered, Fear not. Unbelieving fears are enemies to spiritual joys; if they be cured, if they be conquered, joy will come of course. If the case be so that we cannot reach to the exultations of joy, yet we should labour to get from under the oppressions of fear. Rejoice greatly; at least, fear not.

IV. The remark respecting the disciples (v. 16): They understood not at first, but when Jesus was glorified they remembered that these things were written of him, and that they and others had done these things to him.

1. See here the imperfection of the disciples; they understood not these things at first. They did not consider that they were performing the ceremony of the inauguration of Zion's king. The scripture is often fulfilled by the agency of those who have not themselves an eye to the scripture in what they do. That which afterwards is clear was at first dark and doubtful. It well becomes the disciples of Christ to reflect upon the follies and weaknesses of their first beginning, that they may have compassion on the ignorant. When I was a child, I spoke as a child.

2. See here the improvement of the disciples in their adult state.

(1) When they understood it: When Jesus was glorified. Till then they did not rightly apprehend the nature of his kingdom. Till then the Spirit was not poured out, who was to lead them into all truth.

(2) How they understood it; they compared the prophecy with the event. Then remembered they that these things were written of him. The remembrance of what is written will enable us to understand what is done, and the observation of what is done will help us to understand what is written.

V. The reason which induced the people to pay this respect to our Lord Jesus. It was because of the illustrious miracle he had lately wrought in raising Lazarus.

1. See here what account and what assurance they had of this miracle; no doubt, the city rang of it. Those who considered it as a proof of Christ's mission, and a ground of their faith in him, traced the report to those who were eye-witnesses of it, that they might know the certainty of it. The people therefore that stood by when he called Lazarus out of his grave, bore record, v. 17. They unanimously averred the thing to be true, beyond dispute or contradiction. The truth of Christ's miracles was evidenced by incontestable proofs.

2. What influence it had upon them (v. 18): For this cause the people met him. Some, out of curiosity, were desirous to see one that had done such a wonderful work. Others, out of conscience, studied to do him honour, as the one sent of God.

VI. The indignation of the Pharisees at all this. They own that they had got no ground against him; that they prevailed nothing. Those who oppose Christ, will be made to perceive that they prevail nothing. God will accomplish his own purposes in spite of them, and the little efforts of their impotent malice. You prevail nothing, you profit nothing. There is nothing got by opposing Christ. They own that he had got ground: The world is gone after him. Yet here, like Caiaphas, ere they were aware, they prophesied that the world would go after him. 1. Thus they express their own vexation; their envy makes them fret. Considering how great these Pharisees were, one would think they needed not grudge Christ so inconsiderable a piece of honour as was now done him; but proud men would monopolize honour, and have none share with them. 2. Thus they excite themselves, and one another, to a more vigorous carrying on of the war against Christ. Thus the enemies of religion are made more resolute and active by being baffled; and shall its friends be disheartened with every disappointment, who know its cause is righteous and will at last be victorious?

Honour is here paid to Christ by certain Greeks that enquired for him.

I. We are told who they were that paid this honour to our Lord Jesus: Certain Greeks among the people who came up to worship at the feast, v. 20. Some think they were Jews of the dispersion, that were scattered among the Gentiles, and were called Greeks. Others think they were Gentiles, those whom they called proselytes of the gate, such as the eunuch and Cornelius. There were devout worshippers of the true God even among those that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel. Though these Greeks, if uncircumcised, were not admitted to eat the passover, yet they came to worship at the feast. We must thankfully use the privileges we have, though there may be others from which we are shut out.

II. What was the honour they paid him: they desired to be acquainted with him, v. 21. Having a desire to see Christ, they were industrious in the use of proper means. They did not rest in bare wishes, but resolved to try what could be done. They made their application to Philip, one of his disciples. Some think that they had acquaintance with him formerly.

It is good to know those who know the Lord. I think that they applied to him only because they saw him a close follower of Christ. Those that would see Jesus by faith now that he is in heaven must apply to his ministers, whom he has appointed for this purpose, to guide poor souls in their enquiries after him. The bringing of these Greeks to the knowledge of Christ by the means of Philip signified the agency of the apostles, and the use made of their ministry in the conversion of the Gentiles. Their address to Philip was in short this: Sir, we would see Jesus. They gave him a title of respect, because he was in relation to Christ. Their business is, they would see Jesus; not only see his face, that they might be able to say, when they came home, they had seen one that was so much talked of; but they would have some free conversation with him, and be taught by him. Now that they were come to worship at the feast, they would see Jesus. In our attendance upon holy ordinances, and particularly the gospel passover, the great desire of our souls should be to see Jesus. We miss of our end in coming if we do not see Jesus. The report which Philip made of this to his Master, v. 22. He tells Andrew. They agree that it must be made; but then he would have Andrew go along with him. Christ's ministers should be helpful to one another and concur in helping souls to Christ. It should seem that Andrew and Philip brought this message to Christ when he was teaching in public, for we read (v. 29) of the people that stood by.

III. Christ's acceptance of this honour. He foretells both the honour which he himself should have in being followed (v. 23, 24) and the honour which those should have that followed him, v. 25, 26.

1. He foresees that plentiful harvest, in the conversion of the Gentiles, of which this was as it were the first-fruits, v. 23. The hour is come when the Son of man shall be glorified. The end designed hereby, and that is the glorifying of the Redeemer: "And is it so? Do the Gentiles begin to enquire after me? Then the hour is come for the glorifying of the Son of man." This was no surprise to Christ, but a paradox to those about him. The calling of the Gentiles greatly redounded to the glory of the Son of man. The multiplying of the redeemed was the magnifying of the Redeemer. There was a time, a set time, for the glorifying of the Son of man, and he speaks of the approach of it with exultation and triumph: The hour is come. The strange way in which this end was to be attained, and that was by the death of Christ, intimated in that similitude (v. 24): "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone, and you never see any more of it; but if it die it bringeth forth much fruit." The necessity of Christ's humiliation intimated. He would never have been the living quickening head and root of the church if he had not descended from heaven to this accursed earth and ascended from earth to the accursed tree, and so accomplished our redemption. He must pour out his soul unto death. The advantage of Christ's humiliation illustrated. He fell to the ground in his incarnation; but this was not all: he died. He lay in the grave like seed under the clods; but as the seed comes up again green, and fresh, and flourishing, and with a great increase, so one dying Christ gathered to himself thousands of living Christians. The salvation of souls hitherto, and henceforward to the end of time, is all owing to the dying of this corn of wheat.

2. He promises an abundant recompence to those who should cordially embrace him, and should make it appear that they do so by their faithfulness.

(1) In suffering for him (v. 25): He that loves his life shall lose it; but he that hates his life in this world, shall keep it unto life eternal. The great design of his religion is to wean us from this world, by setting before us another world.

[1] See here the fatal consequences of an inordinate love of life; many a man hugs himself to death, and loses his life by overloving it. He that so loves his animal life shall thereby shorten his days, shall lose the life he is so fond of, and another infinitely better. He that is so much in love with the life of the body, as to deny Christ, he shall lose it, that is, lose a real happiness in the other world, while he thinks to secure an imaginary one in this. He that gives his soul, his God, his heaven, for it, buys life too dear.

[2] See also the blessed recompence of a holy contempt of life. He that so hates the life of the body as to venture it for the preserving of the life of his soul shall find both in eternal life. It is required of the disciples of Christ that they hate their life in this world. Our life in this world includes all the enjoyments of our present state. We must hate, that is, despise them as vain and insufficient to make us happy, and cheerfully part with them whenever they come in competition with the service of Christ. See here much of the power of godliness—that it conquers the strongest natural affections; and much of the mystery of godliness—that it is the greatest wisdom, and yet makes men hate their own lives. Those who, in love to Christ, hate their own lives in this world, shall be abundantly recompenced in the resurrection of the just. He that hateth his life shall keep it.

(2) In serving him (v. 26): If any man profess to serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there let my servant be; so some read it, as part of the duty. We read it as part of the promise, there shall he be in happiness with me. And, lest this should seem a small matter, he adds, If any man serve me, him will my Father honour. The Greeks desired to see Jesus (v. 21), but Christ lets them know that it was not enough to see him, they must serve him. In taking servants it is usual to fix both the work and the wages; Christ does both here.

[1] Here is the work which Christ expects from his servants. Let them attend their Master's movements: If any man serve me, let him follow me. Christians must follow Christ, do the things that he says, walk as he also walked. We must go whither he leads us, and in the way he leads us. Let them attend their Master's repose: Where I am, there let my servant be, to wait upon me. Christ is where his church is; and there let his servants be, to present themselves before him, and receive instructions from him.

[2] Here are the wages which Christ promises to his servants.

First, They shall be happy with him: Where I am, there shall also my servant be. Doubtless, he means being with him in paradise. Christ speaks of heaven's happiness as if he were already in it: Where I am; because he was sure of it, and near to it. And the same joy and glory which he thought recompence enough for all his services and sufferings are proposed to his servants as the recompence of theirs. Those that follow him in the way shall be with him in the end.

Secondly, They shall be honoured by his Father; he will make them amends for all their pains and loss, by conferring an honour upon them, far beyond what such worthless worms of the earth could expect to receive. The reward is honour, true lasting honour, the highest honour; it is the honour that comes from God. Those that wait on Christ God will put honour upon. Those that serve Christ must humble themselves, and are commonly vilified by the world, in recompence of both which they shall be exalted in due time.

What became of those Greeks we are not told, but are willing to hope that those who thus asked the way to heaven, with their faces thitherward, found it, and walked in it.

Verses 27–36

Honour is here done to Christ by his Father in a voice from heaven, which gave occasion to a further conference with the people.

I. Christ's address to his Father, upon occasion of the trouble which seized his spirit at this time: Now is my soul troubled, v. 27. A strange word to come from Christ's mouth, and at this time surprising, for it comes in the midst of divers pleasing prospects, in which, one would think, he should have said, Now is my soul pleased. Trouble of soul sometimes follows after great enlargements of spirit.

1. Christ's dread of his approaching sufferings: Now is my soul troubled. Now were the first throes of the travail of his soul. The sin of our soul was the trouble of Christ's soul. The trouble of his soul was designed to ease the trouble of our souls. Christ was now troubled, but it would not be so always, it would not be so long. The same is the comfort of Christians in their troubles; they are but for a moment, and will be turned into joy.

2. The strait he seems to be in hereupon: And what shall I say? Christ speaks like one at a loss, as if what he should choose he wot not. There was a struggle between the work he had taken upon him, which required sufferings, and the nature he had taken upon him, which dreaded them; between these two he here pauses with, What shall I say?

3. His prayer to God in this strait: Father, save me from this hour, out of this hour, praying, not so much that it might not come as that he might be brought through it. This was the language of innocent nature, and its feelings poured forth in prayer. Christ was voluntary in his sufferings, and yet prayed to be saved from them. Prayer against a trouble may very well consist with patience under it and submission to the will of God in it. The time of his suffering was, (1) A set time. (2) A short time. An hour is soon over, so were Christ's sufferings; he could see through them to the joy set before him.

4. His acquiescence in his Father's will, notwithstanding. But for this cause came I to this hour. Innocent nature got the first word, but divine wisdom and love got the last. Those who would proceed regularly must go upon second thoughts. With the second thought he checked himself: For this cause came I to this hour; he does not silence himself with this, that he could not avoid it, but satisfies himself with this, that he would not avoid it. This should reconcile us to the darkest hours of our lives.

5. His regard to his Father's honour herein. Father, glorify thy name, to the same purport with Father, thy will be done; for God's will is for his own glory. This expresses more than barely a submission to the will of God; it is a consecration of his sufferings to the glory of God. It was a mediatorial word, and was spoken by him as our surety, who had undertaken to satisfy divine justice for our sin. Our Lord Jesus interposed, undertook to satisfy God's injured honour, and he did it by his humiliation. Now here he makes a tender of this satisfaction as an equivalent: "Father, glorify thy name; let the debt be levied upon me." Thus he restored that which he took not away.

II. The Father's answer to this address. 1. How this answer was given. By a voice from heaven. 2. What the answer was. It was an express return to that petition, Father, glorify thy name: I have glorified it already, and I will glorify it yet again. (1) The name of God had been glorified in the life of Christ, in his doctrine and miracles, and all the examples he gave of holiness and goodness. (2) It should be further glorified in the death and sufferings of Christ. His wisdom and power, his justice and holiness, his truth and goodness, were greatly glorified. God accepted the satisfaction, and declared himself well pleased. What God has done for the glorifying of his own name is an encouragement to us to expect what he will yet further do.

III. The opinion of the standers-by concerning this voice, v. 29. Some of them said that it thundered; others said that certainly an angel spoke to him. Now this shows, 1. That it was a real thing. 2. That they were loth to admit so plain a proof of Christ's divine mission. They would rather say that it was this, or that, or any thing, than that God spoke to him in answer to his prayer.

IV. The account which our Saviour himself gives of this voice.

1. Why it was sent (v. 30): "It came not because of me, but for your sakes, that all you who heard it may believe that the Father hath sent me." What is said from heaven concerning our Lord Jesus, is said for our sakes, that we may be brought to rest upon him. "That you my disciples, who are to follow me in sufferings, may therein be comforted with the same comforts that carry me on."

2. What was the meaning of it. Two things God intended when he said that he would glorify his own name:—

(1) That by the death of Christ Satan should be conquered (v. 31): Now is the judgment. He speaks with a divine exultation and triumph. "Now the year of my redeemed is come: now, now, that great work is to be done which has been so long thought of in the divine counsels." The matter of the triumph is, [1] That now is the judgment of the world; take it as a medical term: "Now is the crisis of this world." The sick and diseased world is now upon the turning point; this is the critical day upon which the trembling scale will turn for life or death, to all mankind. Or, rather, it is a law term, "Now, judgment is entered." The death of Christ was the judgment of this world. First, It is a judgment of discovery and distinction. Now is the trial of this world, for men shall have their character according as the cross of Christ is to them. By this men are judged, what they think of the death of Christ. Secondly, It is a judgment of favour and absolution. Christ upon the cross interposed between a righteous God and a guilty world. It was as it were the judgment of this world, for an everlasting righteousness was thereby brought in, not for Jews only, but the whole world. Thirdly, It is a judgment of condemnation given against the powers of darkness; see ch. XVI. 11. Satan's dominion is declared to be a usurpation. The judgment of this world is, that it belongs to Christ, and not to Satan. That now is the prince of this world cast out. It is the devil that is here called the prince of this world, because he rules over the men of the world by the things of the world. He is said to be cast out, to be now cast out. Christ reconciling the world to God by the merit of his death, broke the power of death, and cast out Satan as a destroyer; Christ, reducing the world to God by the doctrine of his cross, broke the power of sin, and cast out Satan as a deceiver. With what assurance Christ here speaks of the victory over Satan; it is as good as done, and even when he yields to death he triumphs over it.

(2) That by the death of Christ souls should be converted, and this would be the casting out of Satan (v. 32): If I be lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men unto me. Here observe two things:—

[1] The great design of our Lord Jesus, which was to draw all men to him, not the Jews only, but the Gentiles also. Observe here how Christ himself is all in all in the conversion of a soul. It is Christ that draws. He does not drive by force, but draws as the loadstone; the soul is made willing. It is to Christ that we are drawn. He that was shy and distrustful of him is brought to love him and trust in him—drawn up to his terms, into his arms.

[2] The strange method he took to accomplish his design by being lifted up from the earth. This he spoke signifying by what death he should die, the death of the cross. He that was crucified was first nailed to the cross, and then lifted up upon it. The word here used signifies an honourable advancement: If I be exalted; he reckoned his sufferings his honour. Now Christ's drawing all men to him followed his being lifted up from the earth. It followed after it in time. The great increase of the church was after the death of Christ. It followed upon it as a blessed consequence of it. The cross of Christ, though to some a stumbling-stone, is to others a loadstone. Some make it an allusion to the lifting up of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, which drew all those to it who were stung with fiery serpents. O what flocking was there to it! So there was to Christ, when salvation through him was preached to all nations; see ch. iii. 14, 15. Perhaps it has some reference to the posture in which Christ was crucified, with his arms stretched out, to invite all to him, and embrace all that come.

V. The people's exception against what he said, v. 34. Though they had heard the voice from heaven, they object, and pick quarrels with him. Christ had called himself the Son of man (v. 23), which they knew to be one of the titles of the Messiah. He had also said that the Son of man must be lifted up, which they understood of his dying.

1. They alleged those scriptures of the Old Testament which speak of the perpetuity of the Messiah, from all which they inferred that the Messiah should not die. Their perverseness in opposing this to what Jesus had said will appear if we consider: That, when they vouched the scripture to prove that the Messiah abideth for ever, they took no notice of those texts which speak of the Messiah's death and sufferings. Had they never heard out of the law that he should pour out his soul unto death (Isa. liii. 12), and particularly that his hands and feet should be pierced? Why then do they make so strange of the lifting up of the Son of man? That, when they opposed what Christ said concerning the sufferings of the Son of man, they took no notice of what he had said concerning his glory and exaltation. In the doctrine of Christ there are paradoxes, which to men of corrupt minds are stones of stumbling.

2. They asked hereupon, Who is this Son of man? "Thou sayest, The Son of man must die; we have proved the Messiah must not, and where is then thy Messiahship?" They would rather have no Christ than a suffering one.

VI. What Christ said to this exception. They might, if they pleased, answer it themselves: man dies, and yet is immortal, and abideth for ever, so the Son of man. He gives them a serious caution to take heed of trifling away the day of their opportunities (v. 35, 36): "Yet a little while is the light with you; therefore walk while you have the light."

1. In general, we may observe here: The concern Christ has for the souls of men, and his desire of their welfare. With what tenderness does he here admonish those to look well to themselves who were contriving ill against him! The method he takes with these objectors, with meekness instructing those that opposed themselves, 2 Tim. ii. 25.

2. Particularly we have here,

(1) The advantage they enjoyed in having Christ and his gospel among them, with the shortness and uncertainty of their enjoyment of it: Yet a little while is the light with you. Christ is this light. His dying upon the cross was as consistent with his abiding for ever as the setting of the sun every night is with his perpetuity. The Jews at this time had the light with them; they had Christ's bodily presence. It was to be but a little while with them; Christ would shortly leave them. It is good for us all to consider what a little while we are to have the light with us. Time is short, and perhaps opportunity not so long.

(2) The warning given them to make the best of this privilege while they enjoyed it: Walk while you have the light; as travellers who make the best of their way forward, that they may not be benighted in their journey. It is our business to walk, to press forward towards heaven. The best time of walking is while we have the light. The day is the proper season for work, as the night is for rest. We are highly concerned thus to improve our opportunities, for fear lest our day be finished before we have finished our day's work and our day's journey: "Lest darkness come upon you."

(3) The sad condition of those who have sinned away the gospel. They walk in darkness, and know neither where they go, nor whither they go. Set aside the instructions of the Christian doctrine, and we know little of the difference between good and evil. He is going to destruction, and knows not his danger, for he is either sleeping or dancing at the pit's brink.

(4) The great duty and interest of every one of us inferred from all this (v. 36): While you have light, believe in the light. This is an admonition to them not to out-stand their market, but to accept the offer when it was made to them: the same Christ saith to all who enjoy the gospel. It is the duty of every one of us to believe in the gospel light, to subscribe to the truths it discovers, for it is a light to our eyes, and to follow its guidance, for it is a light to our feet. We are concerned to do this while we have the light. Those that have God for their Father are children of light, for God is light.

VII. Christ's retiring from them, hereupon: These things spoke Jesus and departed, and did hide himself from them. 1. For their conviction and awakening. If they will not regard what he hath said, he will have nothing more to say to them. Christ justly removes the means of grace from those that quarrel with him. 2. For his own preservation. He hid himself from their rage and fury. What he said irritated and exasperated them, and they were made worse by that which should have made them better.

Verses 37–41

We have here the honour done to our Lord Jesus by the Old Testament prophets, who foretold and lamented the infidelity of the many that believed not on him. Two things are here said concerning this untractable people, and both were forefold by the evangelical prophet Isaiah, that they did not believe, and that they could not believe.

I. They did not believe (v. 37): Though he had done so many miracles before them.

1. The abundance of the means of conviction. He did miracles, so many miracles; both so many and so great. Two things concerning them he here insists upon:—The number of them; they were many, and every new miracle confirmed the reality of all that went before. Being all miracles of mercy, the more there were the more good was done. The notoriety of them. He wrought these miracles before them, not in a corner, but before many witnesses.

2. The inefficacy of these means: Yet they believed not on him. These saw, and yet believed not.

3. The fulfilling of the scripture in this (v. 38): That the saying of Esaias might be fulfilled. The more improbable any event is, the more does a divine foresight appear in the prediction of it. One could not have imagined that the kingdom of the Messiah, supported with such pregnant proofs, should have met with so much opposition among the Jews, and therefore their unbelief is called a marvellous work, and a wonder, Isa. xxix. 14. Christ himself marvelled at it, but it was what Isaiah foretold (Isa. liii. 1). The gospel is here called their report: Who has believed our hearing, which we have heard from God, and which you have heard from us. Many hear it, but few heed it and embrace it: Who hath believed it? Here and there one, but none to speak of. It is spoken of as a thing to be greatly lamented that so few believe the report of the gospel. The reason why men believe not the report of the gospel is because the arm of the Lord is not revealed to them. They saw Christ's miracles, but did not see the arm of the Lord revealed in them.

II. They could not believe, because Esaias said, He hath blinded their eyes. This is a hard saying, who can explain it? God damns none by mere sovereignty; yet it is said, They could not believe.

1. They could not believe, that is, they would not; they were obstinately resolved in their infidelity. This is a moral impotency, like that of one that is accustomed to do evil, Jer. xiii. 23.

2. They could not because Esaias had said, He hath blinded their eyes. It is certain that God is not the author of sin, and yet,

(1) There is a righteous hand of God sometimes to be acknowledged in the blindness of those who persist in impenitency and unbelief, by which they are justly punished for their former resistance of the divine light. If God withhold abused grace, and give men over to indulged lusts, then he blinds their eyes, and hardens their hearts, and these are spiritual judgments. Observe the method of conversion implied here. Sinners are brought to see with their eyes, to discern the reality of divine things. To understand with their heart, not only to assent and approve, but to consent and accept. To be converted, and effectually turned from sin to Christ. Then God will heal them; will pardon their sins, and mortify their corruptions, which are as lurking diseases.

(2) Judicial blindness and hardness are in the word of God threatened against those who wilfully persist in wickedness. Known unto God are all his works, and all ours too. Christ knew before who would betray him.

(3) What God has foretold will certainly come to pass, and so it might be said that therefore they could not believe. Such is the knowledge of God that he cannot be deceived in what he foresees, and such his truth that he cannot deceive in what he foretells. Yet be it observed that the prophecy did not name particular persons. It pointed at the body of the Jewish nation; yet still reserving a remnant, which reserve was sufficient to keep a door of hope open to particular persons; for each one might say, Why may not I be of that remnant?

Lastly, The evangelist, having quoted the prophecy, shows (v. 41) that its principal reference was to the days of the Messiah: These things said Esaias when he saw his glory, and spoke of him. We read in the prophecy that this was said to Esaias, Isa. vi. 8, 9. But here we are told that it was said by him to the purpose. For nothing was said by him as a prophet which was not first said to him; nor was anything said to him which was not afterwards said by him to those to whom he was sent. The vision which the prophet there had of the glory of God is here said to be his seeing the glory of Jesus Christ; He saw his glory. It is said that the prophet there spoke of him. It might be objected against his doctrine, If it was from heaven, why did not the Jews believe it? It was not for want of evidence, but because their ears were heavy. It was spoken of Christ, that he should be glorified in the ruin of an unbelieving multitude, as well as in the salvation of a distinguished remnant.

Some honour was done to Christ by these rulers: for they believed on him; but they did not do him honour enough, for they had not courage to own their faith in him. Many professed more kindness for Christ than really they had; these had more kindness for him than they were willing to profess.

I. See the power of the word in the convictions that many of them were under. They believed on him as Nicodemus, received him as a teacher come from God. Many cannot but approve of that in their hearts which yet outwardly they are shy of. It may be, there are more good people than we think there are. Some are really better than they seem to be. Their faults are known, but their repentance is not; a man's goodness may be concealed by a culpable yet pardonable weakness, which he himself truly repents of. Nor have all who are good the same faculty of appearing to be so.

II. See the power of the world in the smothering of these convictions. They believed in Christ, but because of the Pharisees they durst not confess him. Wherein they failed and were defective: They did not confess Christ. There is cause to question the sincerity of that faith which is either afraid or ashamed to show itself. What they feared: being put out of the synagogue, which they thought would be a disgrace and damage to them. What was at the bottom of this fear: They loved the praise of men, chose it as a more valuable good than the praise of God. They set these two in the scale one against the other. 1. They set the praise of men in one scale, and considered how good it was to give praise to men and receive praise from men. They would not confess Christ, lest they should thereby derogate from the reputation of the Pharisees, and forfeit their own. Besides, the followers of Christ were put into an ill name, and were looked upon with contempt, which those who had been used to honour could not bear. Each one thought that if he should declare himself in favour of Christ he should stand alone, whereas, if anyone had had resolution to break the ice, he would have had more seconds than he thought of. 2. They put the praise of God in the other scale. They were sensible that by confessing Christ they should both give praise to God, and have praise from God; but, 3. They gave the preference to the praise of men, and this turned the scale. Many come short of the glory of God by having a regard to the applause of men. Love of the praise of men, as a by-end in that which is good, will make a man a hypocrite when religion is in fashion. Love of the praise of men, as a base principle in that which is evil, will make a man an apostate when religion is in disgrace.

Verses 44–50

We have here the honour Christ not assumed, but asserted, to himself, in the account he gave of his mission. As this evangelist records it, it was his last public discourse; all that follows was private with his disciples. He cried and said. The raising of his voice and crying intimate, 1. His boldness in speaking. Though they had not courage openly to profess faith in his doctrine, he had courage openly to publish it; if they were ashamed of it, he was not. 2. His earnestness in speaking. He cried as one that was importunate, and in good earnest in what he said. 3. It denotes his desire that all might take notice of it. This being the last time of the publication of his gospel by himself in person, he makes proclamation. Now what is this closing summary of all Christ's discourses? It is much like that of Moses (Deut. xxx. 15): See, I have set before you life and death. So Christ here takes leave of the temple, with a solemn declaration of three things:—

I. The privileges and dignities of those that believe.

1. By believing in Christ we are brought into an honourable acquaintance with God (v. 44, 45): He that believes on me, believes on him that sent me. He does not believe in a mere man, but he believes in one that is the Son of God. His faith does not terminate in Christ, but through him it is carried out to the Father, to whom we come by Christ as our way. This is illustrated, v. 45. He that sees me sees him that sent me; in getting an acquaintance with Christ, we come to the knowledge of God. God makes himself known in the face of Christ (2 Cor. iv. 6). All that have a believing sight of Christ are led by him to the knowledge of God. God is pleased to deal with fallen man by proxy.

2. We are hereby brought into a comfortable enjoyment of ourselves (v. 46): I am come a light into the world, that whoever believes in me should not abide in darkness. (1) The character of Christ: I am come a light into the world, to be a light to it. (2) The comfort of Christians: They do not abide in darkness. They do not continue in that dark condition in which they were by nature; they are light in the Lord. Light is sown for them. They are delivered from that darkness which abideth for ever.

II. The peril and danger of those that believe not, (v. 47, 48): "If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not; though I judge him not, there is one that judgeth him."

1. Who they are whose unbelief is here condemned: those who hear Christ's words and yet believe them not. Those shall not be condemned for their infidelity that never had, nor could have, the gospel; every man shall be judged according to the dispensation of light he was under.

2. What is their unbelief: not receiving Christ's word; it is interpreted (v. 48) a rejecting of Christ. Where the banner of the gospel is displayed, no neutrality is admitted.

3. The wonderful patience and forbearance of our Lord Jesus: I judge him not. He had work of another nature to do first, and that was to save the world. To offer salvation to all the world, and thus far to save them that it is their own fault if they be not saved.

4. The certain and unavoidable judgment of unbelievers at the great day, the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God. There is one that judgeth them. Nothing is more dreadful than abused patience, and grace trampled on. Their final judgment is reserved to the last day. The word of Christ will judge them then: The words that I have spoken, the same shall judge the unbeliever in the last day. Christ's words will judge unbelievers. As the evidence of their crime, they will convict them. As the rule of their doom, they will condemn them.

III. A solemn declaration of the authority Christ had to demand our faith, v. 49, 50.

1. The commission which our Lord Jesus received from the Father (v. 49): I have not spoken of myself; but the Father gave me a commandment what I should say. This is the same with what he said ch. vii. 16. My doctrine is, Not mine, for I have not spoken of myself. It was his that sent him. God the Father gave him his commission. His instructions are called a commandment. Our Lord Jesus learned obedience himself, before he taught it to us, though he was a Son. The Lord God commanded the first Adam, and he by his disobedience ruined us; he commanded the second Adam, and he by his obedience saved us.

2. The scope of this commission: I know that his commandment is life everlasting, v. 50. The commission given to Christ had a reference to the everlasting state of the children of men, and was in order to their everlasting life and happiness in that state. The command given him was life everlasting. This Christ says he knew: "I know it is so." Those who disobey Christ despise everlasting life, and renounce it.

3. Christ's exact observance of the commission and instructions given him: Whatsoever I speak, it is as the Father said unto me. As the faithful witness delivers souls, so did he, and spoke the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. This is a great encouragement to faith; the sayings of Christ, rightly understood, are what we may venture our souls upon. It is a great example of obedience. Christ said as he was bidden. This is the honour he values himself upon, that what the Father had said to him that he spoke. By an unfeigned belief of every word of Christ, and an entire subjection of soul to it, we must give him the glory due to his name.

CHAP. XIII

Our Saviour having finished his public discourses, now applies himself to a private conversation with his friends. Henceforward we have an account of what passed between him and his disciples. I. He washes his disciples' feet, ver. 1–17. II. He foretells who should betray him, ver. 18–30. III. He instructs them in the great doctrine of his own death, and the great duty of brotherly love, ver. 31–35. IV. He foretells Peter's denying him, ver. 36–38.

Verses 1–17

It has generally been taken for granted by commentators that Christ's washing his disciples' feet, and the discourse that followed it, were the same night in which he was betrayed, and at the same sitting wherein he ate the passover and instituted the Lord's supper. This evangelist, making it his business to gather up those passages which the others had omitted, industriously omits those which the others had recorded, which occasions some difficulty in putting them together. It is here said (v. 1) to be before the feast of the passover.

In these verses we have the story of Christ's washing his disciples' feet. But why would Christ do this? A wise man will not do a thing that looks odd and unusual, but for very good causes and considerations. The transaction was very solemn, and four reasons are here intimated why Christ did this: 1. That he might testify his love to his disciples, v. 1, 2. 2. That he might give an instance of his own voluntary humility, v. 3–5. 3. That he might signify to them spiritual washing, which is referred to in his discourse with Peter, v. 6–11. 4. That he might set them an example, v. 12–17.

I. Christ washed his disciples' feet that he might give a proof of that great love wherewith he loved them, v. 1, 2.

1. Our Lord Jesus, having loved his own that were in the world, loved them to the end, v. 1.

(1) This is true of the disciples that were his immediate followers, in particular the twelve. These were his own in the world, his bosom-friends. These he loved, he called them into fellowship with himself, was always tender of them. He allowed them to be very free with him, and bore with their infirmities. He loved them to the end; he never took away his loving kindness. Though there were some persons of quality that espoused his cause, he did not lay aside his old friends, but still stuck to his poor fishermen. Though he reproved them often, he never ceased to love them and take care of them.

(2) It is true of all believers. Our Lord Jesus has a people in the world that are his own. His own; where his own were spoken of that received him not, as a man's cattle are his own, which yet he may, when he pleases, dispose of. But here it is, his own persons, as a man's wife and children are his own. Christ has a cordial love for his own that are in the world. He was now going to his own in heaven; but he seems most concerned for his own on earth, because they most needed his care: the sickly child is most indulged. Those whom Christ loves he loves to the end. Nothing can separate a believer from the love of Christ; he loves his own unto perfection.

2. Christ manifested his love to them by washing their feet. Thus he would show that as his love to them was constant so it was condescending, would put honour upon them as great and surprising as for a lord to serve his servants. The disciples had just now betrayed the weakness of their love to him, in grudging the ointment that was poured upon his head (Matt.

xxvi. 8), yet he presently gives this proof of his love to them. Our infirmities are foils to Christ's kindnesses, and set them off.

3. He chose this time to do it, for two reasons:

(1) Because now he knew that his hour was come when he should depart out of this world to the Father. The change that was to pass over our Lord Jesus; he must depart. As Christ himself, so all believers, when they depart out of the world, go to the Father. It is a departure out of the world, and it is a going to the Father and the fruition of him as ours. The time of this change: His hour was come. It is sometimes called his enemies' hour (Luke xxii. 53), the hour of their triumph; sometimes his hour, the hour of his triumph. His foresight of it: He knew that his hour was come; he knew from the beginning that it would come, but now he knew that it was come.

(2) Because the devil had now put it into the heart of Judas to betray him, v. 2. These words in a parenthesis may be considered, [1] As tracing Judas's treason to its origin. What way of access the devil has to men's hearts we cannot tell. But there are some sins in their own nature so exceedingly sinful, that it is plain Satan lays the egg of them in a heart disposed to be the nest to hatch them in. [2] As intimating a reason why Christ now washed his disciples' feet. Judas being now resolved to betray him, the time of his departure could not be far off. The more malicious we perceive our enemies to be against us, the more industrious we should be to prepare for the worst that may come. Judas being now got into the snare, and the devil aiming at Peter and the rest of them (Luke xxii. 31), Christ would fortify his own against him. If the wolf has seized one of the flock, it is time for the shepherd to look well to the rest. Antidotes must be stirring, when the infection is begun. Judas, who was now plotting to betray him, was one of the twelve. Now Christ would hereby show that he did not design to cast them all off for the faults of one. Though one had a devil, and was a traitor, yet they should fare never the worse for that. Christ had still a kindness for his disciples though there was a Judas among them and he knew it.

II. Christ washed his disciples' feet that he might let all the world know how low he could stoop in love to his own. This is intimated, v. 3–5. Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hand, rises from supper, and, to the great surprise of the company, washed his disciples' feet.

1. Here is the rightful advancement of the Lord Jesus. The Father had given all things into his hands; had given him a power over all. See Matt. xi. 27. He is heir of all things. He came from God. This implies that he was in the beginning with God. He came from God as the Son of God, and the sent of God. He went to God. That which comes from God shall go to God; those that are born from heaven are bound for heaven. He knew all this; was not like a prince in the cradle, that knows nothing of the honour he is born to. He had a full view of all the honours of his exalted state, and yet stooped thus low. But how does this come in here? It may come in as that which supported him under his sufferings. Judas was now betraying him, and he knew it, yet, knowing also that he came from God and went to God, he did not draw back. It seems to come in as a foil to his condescension. That is given as an inducement to Christ to stoop which should rather have been a reason for his taking state; for God's thoughts are not as ours.

2. Here is the voluntary abasement of our Lord Jesus. A well-grounded assurance of heaven and happiness, instead of puffing a man up with pride, will make and keep him very humble. Now that which Christ humbled himself to was to wash his disciples' feet. The action itself was mean and servile, and that which servants of the lowest rank were employed in. If he had washed their hands or faces, it had been great condescension; but for Christ to stoop to such a piece of drudgery as this may well excite our admiration. He did this for his own disciples, who in themselves were of a low and despicable condition, not curious about their bodies; their feet, it is likely, were seldom washed, and therefore very dirty. They were his servants, and such as should have washed his feet. Many of great spirits otherwise will do a mean thing to curry favour with their superiors; they rise by stooping, and climb by cringing; but for Christ to do this to his disciples could be no act of policy, but pure humility. He rose from supper to do it. Though we translate it (v. 2) supper being ended, it might be better read, there being a supper made, for he sat down again (v. 12), and we find him dipping a sop (v. 26), so that he did it in the midst of his meal, and thereby taught us, (1) Not to reckon it a disturbance to be called from our meal to do God or our brother any real service. Christ would not leave his preaching to oblige his nearest relations (Mark iii. 33), but would leave his supper to show his love to his disciples. (2) Not to be over nice about our meat. It would have turned many a squeamish stomach to wash dirty feet at supper-time; but Christ did it, not that we might learn to be rude and slovenly (cleanliness and godliness will do well together), not to indulge, but mortify, the delicacy of the appetite, giving good manners their due place, and no more. He put himself into the garb of a servant, to do it: he laid aside his garments. We must address ourselves to duty as those that in earnest buckle to business. He did it with all the humble ceremony that could be. He girded himself with the towel; he poured water into the basin, and then washed their feet and wiped them. Nothing appears to the contrary but that he washed the feet of Judas, for he was present, v. 26. Jesus here washed the feet of a sinner, the worst of sinners, who was at this time contriving to betray him.

III. Christ washed his disciples' feet that he might signify to them the cleansing of the soul from the pollutions of sin. This is plainly intimated in his discourse with Peter upon it, v. 6–11.

1. The surprise Peter was in (v. 6): Then cometh he to Simon Peter, and bids him put out his feet to be washed. It is most probable that when he went about this service (which is all that is meant by his beginning to wash, v. 5)he took Peter first, and that the rest would not have suffered it, if they had not first heard it explained in what passed between Christ and Peter. Peter was startled at the proposal: Lord (saith he) dost thou wash my feet? What thou, our Lord and Master, whom we know and believe to be the Son of God, do this for me, a worthless worm of the earth, a sinful man, O Lord? Shall those hands wash my feet which with a touch have cleansed lepers, given sight to the blind, and raised the dead? Very willingly would Peter have taken the basin and towel, and washed his Master's feet, and been proud of the honour. For my Master to wash my feet is such a paradox as I cannot understand.

2. The immediate satisfaction Christ gave. This was at least sufficient to silence his objections (v. 7): What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter. Here are two reasons why Peter must submit:

(1) Because he was at present in the dark concerning it, and ought not to oppose what he did not understand. Christ would teach Peter an implicit obedience: "What I do thou knowest not now, and therefore art no competent judge of it."

(2) Because there was something considerable in it, of which he should hereafter know the meaning: "Thou shalt know hereafter. Our Lord Jesus does many things the meaning of which even his own disciples do not for the present know, but they shall know afterwards. Subsequent providences explain preceding ones; and we see afterwards the kind tendency of events that seemed most cross; and the way which we thought was about proved the right way. We must let Christ take his own way, and we shall find in the issue it was the best way.

3. Peter's peremptory refusal to let Christ wash his feet (v. 8): Thou shalt by no means wash my feet; no, never. It is the language of a fixed resolution. Here was a show of humility and modesty. Peter herein seemed to have, and no doubt he really had, a great respect for his Master. Under this show of humility there was a real contradiction to the will of the Lord Jesus. It is not humility, but infidelity, to put away the offers of the gospel, as if too rich to be made to us or too good news to be true.

4. Christ's insisting upon his offer: If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. A severe caution against disobedience: "If I wash thee not, if thou continue refractory, thou shalt not be owned as one of my disciples." If Peter will dispute the commands he ought to obey, he does in effect renounce his allegiance. A declaration of the necessity of spiritual washing: "If I wash not thy soul from the pollution of sin, thou hast no part with me." All those, and those only, that are spiritually washed by Christ, have a part in Christ. It is that good part the having of which is the one thing needful. It is necessary to our having a part in Christ that he wash us.

5. Peter's more than submission, his earnest request, to be washed by Christ, v. 9: Lord, wash not my feet only, but also my hands and my head. How soon is Peter's mind changed! Let us therefore not be peremptory in any resolve, because we may soon see cause to retract it, but cautious in taking up a purpose we will be tenacious of.

(1) How ready Peter is to recede from what he had said: "Lord, what a fool was I to speak such a hasty word!" Now that the washing of him appeared to be an act of Christ's grace he admits it; but disliked it when it seemed only an act of humiliation. Good men, when they see their error, will not be loth to recant it.

(2) How importunate he is for the purifying grace of the Lord Jesus, and the universal influence of it, even upon his hands and head. An exclusion from having a part in him, is the most formidable evil in the eyes of all that are enlightened. And for fear of this we should be earnest with God in prayer, that he will wash us. "Lord, wash not my feet only from the gross pollutions that cleave to them, but also my hands and my head from the spots which they have contracted, and the undiscerned filth which proceeds by perspiration from the body itself."

6. Christ's further explication of this sign.

(1) With reference to his disciples that were faithful to him (v. 10): He that is washed all over in the bath, needeth not save to wash his feet, his hands and head having been washed, and he having only dirtied his feet in walking home. Peter had gone from one extreme to the other. At first he would not let Christ wash his feet; and now he overlooks what Christ had done for him in his baptism, and what was signified thereby. See here what is the privilege and comfort of such as are in a justified state; they are washed by Christ, and are clean every whit. The heart may be swept and garnished, and yet still remain the devil's palace; but, if it be washed, it belongs to Christ, and he will not lose it. See what ought to be the daily care of those who through grace are in a justified state, and that is to wash their feet; to cleanse themselves from the guilt they contract daily through infirmity and inadvertence, by the renewed exercise of repentance. We must also wash our feet by constant watchfulness against everything that is defiling. The provision made for our cleansing should not make us presumptuous, but the more cautious. From yesterday's pardon we should fetch an argument against this day's temptation.

(2) With reflection upon Judas: And you are clean, but not all, v. 10, 11. He washed them himself, and then said, You are clean; but he excepts Judas: not all. Many have the sign that have not the thing signified. Christ sees it necessary to let his disciples know that they are not all clean; that we may all be jealous over ourselves (Is it I? Lord, is it I that am among the clean, yet not clean?)

IV. Christ washed his disciples' feet to set before us an example. This explication he gave of what he had done, when he had done it, v. 12–17.

1. With what solemnity he gave an account of the meaning of what he had done (v. 12): After he had washed their feet, he said, Know you what I have done?

(1) He adjourned the explication until he had finished the transaction: To try their submission and implicit obedience, that they might learn to acquiesce in his will when they could not give a reason for it. Because it was proper to finish the riddle before he unriddled it.

(2) Before he explained it, he asked them if they could construe it: Know you what I have done to you? He puts this question to them, not only to make them sensible of their ignorance, but to raise their desires and expectations of instruction.

2. Upon what he grounds that which he had to say (v. 13): "You call me Master and Lord, and you say well, for so I am." He that is our Redeemer and Saviour is, in order to that, our Lord and Master. He is our Master—our teacher and instructor. He is our Lord—our ruler and owner. It becomes the disciples of Christ to call him Master and Lord, not in compliment, but in reality; not by constraint, but with delight. Our calling Christ Master and Lord is an obligation upon us to receive and observe the instructions he gives us. We are bound in honour and honesty to be observant of him.

3. The lesson which he hereby taught: You also ought to wash one another's feet, v. 14.

(1) Some have understood this literally, that Christians should, in a solemn religious manner, wash one another's feet, in token of their condescending love to one another. St. Ambrose took it so, and practised it in the church of Milan. St. Austin saith that those Christians who did not do it with their hands, yet (he hoped) did it with their hearts in humility; but he saith, It is much better to do it with the hands also. What Christ has done Christians should not disdain to do.

(2) But doubtless it is to be understood figuratively. Three things our Master hereby designed to teach us: [1] A humble condescension. We must learn of our Master to be lowly in heart (Matt. xi. 29). Christ had often taught his disciples humility, and they had forgotten the lesson; but now he teaches them in such a way as surely they could never forget. [2] A condescension to be serviceable. To wash one another's feet is to stoop to the meanest offices of love, for the real good and benefit one of another. We must not grudge to take care and pains, and to spend time, for the good of those to whom we are not under any particular obligations, even of our inferiors. The duty is mutual; we must both accept help from our brethren and afford help to our brethren. [3] A serviceableness to the sanctification one of another: You ought to wash one another's feet, from the pollutions of sin. We cannot satisfy for one another's sins, but we may help to purify one another from sin. We must in the first place wash ourselves; this charity must begin at home, but it must not end there; we must sorrow for the failings and follies of our brethren, must wash our brethren's polluted feet in tears.

4. Here is the enforcing of this command from the example of what Christ had now done: If I your Lord and Master have done it to you, you ought to do it to one another. I am your Master, and therefore you ought to learn of me (v. 15); for in this, I have given you an example, that you should do to others, as I have done to you. What a good teacher Christ is. He teaches by example as well as doctrine, and for this end came into this world, that he might set us a copy; and it is a copy without one false stroke. What good scholars we must be. We must do as he hath done; he gave us a copy, that we should write after it. Christ's example herein is to be followed by ministers in particular, in whom the graces of humility and holy love should especially appear. When Christ sent his apostles abroad, it was with this charge: become all things to all men, 1 Cor. ix. 22. What I have done to your dirty feet that do you to the polluted souls of sinners; wash them. Christians likewise are here taught to condescend to each other in love, unasked, unpaid; we must not be mercenary in the services of love. I am your Master, and you are my disciples (v. 16), the servant is not greater than his Lord, neither he that is sent greater than he that sent him. Christ had urged this (Matt. x. 24, 25) as a reason why they should not think it strange if they suffered as he did; here he urges it as a reason why they should not think it much to humble themselves as he did. What he did not think a disparagement to him, they must not think a disparagement to them. Christ reminds them of their place as his servants; they were not better men than their Master. We need to be put in mind of this, that we are not greater than our Lord. Christ, by humbling himself, has dignified humility. We commonly say to those who disdain to do such or such a thing, As good as you have done it; and true indeed it is, if our Master has done it. When we see our Master serving, we cannot see but how ill it becomes us to be domineering.

5. Our Saviour closes this part of his discourse: If you know these things, happy are you if you do them. Most people think, Happy are those that rise and rule. Washing one another's feet will never get estates and preferments; but Christ saith, notwithstanding this, Happy are those that stoop and obey. Since they had such excellent precepts given them, recommended by such an excellent pattern, it will be necessary to the completing of their happiness that they practise accordingly. This is applicable to the commands of Christ in general. Though it is a great advantage to know our duty, yet we shall come short of happiness if we do not do our duty. Knowing is in order to doing, James iv. 17. It is knowing and doing that will demonstrate us of Christ's kingdom, and wise builders. It is to be applied especially to this command of humility. Nothing is better known than this, that we should be humble. Few will own themselves to be proud, for it is as inexcusable a sin, and as hateful, as any other; and yet how little is to be seen of true humility. Most know these things so well as to expect that others should do accordingly to them, but not so well as to do so themselves.

Verses 18–30

We have here the discovery of Judas's plot to betray his Master. Christ knew it from the beginning; but now first he discovered it to his disciples.

I. Christ gives them a general intimation of it (v. 18): I speak not of you all, for I know whom I have chosen, but the scripture will be fulfilled (Ps. xli. 9), He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me.

1. He intimates to them that they were not all right. He had said (v. 10), You are clean, but not all. So here, I speak not of you all. What is said of the excellencies of Christ's disciples cannot be said of all that are called so. There is a mixture of bad with good in the best societies, a Judas among the apostles.

2. He himself knew who were right, and who were not: I know whom I have chosen. Those that are chosen, Christ himself had the choosing of them. Those that are chosen are known to Christ, for he never forgets any whom he has once had in his thoughts of love, 2 Tim. ii. 19.

3. In the treachery of him that proved false to him the scripture was fulfilled. Christ took one into his family whom he foresaw to be a traitor, that the scripture might be fulfilled. This our Saviour applies to Judas. Judas, as an apostle, was admitted to the highest privilege: he did eat bread with Christ. He was favoured by him, one of those with whom he was intimately conversant. He saith, He did eat bread with me; such as he had, his disciples had their share of, Judas among the rest. Wherever he went, Judas was welcome with him, sat at table with his Master, and in all respects fared as he fared. He ate miraculous bread with him, when the loaves were multiplied, ate the passover with him. All that eat bread with Christ are not his disciples indeed. Judas was guilty of the basest treachery: he lifted up the heel against Christ. He forsook him, v. 30. He despised him. He became an enemy to him. It is no new thing for those that were Christ's seeming friends to prove his real enemies.

II. He gives them a reason why he told them beforehand of the treachery of Judas (v. 19): "Now I tell you before it come, that when it is come to pass you may be confirmed in your belief that I am he." By his clear and certain foresight of things to come, of which he gave incontestable proof, he proved himself to be the true God. By this application of the types and prophecies of the Old Testament to himself, he proved himself to be the true Messiah.

III. He gives a word of encouragement to his apostles, and all his ministers whom he employs in his service (v. 20): He that receiveth whomsoever I send receiveth me. Christ had told his disciples that they must humble and abase themselves. "Now," saith he, "though there may be those that will despise you for your condescension, yet there will be those that will do you honour, and shall be honoured for so doing." Those who know themselves dignified by Christ's commission may be content to be vilified in the world's opinion. As Christ will think never the worse of them for Judas's crime, so he will own them, and will raise up such as shall receive them. Those that had received Judas when he was a preacher were never the worse, though he afterwards proved a traitor; for he was one whom Christ sent. Those who appear to be sent of Christ we must receive, till the contrary appear. Though some, by entertaining strangers, have entertained robbers unawares, thereby some have entertained angels. The abuses put upon our charity, will neither justify our uncharitableness, nor lose us the reward of our charity. We are here encouraged to receive ministers as sent of Christ: "He that receiveth whomsoever I send, though weak and poor, yet if he deliver my message, he that entertains him shall be owned as a friend of mine." It is receiving Christ Jesus the Lord himself. We are here encouraged to receive Christ as sent of God: He that thus receiveth me, receiveth the Father also. He that receiveth me as his prince and Saviour receiveth him that sent me as his portion and felicity.

IV. Christ more particularly notifies to them the plot (v. 21): When Jesus had thus said, he was troubled in spirit, and he testified, he solemnly declared it: "One of you shall betray me." This did not determine Judas to the sin by any fatal necessity; for, though the event did follow according to the prediction, yet not from the prediction. Christ is not the author of sin. As to this heinous sin of Judas, 1. Christ foresaw it. He knows what is in men better than they do themselves, and therefore sees what will be done by them. 2. He foretold it, not only for the sake of the rest of the disciples, but for the sake of Judas himself, that he might take warning. Traitors proceed not in their plots when they find they are discovered; surely Judas, when he finds that his Master knows his design, will retreat in time. 3. He spoke of it with a manifest concern; he was troubled in spirit when he mentioned it. The falls of the disciples of Christ are a great trouble of spirit to their Master; the sins of Christians are the grief of Christ. "What! One of you betray me?" This went to his heart, as the undutifulness of children grieves those who have nourished and brought them up.

V. The disciples quickly take the alarm; and therefore looked one upon another, with a manifest concern, doubting of whom he spoke. It struck such a horror upon them that they knew not well which way to look, nor what to say. They saw their Master troubled, and therefore they were troubled. That which grieves Christ is, and should be, a grief to all that are his. Hereby they endeavoured to discover the traitor. Christ thus perplexed his disciples for a time, that he might humble them, and prove them, might excite in them a jealousy of themselves. It is good for us sometimes to be put to a gaze, to be put to a pause.

VI. The disciples were solicitous to get their Master to explain himself.

1. Of all the disciples John was most fit to ask, because he was the favourite, and sat next his Master (v. 23): There was leaning on Jesus's bosom one of the disciples whom Jesus loved. It appears that this was John, by comparing ch. xxi. 20, 24. The particular kindness which Jesus had for him; he was the disciple whom Jesus loved. He loved them all (v. 1), but John was particularly dear to him. His name signifies gracious. Among the disciples of Christ some are dearer to him than others. His place at this time: He was leaning on Jesus's bosom. It seems to be an extraordinary expression of endearment. Those who lay themselves at Christ's feet, he will lay in his bosom. Yet he conceals his name. He puts this instead of his name, to show that he was pleased with it; it is his title of honour, that he was the disciple whom Jesus loved.

2. Of all the disciples Peter was most forward to know, v. 24. Peter, sitting at some distance, beckoned to John to ask. Peter was generally the leading man. Where men's natural tempers lead them to be thus bold in answering and asking, if kept under the laws of humility and wisdom, they make men very serviceable. God gives his gifts variously; but it must be noted that it was not Peter, but John, that was the beloved disciple. The reason why Peter did not himself ask was because John had a much fairer opportunity to whisper the question into the ear of Christ, and to receive a like private answer. It is good to improve our interest in those that are near to Christ. Do we know any that we have reason to think lie in Christ's bosom? Let us beg of them to speak a good word for us.

3. The question was asked accordingly (v. 25): He then, lying at the breast of Jesus, saith unto him, Lord, who is it? Now here John shows: A regard to his fellow-disciple. Those who lie in Christ's bosom may often learn from those who lie at his feet and be reminded of that which they did not of themselves think of. A reverence of his Master. Though he whispered this in Christ's ear, yet he called him Lord; the familiarity he was admitted to did not at all lessen his respect for his Master. The more intimate communion gracious souls have with Christ, the more sensible they are of his worthiness and their own unworthiness.

4. Christ gave a speedy answer to this question, but whispered it in John's ear; for it appears (v. 29) that the rest were still ignorant of the matter. He it is to whom I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it. And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas. Christ notified the traitor by a sign. He could have told John by name who he was. The false brethren we are to stand upon our guard against are not made known to us by words, but by signs; they are to be known to us by their fruits. That sign was a sop. Christ sometimes gives sops to traitors; worldly riches, honours, and pleasures are sops (if I may so speak), which Providence sometimes gives into the hands of wicked men. We must not be outrageous against those whom we know to be very malicious against us. Christ carved to Judas as kindly as to any at the table, though he knew he was then plotting his death.

VII. Judas himself, instead of being convinced hereby of his wickedness, was the more confirmed in it.

1. The devil hereupon took possession of him (v. 27): After the sop, Satan entered into him. Satan entered into him to possess him with a prevailing prejudice against Christ, and a contempt of him, to excite in him a covetous desire of the wages of unrighteousness and a resolution to stick at nothing for the obtaining of them. Was not Satan in him before? How then is it said that now Satan entered into him? Judas was all along a devil (ch. vi. 70), but now Satan gained a more full possession of him. Though the devil is in every wicked man that does his works, yet sometimes he enters more manifestly and more powerfully than at other times. How came Satan to enter into him after the sop? Perhaps he was aware that it was the discovery of him, and it made him desperate in his resolutions. Many are made worse by the gifts of Christ's bounty, and are confirmed in their impenitency by that which should have led them to repentance.

2. Christ hereupon dismissed him: Then said Jesus unto him, What thou doest, do quickly. Abandoning him to the conduct and power of Satan. Christ knew that Satan had entered into him, and had peaceable possession; and now he gives him up as hopeless. The various methods Christ had used for his conviction were ineffectual. When the evil spirit is willingly admitted, the good Spirit justly withdraws. Challenging him to do his worst: "I do not fear thee, I am ready for thee."

3. Those that were at table understood not what he meant (v. 28, 29): No man at table knew for what intent he spoke this to him. They did not suspect that Christ said it to Judas as a traitor, because it did not enter into their heads that Judas was such a one, or would prove so. Christ's disciples were so well taught to love one another that they could not easily learn to suspect one another. They therefore took it for granted that he said it to him as treasurer of the household, giving him orders for the laying out of some money. In works of piety: Buy those things that we have need of against the feast. Or in works of charity: That he should give something to the poor. Our Lord Jesus, though he lived upon alms himself (Luke viii. 3), yet gave alms to the poor, a little out of a little. Though he might very well be excused, not only because he was poor himself, but because he did so much good in other ways, curing so many gratis; yet, to set us an example, he gave for the relief of the poor. The time of a religious feast was thought a proper time for works of charity. When he celebrated the passover he ordered something for the poor. When we experience God's bounty to us, this should make us bountiful to the poor.

4. Judas hereupon sets himself vigorously to pursue his design against him: He went away.

(1) His speedy departure: He went out presently. For fear of being more plainly discovered to the company. He went out as one weary of Christ's company and the society of his apostles. Christ needed not to expel him, he expelled himself. He went out to prosecute his design. Now that Satan had got into him he hurried him on.

(2) The time of his departure: It was night. [1] Though it was night, he made no difficulty of the coldness and darkness of the night. This should shame us out of our slothfulness and cowardice in the service of Christ, that the devil's servants are so earnest and venturous in his service. [2] Because it was night, and this gave him advantage of privacy and concealment. Those whose deeds are evil love darkness rather than light.

Verses 31–35

This and what follows, to the end of ch. xiv., was Christ's table-talk with his disciples. When supper was done, Judas went out. Christ begins this discourse. Those especially that by their place, reputation, and gifts, command the company, to whom men give ear, ought to use the opportunity of doing them good.

I. Concerning the great mystery of his own death and sufferings, about which they were as yet so much in the dark, much less did they understand the meaning of it. Christ did not begin this discourse until Judas was gone out. The presence of wicked people is often a hindrance to good discourse. When Judas was gone out, Christ said, Now is the Son of man glorified. Christ is glorified by the purifying of Christian societies: corruptions in his church are a reproach to him. Now Judas was gone to set the wheels a-going, in order to his being put to death: Now is the Son of man glorified, meaning, Now he is crucified.

1. Here is something which Christ instructs them in, concerning his sufferings, that was very comforting.

(1) That he should himself be glorified in them. Now the Son of man is to be exposed to the greatest ignominy, and dishonoured both by the cowardice of his friends and the insolence of his enemies; yet now he is glorified. Now he is to obtain a glorious victory over Satan and all the powers of darkness. Now he is to work out a glorious deliverance for his people, by his death to reconcile them to God, and bring in an everlasting righteousness and happiness for them. Now he is to give a glorious example of self-denial and patience under the cross, and love to the souls of men, such as will make him to be for ever admired. Christ had been glorified in many miracles he had wrought, and yet he speaks of his being glorified now in his sufferings, as if that were more than all his other glories.

(2) That God the Father should be glorified in them. The sufferings of Christ were: The satisfaction of God's justice, and so God was glorified in them. They were the manifestation of his holiness and mercy. God is love, and herein he hath commended his love.

(3) That he should himself be greatly glorified after them, in consideration of God's being greatly glorified by them, v. 32. [1] He is sure that God will glorify him. Hell and earth set themselves to vilify Christ, but God resolved to glorify him. He glorified him in his sufferings by the amazing signs and wonders which attended them, and extorted even from his crucifiers an acknowledgment that he was the Son of God. [2] That he will glorify him in himself. In Christ himself. He will glorify him in his own person. This supposes his speedy resurrection. [3] That he will glorify him straightway. He looked upon the joy and glory set before him, not only as great, but as near. Good services done to earthly princes often remain long unrewarded; but Christ had his preferments presently. [4] All this in consideration of God's being glorified in and by his sufferings: Seeing God is glorified in him, God shall in like manner glorify him in himself. Those who mind the business of glorifying God no doubt shall have the happiness of being glorified with him.

2. Here is something which was awakening, for as yet they were slow of heart to understand it (v. 33). Two serious words:

(1) That his stay in this world they would find to be very short. Little children. This compellation does not bespeak so much their weakness as his tenderness. Know this, then, that yet a little while I am with you. Let them improve the advantage they now had. We must make the best of the helps we have for our souls while we have them. Let them not dote upon his bodily presence. They must think of living without it; not be always little children, but go alone, without their nurses.

(2) That their following him to the other world they would find to be very difficult. What he had said to the Jews (ch. vii. 34) he saith to his disciples. Christ tells them here, [1] That when he was gone they would feel the want of him: You shall seek me. We are often taught the worth of mercies by the want of them. The presence of the Comforter was not such a sensible satisfaction as his bodily presence would have been. But observe, Christ said to the Jews, You shall seek me and not find me; but to the disciples he only saith, You shall seek me. They should find that which was tantamount, and should not seek in vain. [2] That whither he went they could not come. Christ tells them that they could not follow him only to quicken them to so much the more diligence and care. They could not follow him to his cross, for they had not courage and resolution. Nor could they follow him to his crown.

II. He discourses with them concerning the great duty of brotherly love (v. 34, 35): You shall love one another. Now that they must expect such treatment as their Master had, it concerned them by brotherly love to strengthen one another's hands. Three arguments for mutual love are here urged:

1. The command of their Master (v. 34): A new commandment I give unto you. He not only commends it, not only counsels but commands it, and makes it one of the fundamental laws of his kingdom. It is a new commandment. It is a renewed commandment. It is like an old book in a new edition corrected and enlarged. This commandment has been so corrupted that when Christ revised it, it might well be called a new commandment. The law of brotherly love was forgotten as obsolete and out of date; so that as it came from Christ new, it was new to the people. It is an everlasting command; so strangely new as to be always so. It shall be new to eternity, when faith and hope are antiquated. As Christ gives it, it is new. Before it was, Thou shalt love thy neighbour; now it is, You shall love one another; it is pressed in a more winning way when it is thus pressed as mutual duty owing to one another.

2. The example of their Saviour is another argument for brotherly love: As I have loved you. It is this that makes it a new commandment. Understand this of all the instances of Christ's love to his disciples. Thus he had loved them, and thus they must love one another, and love to the end. It may be understood of the special instance of love which he was now about to give, in laying down his life for them. Greater love hath no man than this, ch. xv. 13. We must love one another in some respects after the same manner; we must set this before us as our copy. It must be love to the souls one of another. We must also love one another from this motive, and upon this consideration —because Christ has loved us.

3. The reputation of their profession (v. 35): By this shall all men know that you are my disciples, if you have love one to another. We must have love, not only show love, but have it in the root and habit of it; have it ready. Brotherly love is the badge of Christ's disciples. This is the livery of his family; this he would have them noted for, as that wherein they excelled all others —their loving one another. This was what their Master was famous for; and therefore, if you see any people more affectionate one to another than what is common, say, "Certainly these are the followers of Christ, they have been with Jesus." The heart of Christ was very much upon it. In this they must be singular; whereas the way of the world is to be every-one for himself, they should be hearty for one another. He does not say, By this shall men know that you are my disciples—if you work miracles, for a worker of miracles is but a cipher without charity (1 Cor. xiii. 1, 2). It is the true honour of Christ's disciples to excel in brotherly love. Christians were known by their affection to one another. Their adversaries took notice of it, and said, See how these Christians love one another. If the followers of Christ do not love one another, they give just cause to suspect their own sincerity. When our brethren stand in need of help from us, when they are any ways rivals with or provoking to us, and so we have an occasion to forgive, in such cases as this it will be known whether we have this badge of Christ's disciples.

Verses 36–38

In these verses we have,

I. Peter's curiosity.

1. Peter's question was bold and blunt (v. 36): Lord, whither goest thou? referring to what Christ had said (v. 33), Whither I go, you cannot come. It is a common fault among us to be more desirous to have our curiosity gratified than our consciences directed. It is easy to observe it in the converse of Christians, how soon a discourse of that which is plain and edifying is dropped, and no more said to it; which in a matter of doubtful disputation runs into an endless strife of words.

2. Christ's answer. He did not gratify him, but said what he had said before (v. 36): Let this suffice, thou canst not follow me now, but thou shalt follow me hereafter. We may understand it of his following him to the cross. When Christ was seized, he provided for the safety of his disciples. Let these go their way, because they could not follow him now. Christ considers the frame of his disciples. The day shall be as the strength is. Peter, though designed for martyrdom, cannot follow Christ now, but he shall follow him hereafter; he shall be crucified at last, like his Master. Let him not think that because he escapes suffering now he shall never suffer. We may be reserved for greater trials than we have yet known. We may understand it of his following him to the crown: "No," saith Christ, "thou canst not follow me now. Thou shalt follow me afterwards, after thou hast fought the good fight." There is a wilderness between the Red Sea and Canaan.

II. Peter's confidence.

1. Peter makes a daring protestation of his constancy. "Lord, why cannot I follow thee now? I will lay down my life for thy sake." Having heard his Master so often speak of his own sufferings, surely he could not understand him any otherwise than of his going away by death; and he resolves as Thomas did that he will go and die with him; and better die with him than live without him. What an affectionate love Peter had to our Lord Jesus: "I will lay down my life for thy sake." Peter spoke as he thought, and though he was inconsiderate he was not insincere. How ill he took it to have it questioned: "Lord, why cannot I follow thee now? Dost thou suspect my fidelity to thee?" It is with regret that true love hears its own sincerity arraigned. We are apt to think that we can do anything, and take it amiss to be told that this and the other we cannot do, whereas without Christ we can do nothing.

2. Christ gives him a surprising prediction of his inconstancy, v. 38. He upbraids Peter with his confidence: Wilt thou lay down thy life for my sake? Christ hereby puts Peter upon second thoughts, that he might insert into it that necessary proviso, "Lord, thy grace enabling me, I will lay down my life for thy sake." "Wilt thou undertake to die for me? What! thou that trembledst to walk upon the water to me? It was an easy thing to leave thy boats and nets to follow me, but not so easy to lay down thy life." It is good for us to shame ourselves out of our presumptuous confidence in ourselves. What a fool am I to talk so big. He plainly foretells his cowardice in the critical hour. Christ solemnly asserts it with, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, the cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice: the cock shall not crow, shall not have crowed his crowing out, till thou hast again and again denied me. The crowing of the cock was to be the occasion of his repentance. Christ not only foresaw that Judas would betray him, but he foresaw that Peter would deny him though he did not design it, but the contrary. He knows not only the wickedness of sinners but the weakness of saints. Christ told Peter that he would deny him. That he would do this not once only by a hasty slip of the tongue, but would repeat it a second and a third time. We may well imagine what a mortification it was to Peter's confidence of his own courage to be told this. The most secure are commonly the least safe; and those most shamefully betray their own weakness that most confidently presume upon their own strength, 1 Cor. x. 12.

CHAP. XIV

When he had convicted and discarded Judas, he set himself to comfort the rest. The general scope of this chapter is in the first verse; it is designed to keep trouble from their hearts. Let them consider, I. Heaven as their everlasting rest, ver. 2, 3. II. Christ himself as their way, ver. 4–11. III. The great power they shall be clothed with by the prevalency of their prayers, ver. 12–14. IV. The coming of another comforter, ver. 15–17. V. The fellowship and communion that should be between him and them after his departure, ver. 18–24. VI. The instructions which the Holy Ghost should give them, ver. 25, 26. VII. The peace Christ bequeathed to them, ver. 27. VIII. Christ's own cheerfulness in his departure, ver. 28–31.

Verses 1–3

I. A general caution which Christ gives to his disciples against trouble of heart (v. 1): Let not your heart be troubled.

1. How Christ took notice of it. Perhaps it was apparent in their looks; at least it was intelligible to the Lord Jesus, who is acquainted with all our secret undiscovered sorrows, with the wound that bleeds inwardly. He takes cognizance of all the trouble which his people are at any time in danger of being overwhelmed with. Many things concurred to trouble the disciples now.

(1) Christ had just told them of the unkindness he should receive from some of them, and this troubled them all. Christ comforts them; though a godly jealousy over ourselves is of great use to keep us humble and watchful, yet it must not prevail to the disquieting of our spirits and the damping of our holy joy.

(2) He had just told them of his own departure from them, that he should not only go away, but go away in a cloud of sufferings. When we now look upon Christ pierced, we cannot but mourn and be in bitterness, though we see the glorious issue and fruit of it; much more grievous must be the sight to them, who could then look no further. If Christ depart from them, [1] They will think themselves shamefully disappointed; for they looked that this had been he that should have delivered Israel. [2] They will think themselves sadly deserted and exposed. Now, in reference to all these, Let not your hearts be troubled. Here are three words, upon any of which the emphasis may significantly be laid. Upon the word troubled. Be not like the troubled sea when it cannot rest. He does not say, "Let not your hearts be sensible of the griefs, or sad because of them," but, "Be not ruffled and discomposed." Upon the word heart: "Let not your heart be troubled." Keep possession of your own souls when you can keep possession of nothing else. The heart is the main fort; whatever you do, keep trouble from this. Upon the word your: "You that are my disciples and followers, be not you so, for you know better." Herein Christ's disciples should do more than others, should keep their minds quiet, when everything else is unquiet.

2. The remedy he prescribes; in general, believe. (1) Some read it in both parts imperatively, "Believe in God, and his perfections and providence, believe also in me, and my mediation." (2) We read the former as an acknowledgment that they did believe in God. "But, if you would effectually provide against a stormy day, believe also in me." By believing in Christ as the Mediator between God and man, our belief in God becomes comfortable. Those that rightly believe in God will believe in Jesus Christ, and believing in God through Jesus Christ is an excellent means of keeping trouble from the heart. The joy of faith is the best remedy against the griefs of sense.

II. Here is a particular direction to act faith upon the promise of eternal life, v. 2, 3. But what must they trust God and Christ for? Trust them for a happiness to come, for a happiness to last as long as the immortal soul and the eternal world shall last. The saints have encouraged themselves with this in their greatest extremities. That heaven would make amends for all. Let us see how this is suggested here.

1. Believe and consider that really there is such a happiness: In my Father's house there are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you, v. 2.

(1) See under what notion the happiness of heaven is here represented: as mansions. Heaven is a house, not a tent or tabernacle. It is a Father's house: my Father's house; and his Father is our Father. All true believers shall be welcome to that happiness as to their home. There are mansions there. Distinct dwellings, an apartment for each. Our individuality shall not be lost there. Durable dwellings. The house itself is lasting; our estate in it is not for a term of years, but a perpetuity. Here we are as in an inn; in heaven we shall gain a settlement. There are many mansions, for there are many sons to be brought to glory.

(2) See what assurance we have of the reality of the happiness itself: "If it were not so, I would have told you." The assurance is built: Upon the veracity of his word. Upon the sincerity of his affection to them. As he is true, and would not impose upon them himself, so he is kind, and would not suffer them to be imposed upon. He loves us too well, and means us too well, to disappoint the expectations of his own raising.

2. Believe and consider that the design of Christ's going away was to prepare a place in heaven for his disciples. He went to prepare a place for us; to take possession for us, as our advocate or attorney, and so to secure our title as indefeasible; to make provision. The happiness of heaven yet must be further fitted up for man. It consisting much in the presence of Christ there, it was therefore necessary that he should go before. Heaven would be an unready place for a Christian if Christ were not there.

3. Believe and consider that therefore he would certainly come again (v. 3): "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you to myself, that where I am there you may be also." Now these are comfortable words indeed. (1) That Jesus Christ will come again; intimating the certainty of it. We say, We are coming, when we are busy in preparing for our coming, and so he is. (2) That he will come again to receive all his faithful followers to himself. The coming of Christ is in order to our gathering together unto him. (3) That where he is there they shall be also. This intimates that the quintessence of heaven's happiness is being with Christ there. That where I am; where I am to be shortly, where I am to be eternally; there you shall be shortly, there you shall be eternally: not only spectators of his glory, but sharers in it. (4) That this may be inferred from his going to prepare a place for us, for his preparations shall not be in vain. He will not build and furnish lodgings, and let them stand empty. If he has prepared the place for us, he will prepare us for it, and in due time put us in possession of it.

Verses 4–11

Christ, having set the happiness of heaven before them as the end, here shows them himself as the way to it. You know, 1. "You may know; it is none of the secret things which belong not to you, but one of the things revealed." 2. "You do know; you know that which is the home and which is the way, though perhaps not as the home and as the way. You have been told it, and cannot but know."

I. Thomas enquired concerning the way (v. 5).

He said, "Lord, we know not whither thou goest, and how can we know the way?" Christ's testimony concerning their knowledge made them more sensible of their ignorance, and more inquisitive after further light. Thomas here shows more modesty than Peter. Peter was the more solicitous to know whither Christ went. Thomas here seems more solicitous to know the way. His confession of his ignorance was commendable enough. If good men be in the dark, and know it but in part, yet they are willing to own their defects. The cause of his ignorance was culpable. They knew not whither Christ went, because they dreamed of a temporal kingdom. Their fancy ran upon his going to some remarkable city or other, there to be anointed king. Where these castles in the air were to be built, east, west, north, or south, they could not tell, and therefore knew not the way. Had Thomas understood, that Christ was going to the invisible world, he would not have said, Lord, we do not know the way.

II. Now to this complaint of their ignorance Christ gives a full answer, v. 6, 7. Thomas had enquired both whither he went and what was the way, and Christ answers both these enquiries. They knew him, and he was the way; they knew the Father, and he was the end; and therefore, whither I go you know, and the way you know. Believe in God as the end, and in me as the way (v. 1).

(1) He speaks of himself as the way, v. 6. I am the way; no man comes to the Father but by me.

[1] The nature of his mediation: He is the way, the truth, and the life. Let us consider these first distinctly. Christ is the way. In him God and man meet, and are brought together. We could not get to the tree of life in the way of innocency; but Christ is another way to it. The disciples followed him, and Christ tells them that while they continued following him, they would never be out of their way. He is the truth; as truth is opposed to falsehood and error. When we enquire for truth, we need learn no more than the truth as it is in Jesus; as truth is opposed to fallacy and deceit; as true as truth itself. He is the life; for we are alive unto God only in and through Jesus Christ. Let us consider these jointly. Christ is the way, the truth, and the life. He is the beginning, the middle, and the end. He is the true and living way; there are truth and life in the way, as well as at the end of it. He is the true way to life. Other ways may seem right, but the end of them is the way of death.

[2] The necessity of his mediation: No man cometh to the Father but by me. Fallen man cannot come to him as a Father, otherwise than by Christ as Mediator.

(2) He speaks of his Father as the end (v. 7): "If you had known me, you would have known my Father also; and henceforth you know him and have seen him." A tacit rebuke to them for their dullness and carelessness in not acquainting themselves with Jesus Christ: If you had known me——. They knew him, and yet did not know him so well as they might and should have known him. Christ had said to the Jews (ch. viii. 19): If you had known me, you would have known my Father also; and here the same to his disciples; for it is hard to say which is the more strange, the wilful ignorance of those that are enemies to the light, or the defects and mistakes of the children of light. He was well satisfied concerning their sincerity, notwithstanding the weakness of their understanding: "And henceforth you know him, and have seen him," for in the face of Christ we see the glory of God. Many of the disciples of Christ have more knowledge and more grace than they think they have. Those that know God do not all at once know that they know him.

III. Philip enquired concerning the Father (v. 8), and Christ answered him, v. 9–11.

1. Philip's request for some extraordinary discovery of the Father. From an earnest desire of further light, he cries out, Show us the Father. "That is what we want, that is what we would have: Show us the Father and it sufficeth us." This supposes an earnest desire of acquaintance with God as a Father. The petition is, "Show us the Father." The plea is, It sufficeth us. Grant us but one sight of the Father, and we have enough. In the knowledge of God as our Father the soul is satisfied; a sight of the Father is a heaven upon earth. "Let us see the Father with our bodily eyes, as we see thee, and it sufficeth us." It manifests not only the weakness of his faith, but his ignorance of the gospel way of manifesting the Father. Christ's institutions have provided better for the confirmation of our faith than our own inventions would.

2. Christ's reply, v. 9–11.

(1) He refers him to what he had seen, v. 9. "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? Now, he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father?" He reproves him for two things: [1] For not improving his acquaintance with Christ to a clear and distinct knowledge of him: "Hast thou not known me, Philip?" Philip, the first day he came to him, declared that he knew him to be the Messiah (ch. i. 45), and yet to this day did not know the Father in him. Many know Christ, who yet do not know what they might know of him, nor see what they should see in him. I have been so long time with thee. Christ expects that our proficiency should be in some measure according to our standing, that we should not be always babes. [2] For his infirmity in the prayer made, Show us the Father. Herein appears much of the weakness of Christ's disciples that they know not what to pray for as they ought (Rom. viii. 26), but often ask amiss (Jas. iv. 3). He instructs him, and gives him a maxim which justifies what he had said (v. 7): You know the Father, and have seen him; and answered what Philip had asked, Show us the Father. He that hath seen me hath seen the Father. All that saw Christ in the flesh might have seen the Father in him. All that saw Christ by faith did see the Father in him, though they were not suddenly aware that they did so. The holiness of God shone in the spotless purity of Christ's life, and his grace in all the acts of grace he did.

(2) He refers him to what he had reason to believe (v. 10, 11): "Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me, and therefore that in seeing me thou hast seen the Father?" What it is which we are to believe: That I am in the Father, and the Father in me; that is, as he had said (ch. x. 30), I and my Father are one. In knowing Christ we know the Father; and in seeing him we see the Father. What inducements we have to believe this. We must believe it: For his word's sake: The words that I speak to you, I speak not of myself. He spoke not of himself only, but the mind of God according to the eternal counsels. For his works' sake: The Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth them; and therefore believe me for their sake. The Father is said to dwell in him. The Father so dwells in Christ that in him he may be found, as a man where he dwells. Seek ye the Lord, seek him in Christ, and he will be found, for in him he dwells. He doeth the works. Many works of power, and works of mercy, Christ did, and the Father did them in him. We are bound to believe this, for the very works' sake. Christ's miracles are proofs of his divine mission, not only for the conviction of infidels, but for the confirmation of the faith of his own disciples.

Verses 12–14

The disciples, as they were full of grief to think of parting with their Master, so they were full of care what would become of themselves when he was gone. If he leave them, they will be as sheep having no shepherd. Christ here assures them that they should be clothed with powers sufficient to bear them out.

I. Great power on earth (v. 12): He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also. This magnifies his power more than anything, that he not only wrought miracles himself, but gave power to others to do so too.

1. Two things he assures them of:

(1) That they should be enabled to do such works as he had done. Did Christ heal the sick, cleanse the leper, raise the dead? So should they. Did he convince and convert sinners, and draw multitudes to him? So should they. Though he should depart, the work should not cease, nor fall to the ground; and it is still in the doing.

(2) That they should do greater works than these. In the kingdom of nature they should work greater miracles. No miracle is little, but some to our apprehension seem greater than others. Christ wrought miracles for two or three years in one country, but his followers wrought miracles in his name for many ages in divers countries. In the kingdom of grace, they should obtain greater victories by the gospel than had been obtained while Christ was upon earth. The truth is, the captivating of so great a part of the world to Christ, was the miracle of all.

2. The reason Christ gives for this is, Because I go unto my Father. "Because I go, it will be requisite that you should have such a power. Because I go to the Father, I shall be in a capacity to furnish you with such a power."

II. Great power in heaven: "Whatsoever you shall ask, that will I do" (v. 13, 14).

1. In what way they were to derive power from him, when he was gone to the Father—by prayer. When dear friends are to be removed to a distance from each other, they provide for the settling of a correspondence; thus, when Christ was going to his Father, he tells his disciples how they might write to him upon every occasion, and send their epistles by a safe and ready way of conveyance. "Let me hear from you by prayer, and you shall hear from me by the Spirit." And it is still open to us. Humility prescribed: You shall ask. They could demand nothing of him as a debt, but must be humble supplicants, beg or starve, beg or perish. Liberty allowed: "Ask anything, anything that is good and proper for you; anything, provided you know what you ask." Occasions vary, but they shall be welcome to the throne of grace upon every occasion.

2. In what name they were to present their petitions: Ask in my name. They were to plead his merit and intercession, and to depend upon it. If we ask in our own name, we cannot expect to speed, for, being strangers, we have no name in heaven; being sinners, we have an ill name there; but Christ's is a good name, well known in heaven.

3. What success they should have in their prayers: "What you ask, that will I do," v. 13. And again (v. 14), "I will do it. You may be sure I will: not only it shall be done, but I will do it." By faith in his name we may have what we will for the asking.

4. For what reason their prayers should speed so well: That the Father may be glorified in the Son. Hallowed be thy name is an answered prayer, and is put first, because, if the heart be sincere in this, it does in a manner consecrate all the other petitions. This Christ will aim at in granting, and for the sake of this will do what they ask. The wisdom, power, and goodness of God were magnified in the Redeemer when his apostles and ministers were enabled to do such great things, both in the proofs of their doctrine and in the successes of it.

Verses 15–17

Christ here promises to send the Spirit, whose office it should be to be their Comforter, to impress these things upon them.

I. He premises to this a memento of duty (v. 15): If you love me, keep my commandments. We must not expect comfort but in the way of duty. When they were in care what would become of them now, he bids them keep his commandments. In difficult times our care concerning the events of the day should be swallowed up in a care concerning the duty of the day. When they were showing their love to Christ by their grieving to think of his departure, and the sorrow which filled their hearts, he bids them, if they would show their love to him, do it, not by these weak and feminine passions, but by a universal obedience to his commands; this is better than sacrifice, better than tears. When Christ has given them precious promises he lays down this as a limitation of the promises, "Provided you keep my commandments, from a principle of love to me."

II. He promises this great and unspeakable blessing to them, v. 16, 17.

1. It is promised that they shall have another comforter. This is the great New Testament promise; a promise adapted to the present distress of the disciples, who were in sorrow, and needed a comforter.

(1) The blessing promised. The word is used only here in these discourses of Christ's, and 1 John ii. 1, where he translates it an advocate. You shall have another advocate. The office of the Spirit was to be Christ's advocate with them and others, to plead his cause, and take care of his concerns, on earth. When Christ was with them he spoke for them; but now that he is leaving them, the Spirit of the Father shall speak in them, Matt. x. 19, 20. And the cause cannot miscarry that is pleaded by such an advocate. You shall have another master or teacher, another exhorter. While they had Christ with them he excited and exhorted them to their duty; but now he leaves one with them that shall do this as effectually. Another comforter. Christ comforted his disciples when he was with them, and now that he was leaving them in their greatest need he promises them another.

(2) The giver of this blessing: The Father shall give him. The same that gave the Son to be our Saviour will give his Spirit to be our comforter.

(3) How this blessing is procured—by the intercession of the Lord Jesus: I will pray the Father. When Christ saith, I will pray the Father, it does not suppose that the Father is unwilling, but only that the gift of the Spirit is a fruit of Christ's mediation.

(4) The continuance of this blessing: That he may abide with you for ever. "With you, as long as you live. You shall never know the want of a comforter." There are everlasting consolations provided for us. They must disperse, and therefore a comforter that would be with them all, in all places alike, was alone fit to be with them for ever: "With your successors, when you are gone, to the end of time."

2. This comforter is the Spirit of truth, whom you know, v. 16, 17.

(1) The comforter promised is the Spirit, one who should do his work in a spiritual way and manner.

(2) He is the Spirit of truth. He will be true to you, and to his undertaking for you. He will teach you the truth. The Spirit of truth shall not only lead you into all truth, but others by your ministry. Christ is the truth, and he is the Spirit of Christ.

(3) He is one whom the world cannot receive; but you know him. Therefore he abideth with you. The disciples of Christ are here distinguished from the world; they are the children and heirs of another world, not of this. It is the misery of those that are invincibly devoted to the world that they cannot receive the Spirit of truth. Where the spirit of the world has the ascendant, the Spirit of God is excluded. Therefore men cannot receive the Spirit of truth because they see him not, neither know him. The comforts of the Spirit are foolishness to them, as much as ever the cross of Christ was. Speak to the children of this world of the operations of the Spirit, and you are as a barbarian to them. The best knowledge of the Spirit of truth is that which is got by experience: You know him, for he dwelleth with you. Christ had dwelt with them, and by their acquaintance with him they could not but know the Spirit of truth. The experiences of the saints are the explications of the promises. He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you, for the blessed Spirit doth not use to shift his lodging. Those that know him know how to invite him and bid him welcome; and therefore he shall be in them, as the light in the air, as the sap in the tree, and their union with him inseparable. The gift of the Holy Ghost is a peculiar gift, bestowed upon the disciples of Christ in a distinguishing way—upon them, and not the world. No comforts are comparable to those which make no show, make no noise.

When friends are parting, it is a common request they make to each other, "Pray let us hear from you as often as you can": this Christ engaged to his disciples, that out of sight they should not be out of mind.

I. He promises that he would continue his care of them (v. 18): "I will not leave you orphans, or fatherless; I will come to you." His departure from them was neither total nor final. Not total. "Though I leave you without my bodily presence, yet I do not leave you without comfort." The case of true believers, though sometimes it may be sorrowful, is never comfortless, because they are never orphans: for God is their Father. Not final: I will come to you. "I will come speedily to you at my resurrection." He had often said, The third day I will rise again. "I will be coming daily to you in my Spirit"; in the tokens of his love, and visits of his grace, he is still coming. The consideration of Christ's coming to us saves us from being comfortless in his removals from us.

II. He promises that they should continue their acquaintance with him (v. 19, 20): Yet a little while, and the world sees me no more. The malignant world thought they had seen enough of him, and cried, Away with him; crucify him; and so shall their doom be; they shall see him no more. But his disciples have communion with him in his absence.

1. You see me. They saw him with their bodily eyes after his resurrection. And then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord. They saw him with an eye of faith after his ascension; saw that in him which the world saw not.

2. Because I live, you shall live also. That which grieved them was, that their Master was dying, and they counted upon nothing else but to die with him. No, saith Christ, I live. Not only, I shall live, as he saith of them, but, I do live. We are not comfortless, while we know that our Redeemer lives. Therefore you shall live also. The life of Christians is bound up in the life of Christ; as sure and as long as he lives, those that by faith are united to him shall live also. This life is hid with Christ; if the head and root live, the members and branches live also.

3. You shall have the assurance of this (v. 20): At that day you shall know that I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you. These glorious mysteries will be fully known in heaven. Now it appears not what we shall be, but then it will appear what we were. They were more fully known after the pouring out of the Spirit upon the apostles; at that day divine light should shine, and their eyes should see more clearly, like the blind man's at the second touch of Christ's hand, who at first only saw men as trees walking. They are known by all that receive the Spirit of truth. They know that Christ is in the Father, is one with the Father, by their experience of what he has wrought for them and in them. That Christ is in them. That they are in Christ, for the relation is mutual. Christ in them and they in Christ, which speaks an intimate and inseparable union. Union with Christ is the life of believers. The knowledge of this union is their unspeakable joy and satisfaction.

III. He promises that he would love them, and manifest himself to them, v. 21–24.

1. Who they are whom Christ will accept as lovers of him; those that have his commandments, and keep them. The kind things he here said to his disciples were intended not for those only that were now his followers, but for all that should believe in him through their word. The duty of those who claim the dignity of being disciples. Having Christ's commandments, we must keep them. Having them in our heads, we must keep them in our hearts and lives. The dignity of those that do the duty of disciples. Not those that have the greatest wit and know how to talk for him, or the greatest estate to lay out for him, but those that keep his commandments. The surest evidence of our love to Christ is obedience to the laws of Christ.

2. What returns he will make to them for their love. (1) They shall have the Father's love: He that loveth me shall be loved of my Father. We could not love God if he did not first give us his grace to love him. He loves them, and lets them know that he loves them. God so loves the Son as to love all those that love him. (2) They shall have Christ's love: And I will love him. God will love him as a Father, and I will love him as a brother, an elder brother. In the nature of God, nothing shines more brightly than this, that God is love. And in the undertaking of Christ nothing appears more glorious than this, that he loved us. Christ was now leaving his disciples, but promises to continue his love to them. He bears them on his heart, and ever lives interceding for them. (3) They shall have the comfort of that love: I will manifest myself to him. Being promised to all that love him and keep his commandments, it must be construed so as to extend to them.

3. What occurred upon Christ's making this promise.

(1) One of the disciples expresses his wonder and surprise at it, v. 22. [1] Who it was that said this—Judas, not Iscariot. Two of Christ's disciples were of that name: one of them was the traitor, the other was the brother of James (Luke vi. 16). There was a very good man, and a very bad man, called by the same name; for names commend us not to God, nor do they make men worse. Judas the apostle was never the worse, nor Judas the apostate ever the better, for being namesakes. The evangelist carefully distinguishes between them. Take heed of mistaking; let us not confound the precious and the vile. [2] What he said—Lord how is it? First, The weakness of his understanding. He expected the temporal kingdom of the Messiah, that it should appear in external pomp and power. "What is the matter now, that thou wilt not show thyself openly as is expected." Secondly, The strength of his affections. Lord, how is it? He is amazed at the condescensions of divine grace. What is there in us to deserve so great a favour? It is justly marvellous in our eyes; for it is unaccountable, and must be resolved into free and sovereign grace.

(2) Christ explains and confirms what he had said, v. 23, 24.

[1] He further explains the condition of the promise, which was loving him, and keeping his commandments. Love is the root, obedience is the fruit. Where a sincere love to Christ is in the heart, there will be obedience: "If a man love me indeed, he will keep my words." Where love is, duty follows of course, is easy and natural, and flows from a principle of gratitude. Where there is no true love to Christ there will be no care to obey him: He that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings, v. 24. Certainly those do not love him that believe not his truths, and obey not his laws, to whom Christ's sayings are but as idle tales, which he heeds not, or hard sayings, which he likes not. Why should Christ be familiar with those that will be strange to him?

[2] He further explains the promise (v. 23): If a man thus love me, I will manifest myself to him. My Father will love him; this he had said before (v. 21), and here repeats it for the confirming of our faith. Jude wondered that Christ should manifest himself to them. We will come unto him, and make our abode with him. Not only, I will, but We will, I and the Father. Wherever Christ is formed the image of God is stamped. Not only, "I will show myself to him at a distance," but, "We will come to him, to be near him, to be with him." Not only, "I will give him a transient view of me, or make him a short and running visit," but, We will take up our abode with him. God will not only love obedient believers, but he will rest in love to them. He will be with them as at his home.

[3] He gives a good reason both to bind us to observe the condition and encourage us to depend upon the promise. The word which you hear is not mine, but his that sent me, v. 24. To this purport he had often spoken (ch. vii. 16). The stress of duty is laid upon the precept of Christ as our rule. The stress of our comfort is laid upon the promise of Christ. It concerns us to enquire whether the security be sufficient for us to venture our all upon; and this satisfies us that it is, that the promise is not Christ's bare word, but the Father's which sent him.

Two things Christ here comforts his disciples with:

I. That they should be under the tuition of his Spirit, v. 25, 26. Christ would have them reflect upon the instructions he had given them: These things have I spoken unto you being yet present with you. What he had said he did not retract. What he had spoken he had spoken, and would abide by it. Christ would find out a way of speaking to them after his departure from them, v. 26.

(1) On whose account he should be sent: "The Father will send him in my name; that is, for my sake." He came in his Father's name: the Spirit comes in his name to carry on his undertaking.

(2) On what errand he should be sent: He shall teach you all things. He shall teach them all things necessary for them either to learn themselves, or to teach others; for those that would teach the things of God must first themselves be taught of God. He shall bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you. Many a good lesson Christ had taught them, which they had forgotten. The Spirit shall not teach them a new gospel, but bring to their minds that which they had been taught, by leading them into the understanding of it. To all the saints the Spirit of grace is given to be a remembrancer.

II. That they should be under the influence of his peace (v. 27): Peace I leave with you. When Christ was about to leave the world he made his will. His soul he committed to his Father; his body he bequeathed to Joseph, to be decently interred; his clothes fell to the soldiers; his mother he left to the care of John: but what should he leave to his poor disciples, that had left all for him? Silver and gold he had none; but he left them that which was infinitely better, his peace. "I leave you, but I leave my peace with you." He did not part in anger, but in love; for this was his farewell, Peace I leave with you.

1. The legacy that is here bequeathed: Peace, my peace. Peace is put for all good. Peace is put for reconciliation and love; the peace bequeathed is peace with God. Peace in our own bosoms seems to be especially meant. It is the peace on which the angels congratulated men at his birth, Luke ii. 14.

2. To whom this legacy is bequeathed: "To you, my disciples and followers." This legacy was left to them and their successors, to them and all true Christians in all ages.

3. In what manner it is left: Not as the world giveth, give I unto you. "I do not compliment you with Peace be unto you; no, it is not a mere formality, but a real blessing. The gifts I give to you are not such as this world gives." The world's gifts concern only the body and time; Christ's gifts enrich the soul for eternity. The peace which Christ gives is infinitely more valuable than that which the world gives. As is the difference between a killing lethargy and a reviving refreshing sleep, such is the difference between Christ's peace and the world's.

4. What use they should make of it: Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid. This comes in here as the conclusion of the whole matter; he had said (v. 1), Let not your heart be troubled, and here he repeats it as that for which he had now given sufficient reason.

Verses 28–31

Christ here gives his disciples another reason why their hearts should not be troubled for his going away; and that is, because his heart was not. He comforted himself,

I. That, though he went away, he should come again: "You have heard how I have said, I go away, and come again." Christ encouraged himself with this, in his sufferings and death, that he should come again, and the same should comfort us in our departure at death; we go away to come again; the leave we take of our friends at that parting is only a good night, not a final farewell.

II. That he went to his Father: "If you loved me, you would rejoice because, though I leave you, I go unto the Father; for my Father is greater than I." It is matter of joy. His departure had a bright side as well as a dark side. The reason of this is, because the Father is greater than he. His state with his Father would be much more excellent and glorious than his present state. Christ raises the thoughts and expectations of his disciples to something greater than that in which now they thought all their happiness bound up. The kingdom of the Father will be greater than the mediatorial kingdom. The disciples of Christ should show that they love him by their rejoicing in the glories of his exaltation. Many that love Christ, let their love run out in a wrong channel; they think if they love him they must be continually in pain because of him; whereas those that love him should rejoice in Christ Jesus.

III. That his going away would be a means of confirming the faith of his disciples (v. 29): I have told you before it come to pass, that, when it is come to pass, you might believe. See this reason, ch. xiii. 19; xvi. 4. Christ told his disciples of his death because it would afterwards redound to the confirmation of their faith. He who foretold these things had a divine prescience. The things foretold were according to the divine purpose. Let them therefore not be troubled at that which would be for the confirmation of their faith.

IV. That he was sure of a victory over Satan (v. 30): "Henceforth I will not talk much with you." He had a great deal of good talk with them after this (ch. xv. and xvi.), but, in comparison with what he had said, it was not much. One reason why he would not talk much with them was because he had now other work to apply himself to: The prince of this world comes. He called the devil the prince of this world, ch. xii. 31. Christ tells them that the prince of this world was his enemy. But he has nothing in me.

1. The prospect Christ had of an approaching conflict, not only with men, but with the powers of darkness. The devil had set upon him with his temptations (Matt. iv), had offered him the kingdoms of this world. Then the devil departed from him for a season. "But now," says Christ, "I see him rallying again." The foresight of a temptation gives us great advantage in our resistance of it; for, being forewarned, we should be forearmed. 2. The assurance he had of good success in the conflict: He hath nothing in me. There was no guilt in Christ. Christ having done no evil, Satan, though he prevailed to crucify him, could not prevail to terrify him; though he hurried him to death, yet not to despair. When Satan comes to disquiet us, he has something in us to perplex us with, for we have all sinned; but, when he would disturb Christ, he found no occasion against him. There was no corruption in Christ. Such was the spotless purity of his nature that he was above the possibility of sinning.

V. That his departure was in obedience to his Father. That the world may know that I love the Father, v. 31.

1. Confirming what he had often said, that his undertaking, as Mediator, was a demonstration to the world, of his compliance with the Father. As it was an evidence of his love to man that he died for his salvation, so it was of his love to God that he died for his glory. It demonstrates also his obedience to his Father: "As the Father gave me commandment, even so I do." The best evidence of our love to the Father is our doing as he hath given us commandment. The command of God is sufficient to bear us out in that which is most disputed by others, and therefore should be sufficient to bear us up in that which is most difficult to ourselves.

2. Concluding what he had now said; that the world may know that I love the Father. You shall see how cheerfully I can meet the appointed cross: "Arise, let us go hence." When we talk of troubles at a distance, it is easy to say, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. When an unavoidable cross lies in the way of duty, then to say, "Arise, let us go to meet it," instead of going out of our way to miss it, this lets the world know that we love the Father. In these words he gives his disciples an encouragement to follow him. He does not say, I must go; but, Let us go. He calls them out to no hardships but what he himself goes before them in as their leader. He gives them an example, teaching them at all times to sit loose to all things here below, and often to think and speak of leaving them. When we sit down under Christ's shadow with delight, and say, It is good to be here; yet we must think of rising and going hence; going down from the mount.

CHAP. XV

It is generally agreed that Christ's discourse in this and the next chapter was at the close of the last supper. What he chooses to discourse of is very pertinent to the present sad occasion of a farewell. There are four words to which his discourse in this chapter may be reduced: 1. Fruit, ver. 1–8. 2. Love, ver. 9–17. 3. Hatred, ver. 18–25. 4. The Comforter, ver. 26, 27.

Verses 1–8

Here Christ discourses concerning the fruit, the fruits of the Spirit, under the similitude of a vine.

I. The doctrine of this similitude.

1. Jesus Christ is the vine, the true vine. He is pleased to speak of himself under low and humble comparisons. He is the vine, planted in the vineyard, and not a spontaneous product; planted in the earth, for he is the Word made flesh. The vine is a spreading plant, and Christ will be known as salvation to the ends of the earth. The fruit of the vine honours God and cheers man, so does the fruit of Christ's mediation. He is the true vine, as truth is opposed to pretence and counterfeit. Unfruitful trees are said to lie, but Christ is a vine that will not deceive.

2. Believers are branches of this vine, which supposes that Christ is the root of the vine. The root bears the tree (Rom. xi. 18), diffuses sap to it, and is all in all to its flourishing and fruitfulness; and in Christ are all supports and supplies. The branches of the vine are many, yet, meeting in the root, are all but one vine; thus all good Christians, though in place and opinion distant from each other, yet meet in Christ, the centre of their unity.

3. The Father is the husbandman, the land-worker. Though the earth is the Lord's, it yields him no fruit unless he work it. God has not only a propriety in, but a care of, the vine and all the branches. Never was any husbandman so wise, so watchful, about his vineyard, as God is about his church, which therefore must needs prosper.

II. The duty taught us by this similitude.

1. We must be fruitful. From a vine we look for grapes, and from a Christian we look for Christianity; this is the fruit, a Christian temper and disposition, a Christian life and conversation. We must honour God, and do good, and this is bearing fruit. The disciples here must be fruitful, as Christians, in all the fruits of righteousness, and as apostles, in diffusing the savour of the knowledge of Christ.

(1) The doom of the unfruitful (v. 2): They are taken away. It is here intimated that there are many who pass for branches in Christ who yet do not bear fruit. Being only tied to him by the thread of an outward profession, though they seem to be branches, they will soon be seen to be dry ones. Unfruitful professors are unfaithful professors; professors, and no more. It is here threatened that they shall be taken away.

(2) The promise made to the fruitful: He purgeth them, that they may bring forth more fruit. Further fruitfulness is the blessed reward of forward fruitfulness. Even fruitful branches, in order to their further fruitfulness, have need of purging or pruning. The best have that in them which is peccant; some notions, passions, or humours, that want to be purged away. These shall be taken off by degrees in the proper season. The purging of fruitful branches is the care and work of the great husbandman.

(3) The benefits which believers have. Now you are clean, v. 3. Their society was clean, now that Judas was expelled. Till they were got clear of him they were not all clean. They were each of them clean, that is, sanctified, by the truth of Christ (ch. xvii. 17). Apply it to all believers. The word of Christ is spoken to them; there is a cleansing virtue in that word. It cleanses as fire cleanses the gold from its dross, and as physic cleanses the body from its disease.

(4) The glory that will redound to God by our fruitfulness, v. 8. If we bear much fruit, herein our Father will be glorified. The fruitfulness of all Christians is to the glory of God. By the eminent good works of Christians many are brought to glorify our Father who is in heaven. So shall we be Christ's disciples indeed. So shall we both evidence our discipleship and adorn it, and be to our Master for a name and a praise. And the more fruit we bring forth, the more we abound in that which is good, the more he is glorified.

2. In order to our fruitfulness, we must abide in Christ.

(1) The duty enjoined (v. 4): Abide in me, and I in you. Those that are come to Christ must abide in him: "Abide in me, and I in you. Abide in me, and then fear not but I will abide in you"; for the communion between Christ and believers never fails on his side. The knot of the branch abides in the vine, and the sap of the vine abides in the branch, and so there is a constant communication between them.

(2) The necessity of our abiding in Christ, in order to our fruitfulness (v. 4, 5): "You cannot bring forth fruit, except you abide in me; but, if you do, you bring forth much fruit; for without me you can do nothing." So necessary is it to our happiness that we be fruitful, that the best argument to engage us to abide in Christ is, that otherwise we cannot be fruitful. Abiding in Christ is necessary in order to our doing much good. He that is constant in the exercise of faith in Christ and love to him, bringeth forth much fruit. A life of faith in the Son of God is incomparably the most excellent life a man can live in this world. It is necessary to our doing any good. It is the root and spring of all good: "Without me you can do nothing: not only no great thing, but nothing." Without Christ we can do nothing aright, nothing that will be fruit pleasing to God or profitable to ourselves. We depend upon Christ, not only as the vine upon the wall, for support; but, as the branch on the root, for sap.

(3) The fatal consequences of forsaking Christ (v. 6): If any man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch. This is a description of the fearful state of hypocrites that are not in Christ. They are cast forth as dry and withered branches, which are plucked off because they cumber the tree. It is just that those who reject him should be rejected by him. Those that abide not in Christ shall be abandoned by him. They are withered, as a branch broken off from the tree. Those that abide not in Christ in a little time wither and come to nothing. Those that bear no fruit after a while will bear no leaves. Men gather them. Satan's agents and emissaries pick them up, and make an easy prey of them. They are burned; this follows, of course, but it is here added very emphatically, and makes the threatening very terrible.

(4) The blessed privilege which those have that abide in Christ (v. 7): If my words abide in you, you shall ask what you will and it shall be done. How our union with Christ is maintained: If you abide in me; he had said before, and I in you; here he explains himself, and my words abide in you. It is in the word that we receive and embrace him; and so where the word of Christ dwells richly there Christ dwells. If the word be in us as at home, then we abide in Christ, and he in us. How our communion with Christ is maintained: You shall ask what you will, and it shall be done to you. And what can we desire more than to have what we will for the asking? Those that abide in Christ as their heart's delight shall have, through Christ, their heart's desire. If we abide in Christ, and his word in us, we shall not ask anything but what is proper to be done for us. The promises abiding in us lie ready to be turned into prayers; and the prayers so regulated cannot but speed.

Christ, who is love itself, is here discoursing concerning love, a fourfold love.

I. Concerning the Father's love to him. 1. The Father did love him (v. 9): As the Father hath loved me. He was the Son of his love. And yet God so loved the world as to deliver him up for us all. Those whom God loves as a Father may despise the hatred of all the world. 2. He abode in his Father's love, v. 10. Because he continued to love his Father, he went cheerfully through his sufferings, and therefore his Father continued to love him. 3. Therefore he abode in his Father's love because he kept his Father's law: I have kept my Father's commandments, and so abide in his love. Christ satisfied for us by obeying the law of redemption, and so he abode in his love, and restored us to it.

II. Concerning his own love to his disciples. Though he leaves them, he loves them.

1. The pattern of this love: As the Father has loved me, so have I loved you. As the Father loved him, who was most worthy, he loved them, who were most unworthy. The Father loved him as his Son, and he loves them as his children. The Father was well pleased with him, that he might be well pleased with us in him; and loved him, that in him, as beloved, he might make us accepted.

2. The proofs and products of this love.

(1) Christ loved his disciples, for he laid down his life for them (v. 13): Greater love hath no man than this, to lay down his life for his friend. And this is the love wherewith Christ hath loved us. See the extent of the love of the children of men to one another. The highest proof of it is laying down one's life for a friend, to save his life. It is love in the highest degree, which is strong as death. See the excellency of the love of Christ. He has not only equalled, but exceeded, the most illustrious lovers. Others have thus laid down their lives for their friends, but Christ laid down his for us when we were enemies, Rom. v. 8, 10. Those hearts must be harder than iron or stone which are not softened by such incomparable sweetness of divine love.—Calvin.

(2) Christ loved his disciples, for he took them into a covenant of friendship with himself, v. 14, 15. The followers of Christ are the friends of Christ. Those that do the duty of his servants are admitted and advanced to the dignity of his friends. This honour have all Christ's servants. Christ takes believers to be his friends. Though they often show themselves unfriendly, he is a friend that loves at all times. He will not call them servants. He will call them his friends; he will not only love them, but will let them know it. Though Christ called them his friends, they called themselves his servants: Peter, a servant of Christ (1 Pet. i. 1), and so James, ch. i. 1. The more honour Christ puts upon us, the more honour we should study to do him; the higher in his eyes, the lower in our own.

(3) Christ loved his disciples, for he was very free in communicating his mind to them (v. 15). "All things that I have heard of my Father I have declared unto you." Jesus Christ has faithfully handed to us what he received of the Father, Matt. xi. 27. The great things relating to man's redemption Christ declared to his disciples, that they might declare them to others.

(4) Christ loved his disciples, for he chose and ordained them (v. 16): I have chosen you, and ordained you. His love to them appeared,

[1] In their election to their apostleship: I have chosen you twelve. It did not begin on their side: You have not chosen me, but I first chose you. It is fit that Christ should have the choosing of his own ministers; still he does it. Though ministers make that holy calling their own choice, Christ's choice is prior to theirs and directs and determines it.

[2] In their ordination: I have ordained you; "I have put you into commission." It was a mighty confidence he reposed in them. The treasure of the gospel was committed to them that it might be propagated; that you may go from place to place all the world over, and bring forth fruit. They were ordained, not to sit still, but to go about. They were ordained, not to beat the air, but to be instrumental for the bringing of nations into obedience to Christ. Those whom Christ ordains shall not labour in vain. The church of Christ was not to be a short-lived thing. It did not come up in a night, nor should it perish in a night. As one generation of ministers and Christians has passed away, still another has come. Thus their fruit remains to this day, and shall do while the earth remains.

[3] His love to them appeared in the interest they had at the throne of grace: Whatsoever you shall ask of my Father, in my name, he will give it you. Probably this refers in the first place to the power of working miracles, which was to be drawn out by prayer. "Whatever help from heaven you have occasion for at any time, it is but ask and have." We have a God to go to who is a Father. We come in a good name. Whatever errand we come upon to the throne of grace, we may with a humble boldness mention Christ's name in it. An answer of peace is promised us. What you come for shall be given you.

III. Concerning the disciples' love to Christ. Three things he exhorts them to:

1. To continue in his love, v. 9. "Continue in your love to me, and in mine to you." All that love Christ should continue in their love to him. Continue in my love. Keep up your love to me, and then all the troubles you meet with will be easy. Let not the troubles you meet with for Christ's sake quench your love to Christ, but rather quicken it.

2. To let his joy remain in them, and fill them, v. 11.

(1) That his joy might remain in them. That my joy in you may remain. If they bring forth much fruit, and continue in his love, he will continue to rejoice in them as he had done. Fruitful and faithful disciples are the joy of the Lord Jesus. That my joy, that is, your joy in me, may remain. It is the will of Christ that his disciples should constantly and continually rejoice in him, Phil. iv. 4. The joy of those who abide in Christ's love is a continual feast.

(2) That your joy might be full; not only that you might be full of joy, but that your joy in me and in my love may rise higher and higher, till it come to perfection. Those and those only that have Christ's joy remaining in them have their joy full; worldly joys soon surfeit but never satisfy. The design of Christ in his word is to fill the joy of his people.

3. To evidence their love to him by keeping his commandments: If you keep my commandments, you shall abide in my love, v. 10. The promise: You shall abide in my love as in a dwelling place, at home in Christ's love; as in a resting-place, at ease in Christ's love; as in a stronghold, safe in it. "You shall abide in my love, you shall have grace and strength to persevere in loving me." The condition of the promise: If you keep my commandments. The disciples were to keep Christ's commandments, not only by a constant conformity to them themselves, but by a faithful delivery of them to others; they were to keep them as trustees.

To induce them to keep his commandments, he urges his own example: As I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love. The necessity of it to their interest in him (v. 14): "You are my friends if you do whatsoever I command you." Those only will be accounted Christ's faithful friends that approve themselves his obedient servants. It is universal obedience to Christ that is the only acceptable obedience.

IV. Concerning the disciples' love one to another. We must keep his commandments, and this is his commandment, that we love one another, v. 12, and again, v. 17. No one duty of religion is more frequently inculcated, nor more pathetically urged upon us, by our Lord Jesus, than that of mutual love. It is here recommended by Christ's pattern (v. 12): as I have loved you. We should love one another, as, and because, Christ has loved us. Go you and do likewise. It is required by his precept. Observe how differently it is expressed in these two verses, and both very emphatic. 1. This is my commandment (v. 12), as if this were the most necessary of all the commandments. Christ, foreseeing the addictedness of the Christian church to uncharitableness, has laid most stress upon this precept. 2. These things I command you, v. 17. He speaks as if he were about to give them many things in charge, and yet names this only, that you love one another.

Verses 18–25

Here Christ discourses concerning hatred, which is the character and genius of the devil's kingdom, as love is of the kingdom of Christ.

I. Who they are in whom this hatred is found—the world, the children of this world, as distinguished from the children of God. The calling of these the world intimates, 1. Their number; there were a world of people that opposed Christ and Christianity. I fear, if we should put it to the vote between Christ and Satan, Satan would out-poll us quite. 2. Their confederacy. Jews and Gentiles, that could agree in nothing else, agreed to persecute Christ's ministers. 3. Their spirit and disposition; they are men of the world. The people of God are taught to hate the sins of sinners, yet not their persons, but to love and do good to all men. A malicious, spiteful, envious spirit, is not the spirit of Christ, but of the world.

II. Who they are against whom this hatred is levelled—against the disciples of Christ, against Christ himself, and against the Father.

1. The world hates the disciples of Christ: The world hateth you (v. 19).

(1) Observe how this comes in here. Christ had expressed the great kindness he had for them as friends; but there was given them a thorn in the flesh, reproaches and persecutions for Christ's sake. He had appointed them their work, but tells them what hardships they should meet with in it. He had charged them to love one another, and need enough they had to love one another, for the world would hate them. Those that are in the midst of enemies are concerned to hold together.

(2) Observe what is here included. The world's enmity against the followers of Christ: it hateth them. Whom Christ blesseth the world curseth. The favourites and heirs of heaven have never been the darlings of this world. The fruits of that enmity, v. 20. They will persecute you. It is the common lot of those who will live godly in Christ Jesus to suffer persecution. He sent them forth as sheep in the midst of wolves. Another fruit of their enmity is implied, that they would reject their doctrine. When Christ says, If they have kept my sayings, they will keep yours, he means, They will keep yours, and regard yours, no more than they have regarded and kept mine. The causes of that enmity. The world will hate them,

First, Because they do not belong to it (v. 19): "If you were of the world, of its spirit, the world would love you as its own." We are not to wonder if those that are devoted to the world are caressed by it as its friends. Nor are we to wonder if those that are delivered from the world are maligned by it as its enemies. The reason why Christ's disciples are not of the world is because Christ hath chosen them out of it. This is the reason why the world hates them. The glory which they are designed for sets them above the world, and so makes them the objects of its envy. The grace which they are endued with sets them against the world. They witness against it, and are not conformed to it. This would support them under all the calamities which the world's hatred would bring upon them, that they were hated because they were the chosen ones of the Lord Jesus. This was no just cause for the world's hatred of them. If men hate us for that for which they should love and value us, we have reason to pity them. This was just cause for their own joy. Those hug themselves whom the world hates, but whom Christ loves.

Secondly, Another cause will be because you do belong to Christ (v. 21): For my name's sake. Whatever is pretended, this is the ground of the quarrel, they hate Christ's disciples because they bear his name, and bear up his name in the world. It is the character of Christ's disciples that they stand up for his name. It has commonly been the lot of those that appear for Christ's name to suffer for so doing, to suffer all these things. If you be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are you (1 Pet. iv. 14). If we suffer with Christ, and for Christ, we shall reign with him.

Thirdly. It is the world's ignorance that is the true cause of its enmity to the disciples of Christ (v. 21): Because they know not him that sent me. They know not God. They know not God as him that sent our Lord Jesus. We do not rightly know God if we do not know him in Christ.

2. The world hates Christ himself. And this is spoken of here for two ends:

(1) To mitigate the trouble of his followers, arising from the world's hatred (v. 18): You know that it hated me before you. We read it as signifying priority of time. But it may be read as expressing his superiority over them: "You know that it hated me, your first, your chief and captain." If Christ was hated, can we expect that any virtue or merit of ours should screen us from malice. If our Master, the founder of our religion, met with so much opposition in the planting of it, his servants and followers can look for no other in propagating and professing it. For this he refers them (v. 20) to his own word: Remember the word that I said unto you. A plain truth: The servant is not greater than his Lord. The servant is inferior to his lord. The plainest truths are sometimes the strongest arguments for the hardest duties. A proper inference drawn from it: "If they have persecuted me they will also persecute you; you may expect it, for," [1] "You will do the same that I have done to provoke them; you will reprove them for their sins, and give them strict rules of holy living, which they will not bear." [2] "You cannot do more than I have done to oblige them. Let none wonder if they suffer ill for doing well. If they have kept my sayings, they will keep yours also; as there have been a few that have been wrought upon by my preaching, so there will be by yours a few."

(2) To aggravate the wickedness of this unbelieving world, and to discover its exceeding sinfulness. The world is generally in an ill name in scripture, and nothing can put it into a worse name than this, that it hated Jesus Christ. Two things he insists upon to aggravate the wickedness of those that hated him:

[1] That there was the greatest reason imaginable why they should love him.

First, His words were such as merited their love (v. 22): "If I had not spoken unto them they had not had sin. But now they have no pretence, no excuse for their sin." The advantage which those have that enjoy the gospel; Christ in it comes and speaks to them; he spoke in person to the men of that generation, and is still speaking to us. Every word of his carries with it a condescending tenderness, able, one would think, to charm the deafest adder. The excuse which those have that enjoy not the gospel: "If I had not spoken to them they had not had sin." Not this kind of sin. They had not been chargeable with a contempt of Christ. As sin is not imputed where there is no law, so unbelief is not imputed where there is no gospel. Not such a degree of sin. If they had not had the gospel among them, their other sins had not been so bad. The aggravated guilt which those lie under to whom Christ has come and spoken in vain. They have no cloak for their sin; they are altogether inexcusable. The word of Christ strips sin of its cloak, that it may appear sin.

Secondly, His works were such as merited their love (v. 24): "If I had not done among them such works as no other man ever did, they had not had sin; their unbelief and enmity had been excusable." But he produced satisfactory proofs of his divine mission, works which no other man did. His miracles, his mercies, works of wonder and works of grace, prove him sent of God, and sent on a kind errand. Christ's works were such as no man ever did. No common person that had not a commission from heaven, and God with him, could work miracles, ch. iii. 2. They were all good works, works of mercy. One that was so universally useful should have been universally beloved, and yet even he is hated. The works of Christ enhance the guilt of sinners' enmity to him. If they had only heard his words, and not seen his works, unbelief might have pleaded want of proof. They saw Christ to be studious to do them a kindness; yet they hated him. And we see in his word that great love wherewith he loved us, and yet are not wrought upon by it.

[2] That there was no reason at all why they should hate him (v. 25): "This comes to pass that the word might be fulfilled which is written in their law, They hated me without a cause." Those that hate Christ hate him without any just cause; enmity to Christ is unreasonable enmity. Christ was the greatest blessing imaginable to his country, and yet was hated. He testified indeed that their works were evil, with a design to make them good, but to hate him for this cause was to hate him without cause. Herein the scripture was fulfilled. Those that hated Christ did not design therein to fulfil the scripture; but God, in permitting it, confirms our faith in Christ as the Messiah that even this was foretold concerning him, and, being foretold, was accomplished in him. And we must not think it strange or hard if it have a further accomplishment in us.

3. In Christ the world hates God himself; this is twice said here (v. 23): He that hateth me hates my Father also. And again, v. 24, They have seen and hated both me and my Father. There are those that hate God. Those who cannot bring themselves to deny that there is a God, and yet wish there were none, they see and hate him. Hatred of Christ will be adjudged hatred of God. What entertainment the Son has, that the Father has. Let an unbelieving world know that their enmity to the gospel of Christ will be looked upon as an enmity to the blessed God himself; and let all that suffer for righteousness' sake take comfort from this; if God himself be hated in them, they need not be either ashamed of their cause or afraid of the issue.

Verses 26–27

Christ having spoken of the great opposition which his gospel was likely to meet with here intimates what effectual provision was made for supporting it, both by the principal testimony of the Spirit (v. 26), and the subordinate testimony of the apostles (v. 27).

I. It is here promised that the blessed Spirit shall maintain the cause of Christ in the world. "When the Comforter is come, who proceedeth from the Father, and whom I will send, he shall testify of me." We have more in this verse concerning the Holy Ghost than in any one verse besides in the Bible.

1. Here is an account of him. In his essence He is the Spirit of truth, who proceedeth from the Father. He is spoken of as a distinct person; as a divine person, that proceedeth from the Father. The spirit or breath of man, called the breath of life, proceeds from the man, and by it invigorated he sometimes exerts his strength to blow out what he would extinguish, and blow up what he would excite. Thus the blessed Spirit is the emanation of divine light, and the energy of divine power.

2. In his mission. He will come in a more plentiful effusion of his gifts, graces, and powers, than had ever yet been. I will send him to you from the Father. He had said (ch. xiv. 16), I will pray the Father, and he shall send you the Comforter. Here he says, I will send him. The Spirit was sent, (1) By Christ as Mediator, now ascended on high to give gifts unto men. (2) From the Father: "Not only from heaven, my Father's house, but according to my Father's will and appointment." (3) To the apostles to instruct them in their preaching.

3. In his office and operations, which are two: One implied in the title given to him; he is the Comforter, or Advocate. An advocate for Christ, to maintain his cause against the world's infidelity, a comforter to the saints against the world's hatred. Another expressed: He shall testify of me. He is not only an advocate, but a witness for Jesus Christ. The power of the ministry is derived from the Spirit, for he qualifies ministers; and the power of Christianity too, for he sanctifies Christians, and in both testifies of Christ.

II. It is here promised that the apostles also should have the honour of being Christ's witnesses (v. 27): And you also shall bear witness of me.

1. The apostles were appointed to be witnesses for Christ in the world. When he had said, The Spirit shall testify, he adds, And you also shall bear witness. The Spirit's working is not to supersede, but to engage and encourage ours. Though the Spirit testify, ministers also must bear their testimony. The work cut out for them; they were to attest the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, concerning Christ. Though Christ's disciples fled upon his trial before the high priest and Pilate, yet after the Spirit was poured out upon them they appeared courageous in vindication of the cause of Christ. The truth of the Christian religion was to be proved very much by the evidence of matter of fact, especially Christ's resurrection, of which the apostles were in a particular manner chosen witnesses (Acts x. 41). Christ's ministers are his witnesses. The honour put upon them hereby—that they should be workers together with God. "The Spirit shall testify of me, and you also shall bear witness.". This might encourage them against the hatred and contempt of the world, that Christ had honoured them.

2. They were qualified to be so: You have been with me from the beginning. They not only heard his public sermons, but had constant private converse with him. Others saw the wonderful and merciful works that he did in their own town and country only, those that went about with him were witnesses of them all. Those are best able to bear witness for Christ that have themselves been with him, by faith, hope, and love. Ministers must first learn Christ, and then preach him. Those speak best of the things of God that speak experimentally. It is particularly a great advantage to have been acquainted with Christ from the beginning. To have been with him from the beginning of our days. An early acquaintance and constant converse with the gospel of Christ will make a man like a good householder.

CHAP. XVI

I. Here are wounding words in the notice he gives them of the troubles that were before them, ver. 1–6. II. Here are healing words in the comforts he administers to them for their support, which are five: 1. That he would send them the Comforter, ver. 7–15. 2. That he would visit them again at his resurrection, ver. 16–22. 3. That he would secure to them an answer of peace to all their prayers, ver. 23–27. 4. That he was now but returning to his Father, ver. 28–32. 5. That, whatever troubles they might meet with they should be sure of peace in him, ver. 33.

Verses 1–6

Christ dealt faithfully with his disciples when he sent them forth. He told them the worst, that they might sit down and count the cost.

I. He gives them a reason why he alarmed them thus: These things have I spoken unto you, that you should not be offended, v. 1. The disciples of Christ are apt to be offended at the cross; and the offence of the cross is a dangerous temptation, even to good men, to turn back from the ways of God. Our Lord Jesus, by giving us notice of trouble, designed to take off the terror of it, that it might not be a surprise to us. We can easily welcome a guest we expect, and being forewarned are forearmed.

II. He foretells particularly what they should suffer (v. 2): "Those that have power to do it shall put you out of their synagogues; they shall kill you." Behold two swords drawn against the followers of the Lord Jesus.

1. The sword of ecclesiastical censure. They shall cast you out of their synagogues. At first, they scourged them in their synagogues as contemners of the law (Matt. x. 17), and at length cast them out as incorrigible. "They shall cast you out of the congregation of Israel, put you into the condition of an outlaw," to be knocked on the head, like another wolf. Many a good truth has been branded with an anathema.

2. The sword of civil power. When you are expelled as heretics, they will kill you, and think they do God service. You will find them really cruel: They will kill you. The twelve apostles (we are told) were all put to death, except John. You will find them seemingly conscientious; they will think they do God service. It is possible for those that are real enemies to God's service to pretend a mighty zeal for it. The devil's work has many a time been done in God's livery. It is common to patronise an enmity to religion with a colour of duty to God. God's people have suffered the greatest hardships from conscientious persecutors. This does not at all lessen the sin of the persecutors, but it does enhance the sufferings of the persecuted, to die under the character of being enemies to God.

III. He gives them the true reason of the world's enmity and rage against them (v. 3): "These things will they do unto you, because they have not known the Father, nor me." Many that pretend to know God are wretchedly ignorant of him. Those that are ignorant of Christ cannot have any right knowledge of God. Those are very ignorant indeed of God and Christ that think it an acceptable piece of service to persecute good people.

IV. He tells them why he gave them notice of this now, and why not sooner. Why he told them of it now (v. 4), not to discourage them, but that, "when the time shall come you may remember that I told you." When suffering times come it will be of use to us to remember what Christ has told us of sufferings. The trouble may be the less grievous, for we were told of it before. So that it ought not to be a surprise to us. Why he did not tell them of it sooner: "I spoke not this to you from the beginning because I was with you. While he was with them, he bore the shock of the world's malice, and stood in the front of the battle. But we do find that from the beginning he bade them prepare for sufferings.

V. He expresses a very affectionate concern for the present sadness of his disciples (v. 5, 6): "Now I go my way to him that sent me; and none of you asketh me, Whither goest thou? But, instead of enquiring after that which would comfort you, you pore upon that which looks melancholy."

1. He had told them that he was about to leave them: Now I go my way. He was not driven away by force, but voluntarily departed. He went to him that sent him, to give an account of his negotiation.

2. He had told them what hard things they must suffer when he was gone. They would be tempted to think they had made a sorry bargain of it. Their Master sympathizes with them, yet blames them, (1) They were careless of the means of comfort: None of you asks me, Whither goest thou? Peter had started this question (ch. xiii. 36), and Thomas had seconded it (ch. xiv. 5), but they did not pursue it. See what a compassionate teacher Christ is. Many a teacher will not endure that the learner should ask the same question twice; if he cannot take a thing quickly, let him go without it; but our Lord Jesus knows how to deal with babes, that must be taught with precept upon precept. Enquiry into the design and tendency of the darkest dispensations of Providence would help to reconcile us to them. It will silence us to ask, Whence come they? but will abundantly satisfy us to ask, Whither go they? for we know they work for good, Rom. viii. 28.

(2) They were too intent upon the occasions of their grief: Sorrow has filled their hearts. By looking at that only which made against them, and overlooking that which made for them, they were so full of sorrow that there was no room left for joy. It is the common fault and folly of melancholy Christians to dwell only upon the dark side of the cloud. That which filled the disciples' hearts with sorrow was too great an affection to this present life. They were big with hopes of their Master's external kingdom and glory. Nothing is a greater prejudice to our joy in God than the love of the world; and the sorrow of the world, the consequence of it.

Verses 7–15

Three things we have here concerning the Comforter's coming:

I. Christ's departure was absolutely necessary to the Comforter's coming, v. 7. Christ saw cause to assert it with a more than ordinary solemnity: I tell you the truth.

1. It is expedient, not only for me, but for you also, that I go away. Our Lord Jesus is always for that which is most expedient for us, and gives us the physic we are loth to take, because he knows it is good for us.

2. It was therefore expedient because it was in order to the sending of the Spirit.

(1) Christ's going was in order to the Comforter's coming. If I go not away, the Comforter will not come. He that gives freely may recall one gift before he bestows another, while we would fondly hold all. The sending of the Spirit was to be the fruit of Christ's purchase, and that purchase was to be made by his death. It was to be an answer to his intercession within the veil. See ch. xiv. 16. Thus must this gift be both paid for, and prayed for, by our Lord Jesus. The disciples must be weaned from his bodily presence before they were duly prepared to receive the spiritual aids and comforts of a new dispensation. If I depart I will send him to you. Though he departs, he sends the Comforter; nay, he departs on purpose to send him.

(2) The presence of Christ's Spirit in his church is so much more desirable than his bodily presence, that it was really expedient for us that he should go away. His corporal presence could be but in one place at one time, but his Spirit is wherever two or three are gathered in his name. Christ's bodily presence draws men's eyes, his Spirit draws their hearts.

II. The coming of the Spirit was absolutely necessary to the carrying on of Christ's interests on earth (v. 8): And when he is come he will reprove, or, he will convince the world, concerning sin, righteousness, and judgment.

1. See here on what errand he is sent. To reprove. The Spirit, by the word and conscience, is a reprover. To convince. It is a law-term, and speaks the office of the judge in summing up the evidence. He shall convince, that is, "He shall put to silence the adversaries of Christ and his cause." Convincing work is the Spirit's work; man may open the cause, but it is the Spirit only that can open the heart. The Spirit is called the Comforter (v. 7), and here it is said, He shall convince. One could think this were cold comfort, but it is the method the Spirit takes, first to convince, and then to comfort; first to lay open the wound, and then to apply healing medicines.

2. See who they are whom he is to reprove and convince: The world. He shall give the world the most powerful means of conviction, the gospel, fully proved. He shall sufficiently provide for the silencing of the objections and prejudices of the world against the gospel. He shall savingly convince many in the world, some in every age, in every place. Even this malignant world the Spirit shall work upon; and the conviction of sinners is the comfort of faithful ministers.

3. See what the Spirit shall convince the world of.

(1) Of sin (v. 9), because they believe not on me. The Spirit is sent to convince sinners of sin, not barely to tell them of it; in conviction there is more than this; it is to prove it upon them, and force them to own it. The Spirit convinces of the fact of sin, of the fault of sin, of the folly of sin, of the filth of sin, and, lastly, of the fruit of sin, that the end thereof is death. The Spirit, in conviction, fastens especially upon the sin of unbelief, their not believing in Christ, First, As the great reigning sin. There was, and is, a world of people, that believe not in Jesus Christ, and they are not sensible that it is their sin. Those transgress who, when God speaketh to us by his Son, refuse him that speaketh. Secondly, As the great ruining sin. Every sin is so in its own nature. It is a sin against the remedy. Thirdly, As that which is at the bottom of all sin. The Spirit shall convince the world that the true reason why sin reigns among them is because they are not by faith united to Christ.

(2) Of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and you see me no more, v. 10. We may understand this, [1] Of Christ's personal righteousness. He shall convince the world that Jesus of Nazareth was Christ the righteous, as the centurion owned (Luke xxiii. 47), Certainly this was a righteous man. Now by what medium or argument will the Spirit convince men of the sincerity of the Lord Jesus? Their seeing him no more will contribute something towards the removal of their prejudices. His going to the Father would be a full conviction of it. The coming of the Spirit, according to the promise, was a proof of Christ's exaltation to God's right hand (Acts ii. 33), and this was a demonstration of his righteousness. [2] Of Christ's righteousness communicated to us for our justification and salvation. The Spirit shall convince men of this righteousness. Having shown them their need of a righteousness, lest this should drive them to despair he will show them where it is to be had. It was hard to convince those of this righteousness that went about to establish their own, but the Spirit will do it. Christ's ascension is the great argument proper to convince men of this righteousness: I go to the Father, and you shall see me no more. Now that we are sure he is at the right hand of God we are sure of being justified through him.

(3) Of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged, v. 11. The devil, the prince of this world, was judged, was discovered to be a great deceiver and destroyer. He was cast out of the souls of people by the grace of God working with the gospel of Christ. The Spirit convinces the world of judgment. By the judgment of the prince of this world, it appears that Christ is stronger than Satan. He shall show that Christ's errand into the world was to set things to right in it. All will be well when his power is broken who made all the mischief. If Satan be thus subdued by Christ, we may be sure no other power can stand before him.

III. The coming of the Spirit would be of unspeakable advantage to the disciples themselves. The Spirit has work to do, not only on the enemies of Christ, but upon his servants and agents, and therefore it was expedient for them that he should go away.

1. The tender sense he had of their present weakness (v. 12): I have yet many things to say unto you, but you cannot bear them now. See what a teacher Christ is. None like him for copiousness. Treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid in him. None like him for compassion: he would have told them more of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, but they could not bear it, it would have confounded and stumbled them, rather than have given them any satisfaction.

2. He assures them of sufficient assistances. "But when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, all will be well." He shall undertake to guide the apostles, and glorify Christ.

(1) To guide the apostles. That they do not miss their way: He will guide you. The Spirit is given us to be our guide, to go along with us. That they do not come short of their end: He will guide them into all truth, as the skilful pilot guides the ship into the port it is bound for. To be led into a truth is more than barely to know it; it is to be intimately and experimentally acquainted with it. It denotes a gradual discovery of truth shining more and more. But how into all truth? Into the whole truth relating to their embassy; whatever was needful or useful for them to know; what truths they were to teach others the Spirit would teach them. Into nothing but the truth. All that he shall guide you into shall be truth. [1] "The Spirit shall teach nothing but the truth, for he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, that, and that only, shall he speak." The testimony of the Spirit, in the word and by the apostles, is what we may rely upon. We may venture our souls upon the Spirit's word. The testimony of the Spirit always concurs with the word of Christ, for he does not speak of himself. Men's word and spirit often disagree, but the eternal Word and the eternal Spirit never do. [2] "He shall teach you all truth, for he will show you things to come." The Spirit was in the apostles a Spirit of prophecy. This was a great satisfaction to their own minds, and of use to them in their conduct. We should not grudge that the Spirit does not now show us things to come in this world, let it suffice that the Spirit in the word hath shown us things to come in the other world, which are our chief concern.

(2) The Spirit undertook to glorify Christ, v. 14, 15. Even the sending of the Spirit was the glorifying of Christ. It was the honour of the Redeemer that the Spirit was both sent in his name and sent on his errand, to carry on and perfect his undertaking. All the gifts and graces of the Spirit, all the preaching and all the writing of the apostles, the tongues, and miracles, were to glorify Christ. The Spirit glorified Christ by leading his followers into the truth as it is in Jesus. First, The Spirit should communicate the things of Christ to them: He shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you. All that the Spirit shows us, all that he gives us for our strength and quickening, did all belong to Christ, and was had from him. The Spirit came not to erect a new kingdom, but to advance and establish the same kingdom that Christ had erected. Secondly, Herein the things of God should be communicated to us. All things that the Father hath are mine. All that grace and truth which God designed to show to us he lodged in the hands of the Lord Jesus. Spiritual blessings in heavenly things are given by the Father to the Son for us, and the Son entrusts the Spirit to convey them to us.

Verses 16–22

I. Observe the intimation he gave them of the comfort he designed them, v. 16.

1. That they should now shortly lose the sight of him: A little while, and you shall not see me; and therefore, if they had any good question to ask him, they must ask quickly. It is good to consider how near to a period our seasons of grace are, that we may be quickened to improve them. They lost the sight of Christ at his death. The most that death does to our Christian friends is to take them out of our sight, only out of sight, and then not out of mind. At his ascension, when he withdrew from them, out of their sight; a cloud received him, and they saw him no more.

2. That yet they should speedily recover the sight of him: Again a little while, and you shall see me. His farewell was not a final farewell. (1) At his resurrection, soon after his death, when he showed himself alive, by many infallible proofs. (2) By the pouring out of the Spirit, soon after his ascension. The Spirit's coming was Christ's visit to his disciples, not a transient but a permanent one. (3) At his second coming.

3. He assigns the reason: "Because I go to the Father." This refers rather to his going away at death, and return at his resurrection, than his going away at his ascension, and his return at the end of time; for it was his death that was their grief, not his ascension. Thus we may say of our ministers and Christian friends, Yet a little while, and we shall not see them. It is certain that we must part shortly, and yet not part for ever. It is but a good night to those whom we hope to see with joy in the morning.

II. The perplexity of the disciples. They were at a loss what to make of it (v. 17, 18): Some of them said among themselves, What is this that he saith to us? Though Christ had often spoken to this purport before, yet still they were in the dark. 1. The disciples' weakness, in that they could not understand so plain a saying. Having told them so often in plain terms that he should be killed, and the third day rise again; yet, say they, We cannot tell what he saith. Sorrow had filled their heart, and made them unapt to receive the impressions of comfort. Mistakes cause griefs, and then griefs confirm mistakes. The notion of Christ's secular kingdom was so deeply rooted in them. When we think the scripture must be made to agree with the false ideas we have imbibed, no wonder that we complain of its difficulty; but, when our reasonings are captivated to revelation, the matter becomes easy It should seem, that which puzzled them was the little while. They could not conceive how he should leave them quickly. Thus it is hard for us to represent to ourselves that change as near which yet we know will come certainly, and may come suddenly. 2. Their willingness to be instructed. When they were at a loss about the meaning of Christ's words, they conferred together upon it. By mutual converse about divine things we both borrow the light of others and improve our own. We must revolve what we cannot explain, and wait till God shall reveal even this unto us.

III. The further explication of what Christ had said.

1. See here why Christ explained it (v. 19); because he knew they were desirous to ask him. The knots we cannot untie we must bring to him. Christ knew they were desirous to ask him, but were bashful and ashamed to ask. Christ instructed those who he knew were desirous to ask him, though they did not ask. Who they are that Christ will teach. The humble, that confess their ignorance. The diligent, that use the means they have: "Do you enquire? You shall be taught."

2. See here how he explained it. He explains it by their sorrowing and rejoicing, because we commonly measure things according as they affect us (v. 20): You shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice and you shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow will be turned into joy. Believers have joy or sorrow according as they have or have not a sight of Christ.

(1) What Christ says here, and v. 21, 22, of their sorrow and joy, is primarily to be understood of the present state of the disciples. Their grief foretold: You shall weep and lament, and you shall be sorrowful. They wept for him because they loved him; the pain of our friend is a pain to ourselves. They wept for themselves, and their own loss. Christ has given notice to his disciples beforehand to expect sorrow, that they may treasure up comforts accordingly. The world's rejoicing: But the world shall rejoice. That which is the grief of saints is the joy of sinners. Those that are strangers to Christ will continue in their carnal mirth. Those that are enemies to Christ will rejoice because they hope they have conquered him. Let it be no surprise to us if we see others triumphing, when we are trembling for the ark. The return of joy. But your sorrow shall be turned into joy. The sorrow of the true Christian, is but for a moment. The disciples were glad when they saw the Lord. His resurrection was life from the dead to them, and their sorrow for Christ's sufferings was turned into joy. They were sorrowful, and yet always rejoicing (2 Cor. vi. 10), had sorrowful lives and yet joyful hearts.

(2) It is applicable to all the faithful followers of the Lamb.

[1] Their condition and disposition are both mournful. Those that are acquainted with Christ must, as he was, be acquainted with grief. They mourn with sufferers that mourn, and mourn for sinners that mourn not for themselves.

[2] The world, at the same time, goes away with all the mirth. Mirth and pleasures are surely none of the best things, for then the worst men would not have so large a share of them, and the favourites of heaven be such strangers to them.

[3] Spiritual mourning will shortly be turned into eternal rejoicing. Their sorrow will not only be followed with joy, but turned into it. It is the will of Christ that his people should be a comforted people.

First, Here is the parable itself (v. 21): A woman, when she is in travail, hath sorrow because her hour is come, but as soon as she is delivered of the child she remembers no more the anguish, for joy that a man is born into the world. The fruit of the curse according to the sentence (Gen. iii. 16), In sorrow shalt thou bring forth. See what this world is; all its roses are surrounded with thorns. This comes of sin. The fruit of the blessing, in the joy there is for a child born into the world. The fruit of a blessing is matter of joy; the birth of a living child is the parents' joy. Though children are certain cares, uncertain comforts, and often prove the greatest crosses, yet it is natural to us to rejoice at their birth. Now this is very proper to set forth, (a) The sorrows of Christ's disciples in this world; they are sure and sharp, but not to last long, and in order to a joyful product. (b) Their joys after these sorrows, which will wipe away all tears. When they reap the fruit of all their services and sorrows, the toil and anguish of this world will be no more remembered.

Secondly, The application of the similitude (v. 22): "You now have sorrow, but I will see you again."

a. Here again he tells them of their sorrow: "You now therefore have sorrow; therefore, because I am leaving you." Christ's withdrawings are just cause of grief to his disciples. When the sun sets, the sunflower will hang the head.

b. He, more largely than before, assures them of a return of joy. Three things recommend the joy: The cause of it: "I will see you again." Christ will graciously return to those that wait for him. Men, when they are exalted, will scarcely look upon their inferiors; but the exalted Jesus will visit his disciples. Christ's returns are returns of joy to all his disciples. The cordiality of it: Your heart shall rejoice. Joy in the heart is solid, and not flashy; it is secret, it is sweet, it is sure, and not easily broken in upon. The continuance of it: Your joy no man taketh from you. They would if they could; but they shall not prevail. Some understand it of the eternal joy of those that are glorified. Our joys on earth we are liable to be robbed of by a thousand accidents, but heavenly joys are everlasting. I rather understand it of the spiritual joys of those that are sanctified. They could not rob them of their joy, because they could not separate them from the love of Christ, could not rob them of their God, nor of their treasure in heaven.

Verses 23–27

An answer to their askings is here promised. Now there are two ways of asking: asking by way of enquiry, which is the asking of the ignorant; and asking by way of request, which is the asking of the indigent. Christ here speaks of both.

1. By way of enquiry, they should not need to ask (v. 23): "In that day you shall ask me nothing. You shall not need to enquire." In the story of the apostles' Acts we seldom find them asking questions, for they were constantly under a divine guidance. Asking questions supposes us at a loss, or at least at a stand, and the best of us have need to ask questions.

Now for this he gives a reason (v. 25): "These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs, but the time cometh when I shall show you plainly of the Father, so that you shall not need to ask questions."

1. The great thing Christ would lead them into was the knowledge of God: "I will show you the Father." When Christ would express the greatest favour intended for his disciples, he tells them that he would show them plainly of the Father; for what is the happiness of heaven, but immediately and everlastingly to see God?

2. Of this he had hitherto spoken to them in proverbs. Christ had expounded his parables privately to the disciples. (1) Considering their dullness, and unaptness to receive what he said to them, he might be said to speak in proverbs; what he said to them was as a book sealed. (2) Comparing the discoveries he had made to them with what he would make to them, all hitherto had been but proverbs. (3) Confining it to what he had said of the Father, what he had said was very dark, compared with what was shortly to be revealed.

3. He would speak to them plainly of the Father. When the Spirit was poured out, the apostles attained to a much greater knowledge of divine things than they had before. But this promise will have its full accomplishment in heaven, where we shall see the Father as he is. While we are here, we have many questions to ask, but in that day we shall see all things clearly, and ask no more questions.

II. He promises that by way of request they should ask nothing in vain. It is taken for granted that all Christ's disciples give themselves to prayer. Their instruction, direction, strength, and success, must be fetched in by prayer.

1. Here is an express promise of a grant, v. 23. The preface to this promise leaves no room to question it: "Verily, verily, I say unto you." The golden sceptre is here held out to us, with this word, What is thy petition, and it shall be granted? For he says, Whatsoever you shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it to you. What would we more? The promise is as express as we can desire. (1) We are here taught how to seek; we must ask the Father in Christ's name. Asking of the Father includes a sense of spiritual wants and a desire of spiritual blessings, with a conviction that they are to be had from God only. Asking in Christ's name includes an acknowledgment of our own unworthiness, and an entire dependence upon Christ. (2) We are here told how we shall speed: He will give it to you. What more can we wish for? Christ had promised them great illumination by the Spirit, but they must pray for it. They must continue praying. Perfect fruition is reserved for the land of our rest; asking and receiving are the comfort of the land of our pilgrimage.

2. Here is an invitation for them to petition. Great men permit addresses, but Christ calls upon us to petition, v. 24.

(1) He looks back upon their practice hitherto: Hitherto have you asked nothing in my name. This refers either, [1] To the matter of their prayers: "You have asked nothing comparatively, nothing to what you might have asked." See what a generous benefactor our Lord Jesus is; he gives liberally, and is so far from upbraiding us with the frequency and largeness of his gifts that he rather upbraids us with the seldomness and straitness of our requests. Or, [2] To the name in which they prayed. They prayed many a prayer, but never so expressly in the name of Christ as now he was directing them to do; for he had not as yet offered up that great sacrifice in the virtue of which our prayers were to be accepted, the incense whereof was to perfume all our devotions.

(2) He looks forward to their practice for the future: Ask, and you shall receive, that your joy may be full. He directs them to ask for all that which they needed and he had promised. He assures them that they shall receive. What we ask from a principle of grace God will graciously give, that hereby their joy shall be full. This denotes, First, The blessed effect of the prayer of faith; it helps to fill up the joy of faith. When we are told to rejoice evermore, it follows immediately, Pray without ceasing. See how high we are to aim in prayer—not only at peace, but joy. Or, Secondly, The blessed effects of the answer of peace: "Ask, and you shall receive that which will fill your joy."

3. Here are the grounds upon which they might hope to speed (v. 26, 27), which are summed up in short by the apostle (1 John ii. 1): "We have an advocate with the Father."

(1) We have an advocate: "I say not unto you that I will pray the Father for you." He speaks as if they needed not any further favours, when he had prevailed for the gift of the Holy Ghost to make intercession within them; as if they had no further need of him to pray for them now; but we shall find that he does more for us than he says he will.

(2) We have to do with a Father: For the Father himself loveth you. The disciples of Christ are the beloved of God himself. Observe what an emphasis is laid upon this: "The Father himself loveth you." The Father himself, whose favour you have forfeited, and with whom you need an advocate, he himself now loves you. Why the Father loved the disciples of Christ: Because you have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God, that is, because you are my disciples indeed. The character of Christ's disciples; they love him, because they believe he came out from God. Faith in Christ works by love to him. If we believe him to be our Saviour, we cannot but love him as the most kind to us. Observe with what respect Christ is pleased to speak of his disciples' love to him; he speaks of it as that which recommended them to his Father's favour. What advantage Christ's faithful disciples have, the Father loves them, and that because they love Christ. What encouragement this gave them in prayer. They need not fear speeding when they came to one that loved them. This cautions us against hard thoughts of God. When we are taught in prayer to plead Christ's merit and intercession, it is not as if all the kindness were in Christ only. We owe Christ's merit to God's mercy in giving him for us. Let it cherish and confirm in us good thoughts of God. Believers, that love Christ, ought to know that God loves them.

Verses 28–33

Two things Christ here comforts his disciples with:

I. With an assurance that, though he was leaving the world, he was returning to his Father, v. 28–32.

1. A plain declaration of Christ's mission from the Father, and his return to him (v. 28): I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world. Again, I leave the world and go to the Father. This is the conclusion of the whole matter.

(1) These two great truths are here, [1] Contracted. Brief summaries of Christian doctrine are of great use to young beginners. The principles of the oracles of God brought into a little compass in creeds and catechisms have, like the beams of the sun contracted in a burning glass, conveyed divine light and heat with a wonderful power. [2] Compared. There is an admirable harmony in divine truths; they both corroborate and illustrate one another; Christ's coming and his going do so. Christ had commended his disciples for believing that he came forth from God (v. 27), and thence infers the necessity of his returning to God again. The due improvement of what we know and own would help us into the understanding of that which seems difficult and doubtful.

(2) If we ask concerning the Redeemer whence he came, and whither he went, we are told, [1] That he came from the Father, and he came into this world, this world of mankind. Here his business lay, and hither he came to attend it. He left his home for this strange country; his palace for this cottage. [2] That, when he had done his work on earth, he left the world, and went back to his Father. That still he is spiritually present with his church, and will be to the end.

2. The disciples' satisfaction in this declaration (v. 29, 30): Lo, now speakest thou plainly. It should seem, this one word of Christ did them more good than all the rest. Two things they improved in.

(1) In knowledge: Lo, now speakest thou plainly. Divine truths are most likely to do good when they are spoken plainly. When Christ is pleased to speak plainly to our souls we have reason to rejoice in it.

(2) In faith: Now are we sure.

[1] What was the matter of their faith: We believe that thou camest forth from God. He had said (v. 27) that they did believe this; "Lord" (say they) "we do believe it."

[2] What was the motive of their faith—his omniscience. This proved him a teacher come from God, and more than a prophet, that he knew all things. Those know Christ best that know him by experience, that can say of his power, It works in me; of his love, He loved me. This confirmed the faith of the disciples here. And needest not that any man should ask thee. Christ's aptness to teach. He prevents us with his instructions and needs not to be importuned. His ability to teach. The best of teachers can only answer what is spoken, but Christ can answer what is thought.

3. The gentle rebuke Christ gave the disciples, v. 31, 32. Observing how they triumphed in their attainments, he said, "Do you now believe? Alas! you know not your own weakness; you will very shortly be scattered every man to his own," &c.

(1) A question, designed to put them upon consideration: Do you now believe? "If now, why not sooner?" Those who are at last persuaded to believe have reason to be ashamed that they stood it out so long. "If now, why not ever? When an hour of temptation comes, where will your faith be then?"

(2) A prediction of their fall. In a little time they would all desert him, which was fulfilled that very night. They were scattered from one another; they shifted everyone for his own safety. Scattered from him: You shall leave me alone. They should have been witnesses for him upon his trial, but they were ashamed of his chain, and afraid of sharing with him in his sufferings, and left him alone. Many a good cause, when it is distressed by its enemies, is deserted by its friends. Those that are tried, do not always prove trusty. If we at any time find our friends unkind to us, let us remember that Christ's were so to him. When they left him alone, they were scattered every man to his own. Everyone went his own way, where he fancied he should be most safe. Christ knew before that his disciples would thus desert him in the critical moment, and yet he was still tender of them. We are ready to say of some, "If we could have foreseen their ingratitude, we would not have been so prodigal of our favours to them"; Christ did foresee theirs, and yet was kind to them. He told them of it: "Do you now believe? Be not high-minded, but fear." Even when we are taking the comfort of our graces, it is good to be reminded of our danger from our corruptions. When our faith is strong, our love flaming, and our evidences are clear, yet we cannot infer thence that tomorrow shall be as this day. Even when we have most reason to think we stand, yet we have reason enough to take heed lest we fall. He spoke of it as a thing very near. The hour was already come when they would be as shy of him as ever they had been fond of him.

(3) An assurance of his own comfort notwithstanding: Yet I am not alone. The Father is with me. We may consider this as a privilege peculiar to the Lord Jesus. The divine nature did not desert the human nature, but supported it. Even when he complained of his Father's forsaking him, yet he called him My God, and was so well assured of his favourable presence with him as to commit his Spirit into his hand. This he had comforted himself with all along (ch. viii. 29), He that sent me is with me, the Father hath not left me alone. As a privilege common to all believers. When they are alone, they are not alone, but the Father is with them. When solitude is their choice—Nathaniel under the fig-tree,

Peter upon the house-top, meditating and praying—the Father is with them. Those that converse with God in solitude are never less alone than when alone. A good God and a good heart are good company at any time. When solitude is their affliction, they are not so much alone as they are thought to be, the Father is with them. While we have God's favourable presence with us, we are happy, though all the world forsake us.

II. He comforts them with a promise of peace in him, by virtue of his victory over the world, whatever troubles they might meet with in it (v. 33): "These things have I spoken, that in me you might have peace; for in the world you shall have tribulation. I have overcome the world."

1. The end Christ aimed at: That in him they might have peace. His departure from them was really for the best. It is the will of Christ that his disciples should have peace within, whatever their troubles may be without. Peace in Christ is the only true peace. Through him we have peace with God, and so in him we have peace in our own minds. The word of Christ aims at this, that in him we may have peace.

2. The entertainment they were likely to meet with in the world. It has been the lot of Christ's disciples to have more or less tribulation in this world. Men persecute them because they are so good, and God corrects them because they are no better. So between both they shall have tribulation.

3. The encouragement Christ gives them: "But be of good cheer, have a good heart on it, all shall be well." In the midst of the tribulations of this world it is the duty and interest of Christ's disciples to be of good cheer; as sorrowful indeed, in compliance with the temper of the climate, and yet always rejoicing, always cheerful, even in tribulation, Rom. v. 3.

4. The ground of that encouragement: I have overcome the world. Christ's victory is a Christian triumph. When he sends his disciples to preach the gospel to all the world, "Be of good cheer," says he, "I have overcome the world." He overcame the evil things of the world by submitting to them; he endured the cross, despising it and the shame of it; and he overcame the good things of it by being wholly dead to them. Never was there such a conqueror of the world as Christ was, and we ought to be encouraged by it. Christ has overcome the world before us; so that we may look upon it as a conquered enemy. He has conquered it for us, as the captain of our salvation. By his cross the world is crucified to us, which bespeaks it completely conquered. Christ having overcome the world, believers have nothing to do but to pursue their victory, and this we do by faith. We are more than conquerors through him that loved us.

CHAP. XVII

This chapter is a prayer, the Lord Christ's prayer. This was properly and peculiarly his, and yet is of use to us both for instruction and encouragement in prayer. I. The circumstances of the prayer, ver. 1. II. The prayer itself. 1. He prays for himself, ver. 1–5. 2. He prays for those that are his. (1) The general pleas with which he introduces his petitions for them, ver. 6–10. (2) The particular petitions he puts up for them, [1] That they might be kept, ver. 11–16. [2] That they might be sanctified, ver. 17–19. [3] That they might be united, ver. 11 and 20–23. [4] That they might be glorified, ver. 24–26.

Verses 1–5

I. The circumstances of this prayer, v. 1. None of his prayers are recorded so fully as this.

1. The time when he prayed this prayer; when he had spoken these words, had given the foregoing farewell to his disciples. (1) It was a prayer after sermon; when he had spoken from God to them, he turned to speak to God for them. Those we preach to we must pray for. The word preached should be prayed over, for God gives the increase. (2) It was a prayer after sacrament. He closed the solemnity with this prayer, that God would preserve the good impressions of the ordinance upon them. (3) It was a family prayer. Christ's disciples were his family, and, to set a good example before masters of families, he blessed his household, prayed for them and with them. (4) It was a parting prayer. When we and our friends are parting, it is good to part with prayer, Acts xx. 36. (5) It was a prayer that was a preface to his sacrifice, which he was now about to offer on earth. Christ prayed then as a priest now offering sacrifice, in the virtue of which all prayers were to be made. (6) It was a prayer that was a specimen of his intercession, which he ever lives to make for us within the veil.

2. The outward expression of fervent desire which he used in this prayer: He lifted up his eyes to heaven. He was pleased thus to sanctify this gesture to those that use it, and justify it against those that ridicule it. Sursum corda was anciently used as a call to prayer, Up with your hearts, up to heaven.

II. The first part of the prayer itself, in which Christ prays for himself.

1. He prays to God as a Father: He lifted up his eyes, and said, Father. If God be our Father, we have liberty of access to him, and great expectations from him. Christ calls him here holy Father (v. 11), and righteous Father, v. 25. For it will be of great use to us in prayer to call God as we hope to find him.

2. He prayed for himself first. Though Christ, as God, was prayed to, Christ, as man, prayed. What he had purchased he must ask for; and shall we expect to have what we never merited, but have a thousand times forfeited, unless we pray for it? It gives great encouragement to praying people. Time was when he that is advocate for us had a cause of his own to solicit, and this he was to solicit in the same method that is prescribed to us, by prayers and supplications (Heb. v. 7). Christ began with prayer for himself, and afterwards prayed for his disciples; this charity must begin at home, though it must not end there. Christ was much shorter in his prayer for himself than in his prayer for his disciples. Our prayers for the church must not be crowded into a corner of our prayers. Now here are two petitions which Christ puts up for himself, and these two are one. This one petition, Glorify thou me, is twice put up, because it has a double reference. To the prosecution of his undertaking further: Glorify me, that I may glorify thee, v. 1–3. And to the performance of his undertaking hitherto: "Glorify me, for I have glorified thee. I have done my part, and now, Lord, do thine," v. 4, 5.

(1) Christ here prays to be glorified, in order to his glorifying God (v. 1): Glorify thy Son that thy Son may glorify thee.

[1] What he prays for—that he might be glorified in this world. The Father glorified the Son upon earth; even in his sufferings, by the signs and wonders which attended them. Then the Father not only justified, but glorified the Son; even by his sufferings; when he was crucified, he was magnified, he was glorified. It was in his cross that he conquered Satan and death; his thorns were a crown. Much more after his sufferings. The Father glorified the Son when he raised him from the dead.

[2] What he pleads to enforce this request.

First, He pleads relation: Glorify thy Son. Those that have received the adoption of sons may in faith pray for the inheritance of sons; if sanctified, then glorified.

Secondly, He pleads the time: The hour is come. He had often said his hour was not yet come; but now it was come, and he knew it. He calls it this hour (ch. xii. 27), and here the hour. The hour of the Redeemer's death, which was also the hour of the Redeemer's birth, was the most signal and remarkable hour, and, without doubt, the most critical, that ever was since the clock of time was first set going. 1. "The hour is come in the midst of which I need to to be owned." The decisive battle between heaven and hell is now to be fought. "Now glorify thy Son, now give him victory, now let thy Son be so upheld as not to fail nor be discouraged." He glorified his Son when he made the cross his triumphant chariot. 2. The hour is come when I am to be glorified. Good Christians in a trying hour, particularly a dying hour, may thus plead: "Now the hour is come, stand by me, now or never: now the earthly tabernacle is to be dissolved, the hour is come that I should be glorified," 2 Cor. v. 1.

Thirdly, He pleads the Father's own interest and concern herein: That thy Son may also glorify thee; that he might glorify the Father two ways: By the death of the cross. Father, glorify thy name, expressed the great intention of his sufferings. "Father, own me in my sufferings, that I may honour thee by them." By the doctrine of the cross now shortly to be published to the world. If God had not glorified Christ crucified, by raising him from the dead, his whole undertaking had been crushed; therefore glorify me, that I may glorify thee. Now hereby he hath taught us what to eye and aim at in our prayers—that is, the honour of God. "Do this and the other for thy servant, that thy servant may glorify thee. Give me health, that I may glorify thee with my body; success, that I may glorify thee with my estate," &c. Hallowed be thy name must be our first petition, which must fix our end in all other petitions, 1 Pet. iv. 11. He hath taught us what to expect and hope for. If we sincerely set ourselves to glorify our Father, he will give us the grace he knows sufficient, and the opportunity he sees convenient. But, if we secretly honour ourselves more than him, instead of honouring ourselves, we shall shame ourselves.

Fourthly, He pleads his commission (v. 2, 3); he desires to glorify his Father, in conformity to the commission given him. Now see here the power of the Mediator.

a. The origin of his power: Thou hast given him power; he has it from God, to whom all power belongs. The church's king is no usurper, as the prince of this world is; Christ's right to rule is incontestable.

b. The extent of his power: He has power over all flesh. Over all mankind. Being now mediating between God and man, he here pleads his power over all flesh. They were men whom he was to subdue and save; out of that race he had a remnant given him, and therefore all that rank of beings was put under his feet. Over mankind considered as corrupt and fallen. If man had not in this sense been flesh, he had not needed a Redeemer. Over this sinful race the Lord Jesus has all power; and all judgment is committed to him. Whom he does not rule, he over-rules.

c. The grand intention and design of this power: That he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him. Here is the Father making over the elect to the Redeemer, and giving them to him as the crown and recompence of his undertaking. Here is the Son undertaking to secure the happiness of those that were given him, that he would give eternal life to them. He has lives and crowns to give, eternal lives that never die, immortal crowns that never fade. Now consider how great the Lord Jesus is, and how gracious he is. He sanctifies them in this world, gives them the spiritual life which is eternal life in the bud and embryo. Grace in the soul is heaven in that soul. He will glorify them in the other world; their happiness shall be completed in the vision and fruition of God. We are called to his kingdom and glory, and begotten to the inheritance. What is last in execution was first in intention, and that is eternal life. Christ's dominion over the children of men is in order to the salvation of the children of God. The administration of the kingdoms of providence and grace are put into the same hand, that all things may be made to concur for good to the called.

d. Here is a further explication of this grand design (v. 3): "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God." Here is,

(a) The great end which the Christian religion sets before us, and that is, eternal life. This he was to reveal to all, and secure to all that were given him. By the gospel life and immortality are brought to light, are brought to hand.

(b) The sure way of attaining this blessed end, which is, by the right knowledge of God and Jesus Christ: "This is life eternal, to know thee, which may be taken two ways: [a] Life eternal lies in the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ. Those that are brought into union with Christ, and live a life of communion with God in Christ, will say. "If this be heaven, heaven is sweet." [b] The knowledge of God and Christ leads to life eternal. The Christian religion shows us the way to heaven, First, By directing us to God, for Christ died to bring us to God. He is the true God, the only true God; the service of him is the only true religion. Secondly, By directing us to Jesus Christ: Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent. If man had continued innocent, the knowledge of the only true God would have been life eternal to him; but now that he is fallen there must be something more. We are therefore concerned to know Christ as our Redeemer. It is life eternal to believe in Christ; and this he has undertaken to give. Those that are acquainted with God and Christ are already in the suburbs of life eternal.

(2) Christ here prays to be glorified in consideration of his having glorified the Father hitherto, v. 4, 5. The meaning of the former petition was, Glorify me in this world; the meaning of the latter is, Glorify me in the other world.

[1] With what comfort Christ reflects on the life he had lived on earth: I have glorified thee, and finished my work. He pleases himself in reviewing the service he had done his Father. This is here recorded for the honour of Christ, that his life upon earth did in all respects fully answer the end of his coming into the world. 1. Our Lord Jesus had work given him to do. His Father gave him his work, both appointed him to it and assisted him in it. 2. The work that was given him to do he finished. It was as good as done, he was giving it its finishing stroke. 3. Herein he glorified his Father. It is the glory of God that his work is perfect, and the same is the glory of the Redeemer; what he is the author of he will be the finisher of. It is recorded for example to all, that we may follow his example. We must make it our business to do the work God has appointed us to do. We must aim at the glory of God in all. We must persevere herein to the end of our days; we must not sit down till we have finished our work. It is recorded for encouragement to all those that rest upon him. If he has finished the work that was given him to do, then he is a complete Saviour, and did not do his work by the halves.

[2] See with what confidence he expects the joy set before him (v. 5): Now, O Father, glorify thou me.

First, See here what he prayed for: Glorify thou me, as before, v. 1. What his Father had promised him yet he must pray for; promises are not designed to supersede prayers, but to be the guide of our desires and the ground of our hopes. 1. It is a glory with God; not only, Glorify my name on earth, but, Glorify me with thine own self. The prayers of the lower world draw out grace and peace from God our Father and our Lord Jesus Christ in conjunction; and thus the Father has glorified him with himself.

2. It is the glory he had with God before the world was. (1) Jesus Christ, as God, had a being before the world was. Our religion acquaints us with one that was before all things, and by whom all things consist. (2) His glory with the Father is from everlasting. Christ undertook the work of redemption, not because he needed glory, for he had a glory with the Father before the world, but because we needed glory. (3) Jesus Christ in his state of humiliation divested himself of this glory. He was God manifested in the flesh, not in his glory. (4) In his exalted state he resumed this glory. He does not pray to be glorified with the princes and great men of the earth: no; he that knew both worlds, chose it in the glory of the other world, as far exceeding all the glory of this. Let the same mind be in us. Father, glorify thou me with thine own self.

Secondly, See here what he pleaded: I have glorified thee; and now, glorify thou me. There was an equity in it, and an admirable becomingness, that, if God was glorified in him, he should glorify him in himself. If the Father was a gainer in his glory by the Son's humiliation, it was fit the Son should be no loser by it, at long run, in his glory. It was according to the covenant between them. It was for the joy set before him that he endured the cross. He still expects the completing of his exaltation, because he perfected his undertaking. By the glorifying of Christ we are satisfied that God was satisfied, and therein a real demonstration was given that his Father was well pleased in him as his beloved Son. Thus we must be taught that those, and only those who glorify God on earth shall be glorified with the Father, when they must be no more in this world.

Verses 6–10

Christ, having prayed for himself, comes next to pray for those that are his.

I. Whom he did not pray for (v. 9): I pray not for the world. It is not meant of the world of mankind in general (he prays for that here, v. 21, That the world may believe that thou hast sent me). Take the world for a heap of unwinnowed corn in the floor, and God loves it, Christ prays for it, and dies for it, for a blessing is in it. Then take the world for the remaining heap of rejected, worthless chaff. For these Christ does not pray; not but that there are some things which he intercedes with God for on their behalf, as the dresser for the reprieve of the barren tree; but he does not pray for them in this prayer. He does not say, I pray against the world, but, I pray not for them, I pass them by, and leave them to themselves. We that know not who are chosen, and who are passed by, must pray for all men, 1 Tim. ii. 1, 4. While there is life, there is hope, and room for prayer.

II. Whom he did pray for; the children of men. He prays for those that were given him, who receive and believe the words of Christ, v. 6, 8. He prays for all that should believe on him (v. 20). Not only the petitions that follow, but those also which went before, must be construed to extend to all believers, in every place and every age.

III. What are the general pleas with which he introduces his petitions for them. They are five:

1. The charge he had received concerning them: Tnine they were, and thou gavest them me (v. 6), and again (v. 9), Those whom thou hast given me. This is meant primarily of the disciples that then were. They were given in order to their being the publishers of his gospel and the planters of his church. When they left all to follow him, this was the secret spring of that strange resolution: they were given to him, else they had not given themselves to him. The apostleship and ministry, which are Christ's gift to the church, were first the Father's gift to Jesus Christ. Christ received this gift for men, that he might give it to men. It lays a mighty obligation upon the ministers of the gospel to devote themselves entirely to Christ's service, as being given to him, but it is designed to extend to all the elect, for they are elsewhere said to be given to Christ (ch. vi. 37, 39).

(1) The Father had authority to give them: Thine they were, his own in three ways: First, They were creatures, and their lives and beings were derived from him. Secondly, They were criminals, and their lives and beings were forfeited to him. It was a remnant of fallen mankind that was given to Christ to be redeemed, that might have been made sacrifices to justice when they were pitched upon to be the monuments of mercy. Thirdly, They were chosen; they were set apart for God. This he insists upon again (v. 7): All things whatsoever thou hast given me are of thee; they are all of thee, and therefore, Father, I bring them all to thee, that they may be all for thee.

(2) He did accordingly give them to the Son: Thou gavest them to me, as sheep to the shepherd, to be kept; as patients to the physician, to be cured; children to a tutor, to be educated. They were delivered to Christ, that the election of grace might not be frustrated, that not one, no not of the little ones, might perish, that the undertaking of Christ might not be fruitless. He should see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied (Isa. liii. 10, 11).

2. The care he had taken of them to teach them (v. 6): I have manifested thy name to them. I have given to them the words which thou gavest to me, v. 8. Observe here, The great design of Christ's doctrine, which was to manifest God's name, to declare him that he might be better loved and worshipped. His faithful discharge of this undertaking: I have done it. His fidelity appears in the truth of his doctrine. It agreed exactly with the instructions he received from his Father. Ministers, in wording their message, must have an eye to the words which the Holy Ghost teaches. In the tendency of his doctrine, which was to manifest God's name, He did not seek himself, but aimed to magnify his Father. It is Christ's prerogative to manifest God's name to the souls of the children of men. He only has acquaintance with the Father, and so is able to open the truth; and he only has access to the spirits of men, and so is able to open the understanding. Ministers may publish the name of the Lord, but Christ only can manifest that name. Ministers may speak the words of God to us, but Christ can give us his words, can put them in us. Sooner or later, Christ will manifest God's name to all that were given him.

3. The good effect of the care he had taken of them (v. 6): They have kept thy word (v. 7), they have known that all things are of thee (v. 8); they have received thy words, and have known surely that I came out from thee, and have believed that thou didst send me.

(1) What success the doctrine of Christ had among those that were given to him. "They have received the words which I gave them, as the ground receives the seed, and the earth drinks in the rain." The word was to them an ingrafted word. "They have kept thy word; they have conformed to it." Christ's commandment is then only kept when it is obeyed. It was requisite that these should keep what was committed to them, for it was to be transmitted by them to every place for every age. "They have understood the word, They have been aware that all things whatsoever thou hast given me are of thee." All Christ's offices and powers, all the gifts of the Spirit, all his graces and comforts, were all from God, designed by his grace, for his own glory in man's salvation. We may therefore venture our souls upon Christ's mediation. If the righteousness be of God's appointing, we shall be justified; if the grace be of his dispensing, we shall be sanctified. They have set their seal to it: They have known surely that I came out from God, v. 8. What it is to believe; it is to know surely, to know that it is so of a truth. We may know surely that which we neither do nor can know fully. We walk by faith, which knows surely, not yet by sight, which knows clearly. What it is we are to believe: that Jesus Christ came out from God, and that God did send him. Therefore all the doctrines of Christ are to be received as divine truths, and all his promises depended upon as divine securities.

(2) How Jesus Christ here speaks of this: As pleased with it himself. Their constant adherence to him, their gradual improvements, and their great attainments at last, were his joy. Christ is a Master that delights in the proficiency of his scholars. He accepts the sincerity of their faith, and graciously passes by the infirmity of it. As pleading it with his Father. He is praying for those that were given to him; and he pleads that they had given themselves to him. Those that keep Christ's word, and believe on him, let Christ alone to commend them, and, which is more, to recommend them to his Father.

4. He pleads the Father's own interest in them (v. 9): I pray for them, for they are thine. All mine are thine, and thine are mine.

(1) The plea particularly urged for his disciples: They are thine. The consigning of the elect to Christ was so far from making them less the Father's that it was in order to making them the more so. Christ has redeemed us, not to himself only, but to God. This is a good plea in prayer, Christ here pleads it, They are thine; we may plead it for ourselves, I am thine, save me; and for others: "They are thy people. They are thine. Wilt thou not secure them, that they may not be run down by the devil and the world? They are thine, own them as thine."

(2) The foundation on which this plea is grounded: All mine are thine, and thine are mine. This bespeaks the Father and Son to be one in essence and one in interest. What the Father has as Creator is delivered over to the Son. All things are delivered to him (Matt. xi. 27); nothing is excepted but he that did put all things under him. What the Son has as Redeemer is designed for the Father. All the benefits of redemption purchased by the Son are intended for the Father's praise: All mine are thine. The Son owns none for his that are not devoted to the service of the Father. In a limited sense, every true believer may say, All thine are mine. In an unlimited sense every true believer does say, Lord, all mine are thine; all laid at his feet, to be serviceable to him. "Lord, take care of what I have, for it is all thine."

5. He pleads his own concern in them: I am glorified in them. (1) I have been glorified in them. What little honour Christ had in this world was among his disciples, and therefore I pray for them. (2) "I am to be glorified in them; they are to bear up my name. I am glorified in them, therefore, I concern myself for them. Therefore I commit them to the Father, who has engaged to glorify the Son, and, upon this account, will have a gracious eye to those in whom he is glorified."

Verses 11–16

After the general pleas follow the particular petitions he puts up for them. They all relate to spiritual blessings in heavenly things. The prosperity of the soul is the best prosperity. They are such blessings as were suited to their present state and case. Christ's intercession is always pertinent. Our advocate with the father is acquainted with all the particulars of our wants. He is large and full in the petitions, to teach us fervency and importunity in prayer, wrestling as Jacob, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.

Now the first thing Christ prays for is their preservation. Keeping supposes danger, and their danger arose from the world; the evil of this he begs they might be kept from.

I. The request itself: Keep them from the world. There were two ways of their being delivered from the world:

1. By taking them out of it; and he does not pray that they might be so delivered: I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world.

(1) "I pray not that they may be speedily removed by death." If the world will be vexatious to them, the readiest way to secure them would be to hasten them out of it. Send chariots and horses of fire for them, to fetch them to heaven. Christ would not pray so for his disciples. Because he came to conquer those intemperate passions which make men impatient of life, it is his will that we should take up our cross, and not outrun it. Because he had work for them to do in the world, the world could ill spare them. In pity therefore to this dark world, Christ would not have these lights removed out of it, especially for the sake of those in the world that were to believe in him through their word. They must each in his own order die a martyr, but not till they have finished their testimony. The taking of good people out of the world is a thing by no means to be desired. Though Christ loves his disciples, he does not presently send for them to heaven, but leaves them for some time in this world, that they may be ripened for heaven. Many good people are spared to live, because they can ill be spared to die.

(2) "I pray not that they may be exempted from the troubles of this world, and taken out of the toil and terror of it." Not that, being freed from all trouble, they may bask in luxurious ease, but that by the help of God they may be preserved in a scene of danger; so Calvin. Not that they may be kept from all conflict with the world, but that they may not be overcome by it. It is more the honour of a Christian soldier by faith to overcome the world than by a monastical vow to retreat from it; and more for the honour of Christ to serve him in a city than to serve him in a cell.

2. By keeping them from the corruption that is in the world, v. 11, 15. Here are three branches of this petition:

(1) Holy Father, keep those whom thou hast given me. Christ was now leaving them. He does here commit them to the custody of his Father. It is the unspeakable comfort of all believers that Christ himself has committed them to the care of God. Those cannot but be safe whom the almighty God keeps, and he cannot but keep those whom the Son of his love commits to him. He here puts them under the divine protection. To this prayer is owing the wonderful preservation of the gospel ministry and gospel church in the world unto this day. He puts them under the divine tuition. We need God's power not only to put us into a state of grace, but to keep us in it. The titles he gives to him he prays to, and them he prays for, enforce the petition. He speaks to God as a holy Father. If he be a holy God and hate sin, he will make those holy that are his, and keep them from sin, which they also hate and dread as the greatest evil. If he be a Father, he will take care of his own children; who else should? He speaks of them as those whom the Father had given him. What we receive as our Father's gifts, we may comfortably remit to our Father's care.

(2) Keep them through thine own name: keep them for thy name's sake. Those may with comfort plead it that are indeed more concerned for the honour of God's name than for any interest of their own. Keep them in thy name. "Keep them in the knowledge and fear of thy name; keep them in the profession and service of thy name, whatever it cost them." Keep them by or through thy name. "Keep them by thine own power, in thine own hand. Let thy name be their strong tower."

(3) Keep them from the evil, or out of the evil. He had taught them to pray daily, Deliver us from evil, and this would encourage them to pray. "Keep them from the evil one. Keep them from Satan as a tempter, that their faith may not fail. Keep them from him as a destroyer. Keep them from the evil thing, that is, sin. Keep them, that they do no evil. Keep them from the evil of the world, and of their tribulation in it, so that it may have no sting in it." Not that they might be kept from affliction, but kept through it.

II. The reasons with which he enforces these requests, which are five:

1. He pleads that hitherto he had kept them (v. 12): "While I was with them in the world, I have kept them in thy name, they are all safe, and none of them missing, but the son of perdition; he is lost, that the scripture might be fulfilled."

(1) Christ's faithful discharge of his undertaking: While he was with them, he kept them, and his care concerning them was not in vain. Many that followed him awhile took offence at something or other, and went off; but he kept the twelve that they should not go away. While he was with them, he kept them in a visible manner. When he was gone from them, they must be kept in a more spiritual manner. Comforts and supports are sometimes given and sometimes withheld; but, when they are withdrawn, yet they are not left comfortless. What Christ here says is true of all the saints while they are here in this world; Christ keeps them in God's name. They are weak, and cannot keep themselves. They are, in God's account, valuable and worth the keeping; his treasure, his jewels. Their salvation is designed, for to this it is that they are kept, 1 Pet. i. 5. The righteous are preserved for the day of bliss. They are the charge of the Lord Jesus; he keeps them, and exposed himself like the good shepherd for the preservation of the sheep.

(2) The comfortable account he gives of his undertaking: None of them is lost. Jesus Christ will certainly keep all that were given to him; they may think themselves lost, and may be nearly lost (in imminent peril); but it is the Father's will that he should lose none, and none he will lose.

(3) A brand put upon Judas, as none of those whom he had undertaken to keep. He was among those that were given to Christ, but not of them. But the apostasy and ruin of Judas were no reproach at all to his Master, or his family. He was the son of perdition, and therefore not one of those that were given to Christ to be kept. It is an awful consideration that one of the apostles proved a son of perdition. No man's place or name in the church will secure him from ruin, if his heart be not right with God. The scripture was fulfilled; the sin of Judas was foreseen and foretold, and the event would certainly follow after the prediction as a consequent, though it cannot be said necessarily to follow from it as an effect.

2. He pleads that he was now under a necessity of leaving them (v. 11): "Keep them now. Keep them, that they may be one with us as we are with each other."

(1) With what pleasure he speaks of his own departure. He expresses himself concerning it with an air of triumph and exultation, with reference both to the world he left and the world he removed to. "Now I am no more in the world. Now farewell to this provoking troublesome world. Now the welcome hour is at hand when I shall be no more in it." It should be a pleasure to those that have their home in the other world to think of being no more in this world. What is there here that should court our stay? Now I come to thee. To get clear of the world is but the one half of the comfort of a dying Christ, of a dying Christian; the far better half is to think of going to the Father. Those who love God cannot but be pleased to think of coming to him, though it be through the valley of the shadow of death. It is to be present with the Lord, like children fetched home from school to their father's house.

(2) With what a tender concern he speaks of those whom he left behind: "But these are in the world. Holy Father, keep them; they will want my presence, let them have thine. They have now more need than ever to be kept, and will be lost if thou do not keep them." When our Lord Jesus was going to the Father, he carried with him a tender concern for his own that are in the world. When he is out of their sight they are not out of his, much less out of his mind. When Christ would express the utmost need his disciples had of divine preservation, he only says, They are in the world; this bespeaks danger enough to those who are bound for heaven.

3. He pleads what a satisfaction it would be to them to know themselves safe, and what a satisfaction it would be to him to see them easy: I speak this, that they may have my joy fulfilled in themselves, v. 13.

(1) Christ earnestly desired the fulness of the joy of his disciples, for it is his will that they should rejoice evermore. When they thought their joy in him was brought to an end, then was it advanced nearer to perfection than ever it had been, and they were fuller of it. We are here taught to found our joy in Christ. Christ is a Christian's joy, his chief joy. Joy in the world is withering with it; joy in Christ is everlasting, like him. To build up our joy with diligence. No part of the Christian life is pressed upon us more earnestly, Phil. iii. 1; iv. 4. To aim at the perfection of this joy.

(2) In order hereunto, he did thus solemnly commit them to his Father's care and keeping: These things I speak in the world. Saying this in the world would be a greater satisfaction and encouragement to them, and would enable them to rejoice in tribulation. Christ has not only treasured up comforts for his people, but has given out comforts to them. He here condescended to publish his last will and testament, and (which many a testator is shy of) lets them know what legacies he had left them, and how well they were secured. Christ's intercession for us is enough to fulfil our joy in him; nothing more effectual to silence all our fears and mistrusts than this, that he always appears in the presence of God for us. See Heb. vii. 25.

4. He pleads the ill usage they were likely to meet with in the world, for his sake (v. 14): "I have given them thy word, and they have received it, and therefore the world hath hated them, because they are not of the world, any more than I." The world's enmity to Christ's followers. While Christ was with them it hates them, much more would it do so when by their more extensive preaching of the gospel they would turn the world upside down. "Father, stand their friend," says Christ. "Let them have thy love, for the world's hatred is entailed upon them." It is God's honour to take part with the weaker side, and to help the helpless. The reasons of this enmity, which strengthen the plea. One reason is because they had received the word of God by the hand of Christ, when the greatest part of the world rejected it. Those that receive Christ's goodwill and good word must expect the world's ill will and ill word. Gospel ministers have been in a particular manner hated by the world, because they call men out of the world, and separate them from it, and so condemn the world. "Father, keep them, they are sufferers for thee." Those that keep the word of Christ's patience are entitled to special protection in the hour of temptation. That cause which makes a martyr may well make a joyful sufferer. Another reason is more express; the world hates them, because they are not of the world. Those to whom the word of Christ comes in power are not of the world, and therefore the world bears them a grudge.

5. He pleads their conformity to himself in a holy non-conformity to the world (v. 16): "Father, keep them, they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." Those may in faith commit themselves to God's custody, who are as Christ was in this world. God will love those that are like Christ. (1) Jesus Christ was not of this world; he never had been of it. This intimates, First, His state; he was none of the world's favourites nor darlings; worldly possessions he had none, not even where to lay his head; nor worldly power. Secondly, His Spirit; he was perfectly dead to the world, the prince of this world had nothing in him. (2) Therefore true Christians are not of this world. It is their lot to be despised by the world; they are not in favour with the world any more than their Master before them was. It is their privilege to be delivered from the world. It is their duty and character to be dead to the world. Christ's disciples were weak, and had many infirmities; yet this he could say for them, They were not of the world and therefore he recommends them to the care of Heaven.

Verses 17–19

The next thing he prayed for them was that they might be sanctified; not only kept from evil, but made good.

I. Here is the petition (v. 17): Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth. He desires they may be sanctified,

1. As Christians, 1 Thess. v. 23.

(1) The grace desired—sanctification. He prays, Father, sanctify them. "Confirm the work of sanctification in them, rivet their good resolutions. Carry on that good work in them; let the light shine more and more. Complete it, sanctify them throughout and to the end." He cannot for shame own them as his, either here or hereafter, or present them to his Father, if they be not sanctified. Those that through grace are sanctified have need to be sanctified more and more. Not to go forward is to go backward; he that is holy must be holy still, more holy still. It is God that sanctifies as well as God that justifies.

(2) The means of conferring this grace—through thy truth, thy word is truth. Divine revelation, as it now stands in the written word, is not only pure truth without mixture, but entire truth without deficiency. This word of truth should be the outward and ordinary means of our sanctification. It is the seed of the new birth, and the food of the new life.

2. As ministers. "Sanctify them, let their call to the apostleship be ratified in heaven. Qualify them for the office, with Christian graces and ministerial gifts. Separate them to the office. I have called them, they have consented; Father, say Amen to it. Own them in the office; let thy hand go along with them. Sanctify them to thy truth, to be the preachers of thy truth to the world." Jesus Christ intercedes for his ministers with a particular concern, and recommends to his Father's grace those stars he carries in his right hand. The great thing to be asked of God for gospel ministers is that they may be sanctified, entirely devoted to God, and experimentally acquainted with the influence of that word upon their own hearts which they preach to others.

II. We have here two pleas to enforce the petition,

1. The mission they had from him (v. 18): "As thou hast sent me into the world, so now have I sent them into the world."

(1) Christ speaks with great assurance of his own mission: Thou hast sent me into the world. He was sent of God to say what he said, and do what he did, and be what he is to those that believe on him.

(2) He speaks of the commission he had given his disciples: "So have I sent them on the same errand"; to preach the same doctrine that he preached. He gave them their commission (ch. xx. 21) with a reference to his own, and it magnifies their office that it comes from Christ, and that there is some affinity between the commission given to the ministers of reconciliation and that given to the Mediator. Only they are sent as servants, he as a Son. Christ was concerned so much for them, because he had himself put them into a difficult office, which required great abilities for the due discharge of it. Whom Christ sends he will stand by. What he calls us out to he will fit us out for, and bear us out in. He committed them to his Father, because he was concerned in their cause, their mission being in prosecution of his. The Father sanctified him when he sent him into the world, ch. x. 36. Now, they being sent as he was, let them also be sanctified.

2. The merit he had for them is another thing here pleaded (v. 19): For their sakes I sanctify myself. (1) Christ's designation of himself to the work and office of Mediator: I sanctified myself. He entirely devoted himself to the undertaking, and all the parts of it, especially that which he was now going about—the offering up of himself without spot unto God, by the eternal Spirit. This he pleads with his Father, for his intercession is made in the virtue of his satisfaction. (2) Christ's design of kindness to his disciples herein; it is for their sakes, that they may be sanctified, that they may be saints and ministers, duly qualified and accepted of God. The office of the ministry is the purchase of Christ's blood, and one of the blessed fruits of his satisfaction. The real holiness of all good Christians is the fruit of Christ's death. He gave himself for his church, to sanctify it. And he that designed the end designed also the means, that they might be sanctified by the truth. The word of truth receives its sanctifying virtue and power from the death of Christ. And this Christ has prayed for, for all that are his; for this is his will, even their sanctification, which encourages them to pray for it.

Verses 20–23

Next to their purity he prays for their unity.

I. Who are included in this prayer (v. 20): "Not these only, but for those also who shall believe on me through their word. I pray for them all." Those, and those only, are interested in the mediation of Christ, that believe in him. They that lived then, saw and believed, but they in after ages have not seen, and yet have believed. It is through the word that souls are brought to believe on Christ. He does not here pray at a venture. Christ knew very well whom he prayed for. Jesus Christ intercedes not only for great and eminent believers, but for the meanest and weakest. The Good Shepherd has an eye even to the poor of the flock. Jesus Christ in his mediation had an actual regard to those that were yet unborn, the other sheep which he must yet bring.

II. What is intended in this prayer (v. 21): That they all may be one. The same was said before (v. 11), that they may be one as we are, and again, v. 22. The heart of Christ was much upon this. Let them be not only of one heart, but of one mouth, speaking the same thing. The oneness prayed for in v. 21 respects all believers. It is the prayer of Christ for all that are his—that they all may be one, one in us (v. 21), one as we are one (v. 22), made perfect in one, v. 23.

1. That they might all be incorporated in one body. "Father, look upon them all as one. Though they live in distant places, and in several ages, yet let them be united in me their common head." As Christ died, so he prayed, to gather them all in one.

2. That they might all be animated by one Spirit. This is plainly implied in this—that they may be one in us. Let them all be stamped with the same image and superscription, and influenced by the same power.

3. That they might all be knit together in the bond of love and charity, all of one heart. That they all may be one. In judgment and sentiment; not in every little thing—this is neither possible nor needful, but in the great things of God, and in them, by the virtue of this prayer. In disposition and inclination. They have all a new heart, and it is one heart. In their designs and aims. In their desires and prayers; though they differ in words and the manner of expressions, yet they pray for the same things in effect. In love and affection. That which Christ here prays for is that communion of saints which we profess to believe. But this prayer of Christ will not have its complete answer till all the saints come to heaven, for then, and not till then, they shall be perfect in one.

III. What is intimated by way of plea to enforce this petition.

1. The oneness that is between the Father and the Son, which is mentioned again and again, v. 11, 21–23. It is taken for granted that the Father and Son are one, one in mutual endearments. The Father loveth the Son, and the Son always pleased the Father. They are one in design. The intimacy of this oneness is expressed in these words, thou in me, and I in thee. This is insisted on in Christ's prayer for his disciples' oneness, (1) As the pattern of that oneness. Believers are one in some measure as God and Christ are one; they are united by a divine nature, by the power of divine grace, in pursuance of the divine counsels. It is a holy union, for holy ends; not a body politic for any secular purpose. It is a complete union. (2) As the centre of that oneness; that they may be one in us. There is one God and one Mediator. That is a conspiracy, not a union, which doth not centre in God as the end, and Christ as the way. All who are truly united to God and Christ, who are one, will soon be united one to another. (3) As a plea for that oneness. The Creator and Redeemer are one in interest and design; but to what purpose are they so, if all believers be not one body with Christ, and do not jointly receive grace for grace from him, as he has received it for them? Those words, I in them, and thou in me, show what that union is which is so necessary, not only to the beauty, but to the very being, of his church. Union with Christ: I in them. Union with God through him: Thou in me, so as by me to be in them. Union with each other, resulting from these: that they hereby may be made perfect in one. We are complete in him.

2. The design of Christ in all his communications of light and grace to them (v. 22): "The glory which thou gavest me, I have accordingly given them, that they may be one, as we are one; so that those gifts will be in vain, if they be not one." Now these gifts are either, (1) Those that were conferred upon the apostles. The glory of being God's ambassadors to the world, and erecting the throne of God's kingdom among men—this glory was given to Christ, and some of the honour he put upon them when he sent them to disciple all nations. Or, (2) Those that are given in common to all believers. The glory of being in covenant with the Father was the glory which the Father gave to the Redeemer, and he has confirmed it to the redeemed. This honour he says he hath given them. He gave it to them, that they might be one, to entitle them to the privilege of unity. The gift of the Spirit, that great glory which the Father gave to the Son, by him to be given to all believers, makes them one, to engage them to the duty of unity. That in consideration of what they have in one God and one Christ, and of what they hope for in one heaven, they may be of one mind and one mouth. Worldly glory sets men at variance; for if some be advanced others are eclipsed. The more Christians are taken up with the glory Christ has given them, the less desirous they will be of vain-glory, and, consequently, the less disposed to quarrel.

3. He pleads the happy influence their oneness would have upon others. This is twice urged (v. 21): That the world may believe that thou hast sent me. And again (v. 23): That the world may know it. Believers must know what they believe, and why and wherefore they believe it. Those who believe at a venture, venture too far. Now Christ here shows,

(1) His goodwill to the world of mankind in general. Herein he is of his Father's mind, that he would have all men to be saved. Therefore it is his will that no stone be left unturned, for the conviction and conversion of the world. We must in our places do our utmost to further men's salvation.

(2) The good fruit of the church's oneness; it will be an evidence of the truth of Christianity, and a means of bringing many to embrace it. In general, it will recommend Christianity to the world. The embodying of Christians in one society will greatly promote Christianity. When the world shall see so many of those that were its children changed from what they themselves sometimes were, they will be ready to say, We will go with you, for we see that God is with you. The uniting of Christians in love and charity is the beauty of their profession, and invites others to join with them. When Christianity, instead of causing quarrels about itself, makes all other strifes to cease,—when it disposes men to be kind and loving, studious to preserve and promote peace, this will recommend it to all that have anything either of natural religion or natural affection in them. In particular, it will beget in men good thoughts of Christ: They will know and believe that thou hast sent me. By this it will appear that Christ was sent of God, in that his religion prevails to join so many of different capacities, tempers, and interests in other things, in one body by faith, with one heart by love. Of Christians: They will know that thou hast loved them as thou hast loved me. 1. The privilege of believers: the Father himself loveth them with a love resembling his love to his Son, for they are loved in him with an everlasting love. 2. The evidence, that of their being one: it will appear that God loves us, if we love one another with a pure heart. See how much good it would do to the world to know better how dear to God all good Christians are. Those that have so much of God's love would have more of ours.

Verses 24–26

I. A petition for the glorifying of all those that were given to Christ (v. 24): Father, I will that they may be with me.

1. The connection of this request with those foregoing. He had prayed that God would sanctify them; and now he prays that he would crown all his gifts with their glorification. In this method we must pray, first for grace, and then for glory; for in this method God gives.

2. The manner of the request: Father, I will. Here, as before, he addresses himself to God as a Father, and therein we must do likewise; but when he says, I will, he speaks a language such as does not become ordinary petitioners. This intimates the authority of his intercession in general; his word was with power in heaven, as well as on earth. It intimates his particular authority in this matter; he had a power to give eternal life (v. 2), and, pursuant to that power, he says, Father, I will.

3. The request itself—that all the elect might come to be with him in heaven at last.

(1) Under what notion we are to hope for heaven? Wherein does that happiness consist? Three things make heaven: It is to be where Christ is: Where I am, am to be shortly, am to be eternally. In this world we are but on our passage; there we truly are where we are to be for ever. It is to be with him where he is. The happiness of the place will consist in his presence. The very heaven of heaven is to be with Christ. It is to behold his glory, which the Father has given him. The glory of the Redeemer is the brightness of heaven. The Lamb is the light of the new Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 23. God shows his glory there, as he does his grace here, through Christ. The felicity of the redeemed consists very much in the beholding of this glory. They will see into those springs of love from which flow all the streams of grace. They shall be changed into the same image, from glory to glory.

(2) Upon what ground we are to hope for heaven; because he hath said, Father, I will. Our sanctification is our evidence, but it is the will of Christ that is our title. Christ speaks here as if he did not count his own happiness complete unless he had his elect to share with him in it.

4. The argument to back this request: for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world. This is a reason, (1) Why he expected this glory himself. Thou wilt give it to me, for thou lovedst me. The Father loves the Son, is infinitely well pleased in his undertaking, and therefore has given all things into his hands. He is said to love him as Mediator before the foundation of the world. Or, (2) Why he expected that those who were given to him should be with him to share in his glory: "Thou lovedst me, and them in me, and canst deny me nothing I ask for them."

II. The conclusion of the prayer.

1. The respect he had to his Father, v. 25.

(1) The title he gives to God: O righteous Father. When he prayed that they might be sanctified, he called him holy Father; when he prays that they may be glorified, he calls him righteous Father.

(2) The character he gives of the world: The world has not known thee. Ignorance of God overspreads the world of mankind; this is the darkness they sit in. These disciples needed the aids of special grace, both because of the necessity of their work, and also because of the difficulty of their work—therefore keep them. They were qualified for further peculiar favours, for they had that knowledge of God which the world had not.

(3) The plea he insists upon for himself: But I have known thee. Christ knew the Father as no one else ever did, and therefore, in this prayer, came to him with confidence, as we do to one we know. When he had said, The world has not known thee, one would expect it should follow, but they have known thee; no, their knowledge was not to be boasted of, but I have known thee. There is nothing in us to recommend us to God's favour, but all our interest in him, and intercourse with him, result from Christ's interest and intercourse. We are unworthy, but he is worthy.

(4) The plea he insists upon for his disciples: And they have known that thou hast sent me. Hereby they are distinguished from the unbelieving world. To know and believe in Jesus Christ, in the midst of a world that persists in ignorance and infidelity, shall certainly be crowned with distinguishing glory. Singular faith qualifies for singular favours. Hereby they partake of the benefit of his acquaintance with the Father: "I have known thee, and these have known that thou hast sent me." Knowing Christ as sent of God, they have, in him, known the Father. "Father, look after them for my sake."

2. The respect he had to his disciples (v. 26): "I have led them into the knowledge of thee, that the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them."

(1) What Christ had done for them: I have declared unto them thy name. This he had done for those that were his immediate followers. This he has done for all that believe on him. We are indebted to Christ for all the knowledge we have of the Father's name. Those whom Christ recommends to the favour of God he first leads into an acquaintance with God.

(2) What he intended to do yet further for them: I will declare it. To the disciples he designed to give further instructions after his resurrection (Acts i. 3), by the pouring out of the Spirit after his ascension; and to all believers, into whose hearts he hath shined, he shines more and more.

(3) What he aimed at in all this; to secure and advance their real happiness in two things:

[1] Communion with God: "Therefore I have given them the knowledge of thy name, that thy love, wherewith thou hast loved me, may be in them. Let the Spirit of love, with which thou hast filled me, be in them." Christ declares his Father's name to believers, that with that divine light darted into their minds a divine love may be shed abroad in their hearts, that they may partake of a divine nature. When God's love to us comes to be in us, it is like the virtue which the loadstone gives the needle, inclining it to move towards the pole; it draws out the soul towards God. Let them not only be interested in the love of God, let them have the comfort of that interest; that they may not only know God, but know that they know him. It is the love of God thus shed abroad in the heart that fills it with joy, Rom. v. 3, 5. We may not only be satisfied with his loving kindness, but be satisfied of it. This we must press after; if we have it, we must thank Christ for it; if we want it, we may thank ourselves.

[2] Union with Christ in order hereunto: And I in them. There is no getting into the love of God but through Christ, nor can we keep ourselves in that love but by abiding in Christ. It is Christ in us that is the only hope of glory that will not make us ashamed, Col. i. 27. All our communion with God, the reception of his love to us with our return of love to him again, passes through the hands of the Lord Jesus. Christ had said but a little before, I in them (v. 23), and here it is repeated, and the prayer closed with it, to show how much the heart of Christ was set upon it. "I in them; let me have this, and I desire no more." Let us therefore make sure our union with Christ, and then take the comfort of his intercession. This prayer had an end, but that he ever lives to make.

CHAP. XVIII

Hitherto this evangelist has recorded little of the history of Christ, only so far as was requisite to introduce his discourses; but now he is very particular in relating the circumstances of his sufferings. This chapter relates, I. How Christ was arrested in the garden, ver. 1–12. II. How he was abused in the high priest's court, and how Peter, in the meantime, denied him, ver. 13–27. III. How he was prosecuted before Pilate, and put in election with Barabbas for the favour of the people, and lost it, ver. 28–40.

Verses 1–12

The hour was now come that the captain of our salvation, who was to be made perfect by sufferings, should engage the enemy. Let us turn aside now, and see this great sight.

I. Our Lord Jesus, like a bold champion, takes the field first (v. 1, 2): When he had spoken these words, he would lose no time, but went forth with his disciples, and he went over the brook Cedron where was a garden.

1. Our Lord Jesus entered upon his sufferings when he had spoken these words. Christ had said all he had to say as a prophet, and now he addresses himself to the discharge of his office as a priest, to make his soul an offering for sin; and, when he had gone through this, he entered upon his kingly office. Having by his sermon prepared his disciples for this hour of trial, and by his prayer prepared himself for it, he then courageously went out to meet it. When he had put on his armour, he entered the lists, and not till then. Christ will not engage those that are his in any conflict, but he will first do that for them which is necessary to prepare them for it. We may, with an unshaken resolution, venture through the greatest hardships in the way of duty.

2. He went forth with his disciples. He would do as he was wont to do, and not alter his method, either to meet the cross or to miss it, when his hour was come. It was his custom when he was at Jerusalem to retire at night to the mount of Olives. This being his custom, he would not be put out of his method by the foresight of his sufferings. He was as unwilling that there should be an uproar among the people as his enemies were. If he had been seized in the city, and a tumult raised thereby, mischief might have been done, and a great deal of blood shed, and therefore he withdrew. When we find ourselves involved in trouble, we should be afraid of involving others with us. It is no disgrace to the followers of Christ to fall tamely. Those who aim at honour from men value themselves upon a resolution to sell their lives as dearly as they can; but those who know that their blood is precious to Christ need not stand upon such terms. He would set us an example of retirement from the world. We must lay aside, and leave behind, the crowds, and cares, and comforts, of cities, even holy cities, if we would cheerfully take up our cross.

3. He went over the brook Cedron. He must go over this to go to the mount of Olives, but the notice taken of it intimates that there was something in it significant. The brook Cedron, the black brook, so called either from the darkness of the valley it ran through or the colour of the water, tainted with the dirt of the city. The godly kings of Judah had burnt and destroyed the idols they found at the brook Cedron. Into that brook the abominable things were cast. Christ began his passion by the same brook.

4. He entered into a garden. This circumstance is taken notice of only by this evangelist, that Christ's sufferings began in a garden. In the garden of Eden sin began; there the Redeemer was promised. Christ was buried also in a garden. Let us, when we walk in our gardens, take occasion thence to meditate on Christ's sufferings in a garden, to which we owe all the pleasure we have in our gardens. When we are in the midst of our possessions and enjoyments, we must keep up an expectation of troubles, for our gardens of delight are in a vale of tears.

5. He had his disciples with him. They must be witnesses of his sufferings, and his patience under them, that they might with the more assurance and affection preach them to the world, and be themselves prepared to suffer. He would take them into the danger to show them their weakness. Christ sometimes brings his people into difficulties that he may magnify himself in their deliverance.

6. Judas the traitor knew the place. A solitary garden is a proper place for meditation and prayer, that we may pray over the impressions made and the vows renewed, and clench the nail. Mention is made of Judas's knowing the place, (1) To aggravate the sin of Judas, that he would betray his Master, and that he would make use of his familiarity with Christ, as giving him an opportunity of betraying him; a generous mind would have scorned to do so base a thing. (2) To magnify the love of Christ, that, though he knew where the traitor would seek him, thither he went to be found of him. Thus he showed himself willing to suffer and die for us. It was late in the night (we may suppose eight or nine o'clock) when Christ went out to the garden. When others were going to bed, he was going to prayer, going to suffer.

II. The captain of our salvation having taken the field, the enemy attacks him (v. 3): Judas with his men comes thither. This evangelist passes over Christ's agony, because the other three had fully related it.

1. The persons employed in this action—a band of men and officers from the chief priests, with Judas. (1) Here is a multitude engaged against Christ—a band of men. Christ's friends were few, his enemies many. (2) Here is a mixed multitude; the band of men were Gentiles, Roman soldiers, the officers of the chief priests. The officers of their courts were Jews; these had an enmity to each other, but were united against Christ. (3) It is a commissioned multitude who have received orders from the chief priests, and it is likely that they had a warrant to take him up, for they feared the people. See what enemies Christ and his gospel have had, and are likely to have, numerous and potent; ecclesiastical and civil powers combined against them. (4) All under the direction of Judas. He received this band of men. He thought himself wonderfully preferred from coming in the rear of the contemptible twelve to be placed at the head of these formidable hundreds.

2. The preparation they had made for an attack: They came with lanterns, and torches, and weapons. If Christ should abscond, though they had moonlight, they would have occasion for their lights. It was folly to light a candle to seek the Sun by. If he should resist, they would have occasion for their arms. The weapons of his warfare were spiritual, and at these weapons he had often beaten them, therefore they have now recourse to other weapons, swords and staves.

III. Our Lord Jesus gloriously repulsed the first onset of the enemy, v. 4–6.

1. How he received them.

(1) He met them with a very soft and mild question (v. 4): Knowing all things that should come upon him, undisturbed and undaunted, he went forth to meet them, and softly asked, "Whom seek you?" See here, Christ's foresight of his sufferings: he knew all those things that should come upon him. We should not covet to know what shall come upon us; it would but anticipate our pain; sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof: yet it will do us good to expect sufferings in general. "It is but the cost we sat down and counted upon." Christ's forwardness to his sufferings. When the people would have forced him to a crown, he withdrew, and hid himself (ch. vi. 15); but, when they came to force him to a cross, he offered himself; for he came to this world to suffer and went to the other world to reign. This will not warrant us needlessly to expose ourselves to trouble, but we are called to suffering when we have no way to avoid it but by sin.

(2) He met them with a very calm and mild answer when they told him whom they were in quest of, v. 5. They said, Jesus of Nazareth; and he said, I am he. It is highly probable that at least the officers of the temple had often seen him. Judas knew him well enough, and yet none of them could pretend to say, Thou art the man we seek. In their enquiries for him they called him Jesus of Nazareth. It was a name of reproach given him, to darken the evidence of his being the Messiah. By this it appears that they knew him not, whence he was. He fairly answers them: I am he. Though they called him Jesus of Nazareth, he answered to the name, for he despised the reproach; he might have said, I am not he, for he was Jesus of Bethlehem. He has hereby taught us to own him, whatever it cost us; not to be ashamed of him or his words. Particular notice is taken that Judas stood with them. He that used to stand with those that followed Christ now stood with those that fought against him. This is mentioned: To show the impudence of Judas. One would wonder where he got the confidence with which he now faced his Master, and was not ashamed. To show that Judas was particularly aimed at in the power which went along with that word, I am he, to foil the aggressors.

2. See how he terrified them, and obliged them to retire (v. 6): They went backward, and fell to the ground. This word, I am he, had revived his disciples, and raised them up, but the same word strikes his enemies down. Hereby he showed plainly,

(1) What he could have done with them. When he struck them down, he could have struck them dead. But he would not do so. He would only show that his life was not forced from him, but he laid it down of himself, as he had said. He would give an instance of his patience and forbearance and his compassionate love to his very enemies. In striking them down, and no more, he gave them both a call to repent and space to repent.

(2) What he will do at last with all his implacable enemies, that will not repent to give him glory; they shall flee, they shall fall before him.

IV. Having given his enemies a repulse, he gives his friends a protection, v. 7–9.

1. He continued to expose himself to their rage, v. 7. When they were down, one would have thought Christ should have made his escape; when they were up again, one would have thought they should have let fall their pursuit. They are as eager as ever to seize him. They cannot imagine what ailed them, but will impute it to anything rather than Christ's power. There are hearts so very hard in sin that nothing will work upon them to reduce and reclaim them. He is as willing as ever to be seized. When they were fallen before him, he asked them the same question, Whom seek you? And they gave him the same answer, Jesus of Nazareth. In their repeating the same answer, they showed an obstinacy in their wicked way; they still call him Jesus of Nazareth, with as much disdain as ever, and Judas is as unrelenting as any of them.

2. He contrived to secure his disciples from their rage. When he shows his courage with reference to himself, I have told you that I am he, he shows his care for his disciples, Let these go their way. This aggravated the sin of the disciples in forsaking him, and particularly Peter's in denying him. When Christ said, Let these go their way, he intended,

(1) To manifest his affectionate concern for his disciples. When he exposed himself, he excused them, because they were not as yet fit to suffer. It would have been as much as their souls, and the lives of their souls, were worth, to bring them into sufferings now. And, besides, they had other work to do; they must go their way, for they are to go into all the world, to preach the gospel. Christ gives us a great encouragement to follow him. He considers our frame, will wisely time the cross, and proportion it to our strength. He gives us a good example of love to our brethren. We must not consult our own ease and safety only, but others' as well as our own, and in some cases more than our own.

(2) To give a specimen of his undertaking as Mediator. When he offered himself to suffer and die, it was that we might escape.

3. He confirmed the word which he had spoken a little before (ch. xvii. 12), Of those whom thou gavest me, I have lost none. Though Christ's keeping them was meant especially of the preservation of their souls from sin, yet it is here applied to the preservation of their natural lives. Christ will preserve the natural life for the service to which it is designed. It shall be held in life as long as any use is to be made of it. This preservation of the disciples was a spiritual preservation. They were now so weak in faith and resolution that in all probability, if they had been called out to suffer at this time, some of them, at least the weaker of them, would have been lost; and therefore, that he might lose none, he would not expose them.

V. He rebukes the rashness of one of them, and represses the violence of his followers, v. 10, 11.

1. Peter's rashness. He had a sword. They had two swords among them all (Luke xxii. 38), and Peter, being entrusted with one, drew it; and he smote one of the high priest's servants, and cut off his right ear. The servant's name, for the greater certainty of the narrative, is recorded; it was Malchus.

(1) We must here acknowledge Peter's goodwill; he had an honest zeal for his Master, though now misguided. He had lately promised to venture his life for him, and would now make his words good.

(2) Yet we must acknowledge Peter's ill conduct; and, though his good intention did excuse, yet it would not justify him. [1] He had no warrant from his Master for what he did. Christ's soldiers must wait the word of command, and not outrun it. [2] He resisted the powers that were, which Christ had never countenanced, but forbidden (Matt. v. 39). [3] He opposed his Master's sufferings. Thus, while he seemed to fight for Christ, he fought against him. [4] He broke the capitulation his Master had lately made with the enemy. When he said, Let these go their way, he in effect passed his word for their good behaviour; this Peter heard, and yet would not be bound by it. [5] He foolishly exposed himself and his fellow disciples to the fury of this enraged multitude. Many have been guilty of self-destruction, in their zeal for self-preservation. [6] Peter played the coward so soon after this (denying his Master) that we have reason to think his courage failed him; whereas the true Christian hero will appear in the cause of Christ, not only when it is prevailing, but when it seems to be declining; will be on the right side, though it be not the rising side.

(3) We must acknowledge God's overruling providence in giving Christ an opportunity to manifest his power and goodness in healing the hurt, Luke xxii. 51.

2. The rebuke his Master gave him (v. 11): Put up thy sword into the sheath. It is a gentle reproof, because it was his zeal that carried him beyond the bounds of discretion. Many think their being in grief and distress will excuse them if they be hot and hasty with those about them; but Christ has here set us an example of meekness in sufferings.

3. The reason for this rebuke: The cup which my Father has given me, shall I not drink it? Christ gives us, (1) A full proof of his own submission to his Father's will. Of all that was amiss in what Peter did, he seems to resent nothing so much as that he would have hindered his sufferings now that his hour was come. He was willing to drink of this cup, though it was a bitter cup. He drank it, that he might put into our hands the cup of salvation. He is willing to drink it, because his Father put it into his hand. (2) A fair pattern to us of submission to God's will. We must pledge Christ in the cup that he drank of (Matt. xx. 23). It is but a cup; a small matter comparatively. It is a cup that is given us; sufferings are gifts. It is given us by a Father, who has a Father's affection, and means us no hurt.

VI. He calmly surrendered, and yielded himself a prisoner, not because he could not have made his escape, but because he would not.

1. How they seized him: They took Jesus. Only some few of them could lay hands on him, but it is charged upon them all, for they were all aiding and abetting. In treason there are no accessories; all are principals. They had so often been frustrated in their attempts to seize him that now we may suppose they flew upon him with so much the more violence.

2. How they secured him: They bound him. This particular of his sufferings is taken notice of only by this evangelist, that, as soon as ever he was taken, he was bound, pinioned, handcuffed.

(1) This shows the spite of his persecutors. They bound him, that they might torment him, and put him in pain; that they might disgrace him, and put him to shame; that they might prevent his escape. They bound him as one already condemned, for they were resolved to prosecute him to the death. Christ had bound the consciences of his persecutors with the power of his word, which galled them; and, to be revenged on him, they laid these bonds on him.

(2) Christ's being bound was very significant. Before they bound him, he had bound himself to the work and office of a Mediator. He was already bound to the horns of the altar with the cords of his own love to man, and duty to his Father. Guilt is a bond on the soul, by which we are bound over to the judgment of God; corruption is a bond on the soul, by which we are bound under the power of Satan. Christ, to free us from those bonds, himself submitted to be bound for us. To his bonds we owe our liberty. Thus the Son maketh us free. Christ was bound, that he might bind us to duty and obedience. His bonds for us are bonds upon us, by which we are for ever obliged to love him and serve him. Christ's bonds for us were designed to make our bonds for him easy to us, to sanctify and sweeten them; these enabled Paul and Silas to sing in the stocks.

Verses 13–27

We have here an account of Christ's arraignment before the high priest, and some circumstances that occurred therein which were omitted by the other evangelists. Peter's denying him, of which the other evangelists had given the entire story by itself, is interwoven with the other passages. The crime laid to his charge having relation to religion, the judges of the spiritual court took it to fall directly under their cognizance. Both Jews and Gentiles seized him, and so both Jews and Gentiles tried and condemned him, for he died for the sins of both.

I. Having seized him, they led him away to Annas first, v. 13. 1. They led him away, led him in triumph, as a trophy of their victory. They hurried him away with violence, as if he had been the worst and vilest of malefactors. We had been led away of our own impetuous lusts, and led captive by Satan at his will, and, that we might be rescued, Christ was led away, led captive by Satan's agents and instruments. 2. They led him away to their masters that sent them. It was now about midnight, and one would think they should have put him in ward till it was a proper time to call a court; but he is hurried away immediately, not to the justices of peace, to be committed, but to the judges to be condemned; so extremely violent was the prosecution. 3. They led him to Annas first. Probably his house lay in the way. To gratify him therefore with the assurance of their success, they produce their prisoner before him. Christ, the great sacrifice, was presented to him, and sent away bound, as approved and ready for the altar. This Annas was father-in-law to Caiaphas the high priest. Acquaintance and alliance with wicked people are a great confirmation to many in their wicked ways.

II. Annas being as willing as any of them to have the prosecution pushed on, sent him bound to Caiaphas.

1. The power of Caiaphas intimated (v. 13). He was high priest that same year. The high priest's commission was during life; but there were now such frequent changes that it was become almost an annual office. While they were undermining one another, God was overturning them all. Caiaphas was high priest that same year when Messiah was to be cut off. When a bad thing was to be done by a high priest, Providence so ordered it that a bad man should be in the chair to do it. It was the ruin of Caiaphas that he was high priest that year, and so became a ringleader in the putting of Christ to death. Many a man's advancement has lost him his reputation, and he had not been dishonoured if he had not been preferred.

2. The malice of Caiaphas, which is intimated (v. 14) by the repeating of what he had said some time before, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people. This was that Caiaphas that governed himself and the church by rules of policy, in defiance of the rules of equity. His case was adjudged before it was heard, and they were already resolved what to do with him; he must die; so that his trial was a jest. It is a testimony to the innocence of our Lord Jesus, from the mouth of one of his worst enemies, who owned that he fell a sacrifice to the public good, and that it was not just he should die, but expedient only.

3. The concurrence of Annas in the prosecution of Christ. He made himself a partaker in guilt, (1) With the captain and officers, by continuing him bound when he should have loosed him. It was more excusable in the rude soldiers to bind him than in Annas, who should have known better, to continue him bound. (2) With the chief priest and council. This Annas was not present with them, yet thus he became a partaker of their evil deeds.

III. In the house of Caiaphas, Simon Peter began to deny his Master, v. 15–18.

1. It was with much ado that Peter got into the hall where the court was sitting, an account of which we have, v. 15, 16.

(1) Peter's kindness to Christ, which (though it proved no kindness) appeared in two things: [1] That he followed Jesus when he was led away; though at first he fled with the rest, yet afterwards he took heart a little, and followed at some distance, calling to mind the promises he had made to adhere to him, whatever it should cost him. Those that truly love and value Christ will follow him all weathers and all ways. [2] When he could not get in where Jesus was in the midst of his enemies, he stood at the door without, willing to be as near him as he could, and waiting for an opportunity to get nearer. As it proved, he did but run himself into a snare. Christ, who knew him better than he knew himself, had expressly told him (ch. xiii. 36), Whither I go thou canst not follow me now, and had told him again and again that he would deny him; and he had lately had experience of his own weakness in forsaking him.

(2) The other disciple's kindness to Peter, which yet, as it proved, was no kindness either. St. John several times in this gospel speaking of himself as another disciple, many interpreters have been led by this to fancy that this other disciple here was John. But I see no reason to think that this other disciple was John, or one of the twelve; other sheep Christ had, which were not of the fold. As there are many who seem disciples and are not so, so there are many who are disciples and seem not so. There are good people hid in courts, even in Nero's, as well as hid in crowds. This other disciple showed a respect to Peter, in introducing him, not only to gratify affection, but to give him an opportunity of being serviceable to his Master upon his trial. But this kindness proved no kindness, nay a great diskindness; by letting him into the high priest's hall, he let him into temptation, and the consequence was bad.

2. Peter, having got in, was immediately assaulted with the temptation, v. 17.

(1) How slight the attack was. It was but a silly maid, of so small account that she was set to keep the door, that challenged him, and she only asked him carelessly, Art not thou one of this man's disciples? Peter would have had some reason to take the alarm if Malchus had set upon him, and had said, "This is he that cut off my ear, and I will have his head for it."

(2) How speedy the surrender was. Without taking time to recollect himself, he suddenly answered, I am not. All his care being for his own safety, he thought he could not secure this but by a peremptory denial.

(3) Yet he goes further into the temptation: And the servants and officers stood there, and Peter with them, v. 18.

[1] See how the servants made much of themselves; the night being cold, they made a fire in the hall. They cared not what became of Christ; all their care was to sit and warm themselves.

[2] See how Peter herded himself with them. He sat and warmed himself. It was a fault bad enough that he did not attend his Master, and appear for him at the upper end of the hall. He might have been a witness for him, at least, he might have been a witness to him. He might have learned by his Master's example how to carry himself when it should come to his turn to suffer thus; yet neither his conscience nor his curiosity could bring him into the court. It was much worse that he joined himself with those that were his Master's enemies: He stood with them, and warmed himself. A little thing will draw those into bad company that will be drawn to it by the love of a good fire. If Peter's zeal for his Master had not frozen, but had continued in the heat it seemed to be of but a few hours before, he had not had occasion to warm himself now. Peter was much to be blamed, 1. Because he associated with these wicked men. Doubtless they were diverting themselves with this night's expedition, scoffing at Christ; and what sort of entertainment would this give to Peter? If Peter had not so much courage as to appear publicly for his Master, yet he might have had so much devotion as to retire into a corner, and weep in secret for his Master's sufferings, and his own sin in forsaking him. 2. Because he desired to be thought one of them. Is this Peter? It is ill warming ourselves with those with whom we are in danger of burning ourselves.

IV. Peter, Christ's friend, having begun to deny him, the high priest, his enemy, begins to accuse him, v. 19–21. It should seem, the first attempt was to prove him a teacher of false doctrine, which this evangelist relates; and, when they failed in the proof of this, then they charged him with blasphemy, which is related by the other evangelists.

1. The articles or heads upon which Christ was examined (v. 19): concerning his disciples and his doctrine.

(1) The irregularity of the process; it was against all law and equity. Now that he is their prisoner they have nothing to lay to his charge. Against all reason and justice, he is put on to be his own accuser.

(2) The intention. The high priest then examined him upon those interrogatories which would touch his life. [1] Concerning his disciples, that he might charge him with sedition. Some think his question concerning his disciples was, "What is now become of them all? Why do they not appear?" upbraiding him with their cowardice in deserting him, and thus adding to the affliction of it. [2] Concerning his doctrine, that they might charge him with heresy. This was a matter properly cognizable in that court, therefore a prophet could not perish but at Jerusalem, where that court sat. They said nothing to him concerning his miracles, by which he had done so much good, because of these they were sure they could take no hold.

2. The appeal Christ made, in answer to these interrogatories. As to his disciples, he said nothing, because it was an impertinent question. His having disciples was no more than what was practised and allowed by their own doctors. If Caiaphas designed to ensnare them, it was in kindness to them that Christ said nothing of them, for he had said, Let these go their way. If he meant to upbraid him with their cowardice, no wonder that he said nothing. He would say nothing to condemn them, and could say nothing to justify them. As to his doctrine, he said nothing in particular, but in general referred himself to those that heard him, v. 20, 21.

[1] He tacitly charges his judges with illegal proceedings. He appeals to the settled rules of their own court, whether they dealt fairly by him. Why ask you me? Which implies two absurdities in judgment: First, "Why ask you me now concerning my doctrine, when you have already condemned it?" They had made an order of court for excommunicating all that owned him (ch. ix. 22), and now they come to ask what his doctrine is! Secondly, "Why ask you me? Must I accuse myself?"

[2] He insists upon his fair and open dealing with them in the publication of his doctrine. Christ clears himself very fully. First, As to the manner of his preaching. He spoke openly with freedom and plainness of speech. Christ explained himself fully, with, Verily, verily, I say unto you. Secondly, As to the persons he preached to: He spoke to the world, to all that had ears to hear, and were willing to hear him, high or low, learned or unlearned, Jew or Gentile, friend or foe. Thirdly, As to the places he preached in. When he was in the country, he preached ordinarily in the synagogues; when he came up to Jerusalem, he preached the same doctrine in the temple. Though he often preached in private houses, and on mountains, and by the seaside, yet what he preached in private was the very same with what he delivered publicly. The doctrine of Christ needs not be ashamed to appear in the most numerous assembly, for it carries its own strength and beauty along with it. Fourthly, As to the doctrine itself. In secret have I said nothing. He sought no corners, for he feared no colours, nor said anything that he needed to be ashamed of; what he did speak in private to his disciples he ordered them to proclaim on the house-tops, Matt. x. 27.

[3] He appeals to those that had heard him, and desires that they might be examined: "Ask those that heard me what I said unto them." He means not his friends and followers, who might be presumed to speak in his favour, but, Ask any impartial hearer. The doctrine of Christ may safely appeal to all that know it. Those who will judge impartially cannot but witness to it.

V. While the judges were examining him, the servants that stood by were abusing him, v. 22, 23.

1. It was a base affront which one of the officers gave him; this insolent fellow struck him with the palm of his hand, saying, Answerest thou the high priest so?

(1) He struck him—he gave him a blow. It was unjust to strike one that neither said nor did amiss; it was cowardly to strike one that had his hands tied; and barbarous to strike a prisoner at the bar. Here was a breach of the peace in the face of the court, and yet the judges countenanced it.

(2) He checked him in a haughty imperious manner: Answerest thou the high priest so? As if the blessed Jesus were not good enough to speak to his master, but, like a rude and ignorant prisoner, must be controlled by the jailer, and taught how to behave. It was done to please the high priest, and to curry favour with him; for what he said implied a jealousy for the dignity of the high priest. Wicked rulers will not want wicked servants, who will help forward the affliction of those whom their masters persecute.

2. Christ bore this affront with wonderful meekness and patience (v. 23): "If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil. But if well, why smitest thou me?" Christ did not here turn the other cheek, by which it appears that that rule, Matt. v. 39, is not to be understood literally. Comparing Christ's precept with his pattern, we learn that in such cases we must not be our own avengers, nor judges in our own cause. Our resentment of injuries done us must always be rational, and never passionate; such Christ's here was.

VI. While the servants were thus abusing him, Peter was proceeding to deny him, v. 25–27.

1. He repeated the sin the second time, v. 25. While he was warming himself with the servants, they asked him, Art not thou one of his disciples? He, perhaps, fearing he should be seized, if he should own it, flatly denied it, and said, I am not.

(1) It was his great folly to thrust himself into the temptation, by continuing in the company. He stayed to warm himself; but those that warm themselves with evil doers grow cold towards good people and good things, and those that are fond of the devil's fire-side are in danger of the devil's fire.

(2) It was his great unhappiness that he was again assaulted by the temptation. [1] The subtlety of the tempter in running down one whom he saw falling; not a maid now, but all the servants. Yielding to one temptation invites another, and perhaps a stronger. Satan redoubles his attacks when we give ground. [2] The danger of bad company. We commonly study to approve ourselves to those with whom we choose to associate. As we choose our people we choose our praise; we are therefore concerned to make the first choice well.

(3) It was his great weakness to yield to the temptation, and to say, I am not one of his disciples, as one ashamed of that which was his honour. When Christ was admired and treated with respect, Peter prided himself, in this, that he was a disciple of Christ. Thus many who seem fond of the reputation of religion when it is in fashion are ashamed of the reproach of it.

2. He repeated the sin the third time, v. 26, 27. Here he was attacked by one of the servants, who was kinsman to Malchus, who gave him the lie with great assurance: "Did not I see thee in the garden with him?" Peter then denied again.

(1) Before his relation to Christ was only suspected, here it is proved upon him by one that saw him with Jesus. Those who by sin think to help themselves out of trouble do but entangle and embarrass themselves the more. Dare to be brave, for truth will out. Notice is taken of this servant's being akin to Malchus, because this circumstance would make it the more a terror to Peter. We should not make any man in particular our enemy if we can help it. He that may need a friend should not make a foe. Though here was sufficient evidence against Peter to have prosecuted him, yet he escapes, has no harm done him. We are often drawn into sin by groundless causeless fears, which a small degree of wisdom and resolution would make nothing of.

(2) His yielding to it was no less base than the former: He denied again. The nature of sin in general: the heart is hardened by the deceitfulness of it, Heb. iii. 13. The beginning of sin is as the letting forth of water, when once the fence is broken men easily go from bad to worse. Of the sin of lying in particular; it is a fruitful sin; one lie needs another to support it, and that another.

(3) Immediately the cock crew; and this is all that is here said of his repentance, it being recorded by the other evangelists. The crowing of the cock to others was an accidental thing,and had no significancy, but to Peter it was the voice of God.

Verses 28–40

We have here an account of Christ's arraignment before Pilate, the Roman governor, in the praetor's house, or hall of judgment; thither they hurried him, to get him condemned in the Roman court, and executed by the Roman power. They took this course, 1. That he might be put to death the more legally and regularly; not stoned in a popular tumult, as Stephen, but put to death with the present formalities of justice. 2. That he might be put to death the more safely. If they could engage the Roman government in the matter, there would be little danger of an uproar. 3. That he might be put to death with more reproach to himself. The death of the cross, being of all deaths the most ignominious, they were desirous by it to put an indelible mark of infamy upon him. This therefore they harped upon, Crucify him. 4. That he might be put to death with less reproach to them. It was an invidious thing to put one to death that had done so much good, and therefore they were willing to throw the odium upon the Roman government. Thus many are more afraid of the scandal of a bad action than of the sin of it. (1) Their industry in the prosecution: It was early, when most people were in their beds. Now that they had him in their hands, they would lose no time till they had him upon the cross. (2) Their superstition and vile hypocrisy: The chief priests and elders went not into the judgment-hall lest they should be defiled, but kept out of doors, that they might eat the passover, and therefore would not go into the court, for fear of touching a Gentile, and thereby contracting, not a legal, but only a traditional pollution. This they scrupled, but made no scruple of breaking through all the laws of equity to persecute Christ to the death.

I. Pilate's conference with the prosecutors. They were called first, and stated what they had to say against the prisoner, v. 29–32.

1. The judge calls for the indictment. Because they would not come into the hall, he went out to them. Here are three things commendable in him: (1) His diligent and close application to business. Men in public trusts must not love their ease. (2) His condescending to the humour of the people. He might have said, "If they be so nice as not to come in to me, let them go home as they came"; but Pilate insists not upon it, and goes out to them. (3) His adherence to the rule of justice, in demanding the accusation: "What accusation bring you against this man? What is the crime you charge him with, and what proof have you of it?"

2. The prosecutors demand judgment against him upon a general surmise that he was a criminal (v. 30): If he were not a malefactor we would not have delivered him to thee. This bespeaks them, (1) Very rude and uncivil to Pilate. He put the most reasonable question to them that could be; but, if it had been the most absurd, they could not have answered him with more disdain. (2) Very spiteful and malicious towards our Lord Jesus. They will presume him guilty who could prove himself innocent. They say, "He is an evil-doer." He an evil-doer who went about doing good! It is no new thing for the best of benefactors to be branded and run down as the worst of malefactors. (3) Very proud and conceited of themselves, and their own judgment and justice.

3. The judge remands him to their own court (v. 31): "Take you him, and judge him according to your own law." Some think Pilate herein complimented them, acknowledging the remains of their power, and allowing them to exert it. Saith Pilate, "Go as far as your law will allow you, and, if you go further, it shall be connived at." This he said, willing to do the Jews a pleasure, but unwilling to do them the service they required. (2) Others think he upbraided them with their present state of weakness and subjection. Saith Pilate, "You have found him guilty by your own law, condemn him, if you dare, by your own law." Some think Pilate here reflects upon the law of Moses, as if it allowed them what the Roman law would by no means allow—the judging of a man unheard.

4. They disown any authority as judges: "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death." Some think they had lost their power to give judgment in matters of life and death only by their own carelessness. Others think their power was taken from them by the Romans. Their acknowledgment of this they designed for a compliment to Pilate, and to atone for their rudeness (v. 30). However, there was a providence in it, That the saying of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spoke, signifying what death he should die, v. 32. Even those who designed the defeating of Christ's sayings were made serviceable to the fulfilling of them by an overruling hand of God. Those sayings of Christ in particular were fulfilled which he had spoken concerning his own death. Two sayings of Christ concerning his death were fulfilled, by the Jews declining to judge him according to their law. First, He had said that he should be delivered to the Gentiles, and that they should put him to death (Matt. xx. 19; Mark x. 33; Luke xviii. 32, 33). Secondly, He had said that he should be crucified (Matt. xx. 19; xxvi. 2), lifted up, ch. iii. 14; xii. 32. Now if they had judged him by their law, he had been stoned. It was therefore necessary that Christ should be put to death by the Romans. As the Roman power had brought him to be born at Bethlehem, so now to die upon a cross, and both according to the scriptures.

II. Here is Pilate's conference with the prisoner, v. 33, &c.

1. The prisoner set to the bar. Pilate, after he had conferred with the chief priests at his door, entered into the hall, and called for Jesus to be brought in. Pilate entered into judgment with him, that God might not enter into judgment with us.

2. His examination. The other evangelists tell us that his accusers had laid it to his charge that he perverted the nation, forbidding to give tribute to Caesar.

(1) Here is a question put to him, with a design to find out something upon which to ground an accusation: "Art thou the king of the Jews?" Some think Pilate asked this with an air of scorn and contempt: "What! art thou a king? Art thou the king of the Jews, by whom thou art thus hated and persecuted?" Since it could not be proved he ever said it, he would constrain him to say it now, that he might proceed upon his own confession.

(2) Christ answers this question with another as an intimation to Pilate to consider upon what grounds he went (v. 34): "Sayest thou this thing of thyself or did others tell it thee of me? It is plain that thou hast no reason to say this of thyself." Pilate was bound by his office to take care of the interests of the Roman government, but he could not say that this was in any danger, or suffered any damage, from anything our Lord Jesus had ever said or done. [2] "If others tell it of me thou oughtest to consider whether those who represent me as an enemy to Caesar are not really such themselves." If Pilate had been as inquisitive as he ought to have been in this matter, he would have found that the true reason why the chief priests were outrageous against Jesus was because he did not set up a temporal kingdom in opposition to the Roman power. Not answering this expectation of theirs, they charged that upon him of which they were themselves most notoriously guilty—disaffection to and design against the present government.
